> 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Virginia, that the auditor of public accounts be, and he is hereby, required on the 1st day of July, 1878, and every three months thereafter, if practicable, to turn over to the second auditor the sum of $15,000 in currency, out of the proceeds of the license taxes, and to continue to make these quarterly payments without further order, demand, or requisition, until full payment shall have been made of all arrearages due from the capitation and property taxes set apart by mandate of the constitution and law of the State for the support of the public free-school system; that is to say, particularly of the sum of $382,732.26, which has been reported by the auditor of public accounts to be due from those sources for the years 1870, 1871, 1872, 1873, and 1874, which when paid in, as herein provided, shall be annually apportioned among the several cities, counties, and towns of the Commonwealth as other school funds are apportioned and applied: Provided, That the arrearages to the lunatic asylum shall first be paid.
> 2. This act shall be in force from its passage.

We have that act declaring that the amount due was $382,732.26 for the years down to and embracing 1874. The report went on to say that for the years 1875 and 1876 there were no arrearages. Then the only arrearages to be added were those accruing from the years 1877–'78, and 1878–'79, and I will presently show from the reports of the school superintendent how that was. So I insist, Mr. President, that the statement that the Bourbons of the State of Virginia had applied $1,500,000 of the school fund of that State is controverted by the act of the Legislature itself by the report of the committee, upon which it was based.

Mr. President, I was questioned very closely by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] in regard to the debt of the State of Virginia. He wanted to know the amount of it, whether I was in favor of paying it, and a great many other things. He asked me whether or not all the interest had been paid up. I replied that it had not been.

Mr. DAWES. That was not what I asked the Senator. I asked the Senator if his party had made any provision for paying the interest.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Very well. I have something to say upon that point. In speaking on this subject it is of course necessary for me to advert to the condition of the State of Virginia at the end of the war. Everybody knows, it is not worth while to remind Senators, that at the end of the war the people of the State of Virginia were left without resources and property. They had nothing, almost literally nothing. All that remained to them were their lands, their naked lands. The subjects of taxation that are so abundant in Massachusetts, in Rhode Island, in Connecticut, in New York, and in Pennsylvania and in other States, were lacking in Virginia. Our bare lands without anything upon them were all we had to raise a revenue from, and these lands were impaired in value by the ravages of armies on both sides.

In that unhappy condition of our affairs we were confronted with a large debt. We had no means of knowing what the value of our lands was. How could we estimate, I ask any candid man, the worth of lands under such a state of things, without capital or stock to work them? We had no adequate standard to go by. We were left in that condition of impoverishment and uncertainty and our legislation to raise revenue had to be experimental. We had to feel our way; we had no previous records to go by as did the States that were not devastated by the war which threw everything out of gear. Other States had their previous year's assessment and expenditures as guides for their future operations. We had nothing of that. We were starting anew and had to explore our way, and if we made some mistakes it was not to be wondered at.

Then, no matter how earnest we might have been in our efforts, I submit to all candid men that we might have failed in accomplishing what we desired to do without any impeachment of our motives or anything wrong in our action. We were compelled to make some experiments. The revenue did not always turn out as was hoped or expected. We founded large expectations from what was called the Moffett bell-punch. We supposed we might realize a very large revenue from that experiment; but we could not tell until we put it in operation and tried it how it would result. It was found to be a disappointment and fell far short of what was calculated, and hence a deficiency in our revenues, our impoverished condition, our want of taxable subjects, miscalculation as to what a particular subject of taxation would produce, and the panic of 1873 combined to embarrass us in our efforts to provide for all that the State had to do.

Then, I say, fair-minded men will make due allowance if it appeared that we had been unable all the time to pay the interest in full on our whole debt. I am afraid that my friend from Massachusetts is not tolerant enough to admit even as an excuse for us what the United States made an excuse for its failure in revenue. I want to read now what the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] now a member of this body, said in his last report as Secretary of the Treasury in regard to that very subject, and see whether or not the excuse which he makes for the default of the great Government of the United States and the apology offered for the falling off of its revenues ought not to be allowed the State of Virginia. Certainly, if comparisons are to be made between them, in that respect Virginia has far more justification for a defalcation, if any, than the United States. Here is an extract from his report made to Congress last December:

> The act of February 25, 1862, amended by the act of July 14, 1870, providing for a sinking fund for the payment of the public debt, is in conformity with the policy which has prevailed since the adoption of the Constitution, of regarding a public debt as a temporary burden, to be paid off as rapidly as the public interest will allow. The provisions of these acts have been substantially complied with.

Now I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to listen while I read this:

> They were executed literally, until the panic of 1873, by largely decreasing the revenues of the Government, rendered it impossible to meet their requirements. The deficiency on the sinking-fund account is as follows:

In the fiscal year 1874	$16,305,421 96
In the fiscal year 1875	5,996,039 62
In the fiscal year 1876	1,143,769 82
In the fiscal year 1877	9,225,146 63
In the fiscal year 1878	18,415,557 31
In the fiscal year 1879	36,231,632 87
Total amount due on sinking fund	87,317,568 21
Less the payment made during the past fiscal year in excess of the amount required, as above set forth	35,972,973 86
Leaving a balance still due on account of the sinking fund of	51,344,594 35

The late Secretary of the Treasury says that the panic of 1873, which largely decreased the revenue of the Government, rendered it impossible to meet the requirements of the sinking fund. That same panic prevailed in Virginia as well as in all other parts of the United States.

Mr. DAWES. I do not think the Senator does the late Secretary's language exact justice.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I read it; there it is.

Mr. DAWES. I do not think the Secretary meant to say that it was rendered necessary.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I read what he said.

Mr. DAWES. It may have been occasioned by that; but it does not follow that there was a necessity for it. I do not interrupt the Senator merely for the purpose of consuming his time; but the Senator is unfortunate in putting that statement of facts to me, because, if he will recollect, I happening to represent that sort of phase of public duty in the case referred to insisted upon it that the letter of the law should be complied with which required first that, before applying a dollar of revenue to anything else in the world but the interest on the public debt, the sinking fund should be provided for. That was my position, while the Senator's party in the other House introduced a bill to repeal and abolish the sinking fund altogether. That is the difference. I undertook to uphold it by compelling the Secretary and everybody else to follow the law and not allow it to be suspended by reason of any panic or anything else whatever.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Now, sir——

Mr. DAWES. I am talking.

Mr. JOHNSTON. No; I am talking. I have the floor.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will not let me finish the sentence——

Mr. JOHNSTON. Finish your sentence; but you said you were talking.

Mr. DAWES. I did not want to read anything. I did not mean to forget that the Senator had the floor because he has tried to resume it, and it is only by his courtesy that I am permitted to be heard now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia consent to be interrupted?

Mr. JOHNSTON. A little while longer.

Mr. DAWES. I only wanted to remark that no one could say that any panic rendered that condition of things necessary because the law is absolutely clear that before a dollar of the public revenues can be devoted to current expenses the sinking fund must be provided for. Still the party of the Senator had a bill pending in the last Congress, and have had one so long as they have had control at the other end, to abolish the sinking fund altogether.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, the Secretary of the Treasury says:

They were executed literally, until the panic of 1873, by largely decreasing the revenues of the Government, rendered it impossible to meet the requirements.

That is the language of the Secretary of the Treasury addressed to Congress and to the world at the beginning of the last session. The language is even stronger than "necessary"—"impossible" is the word used. That some panic prevailed in the State of Virginia; and when we find the great Government of the United States forced by the panic in 1873 to default $50,000,000 on the sinking fund, which the Senator from Massachusetts says ought to be held so sacred, and gives as an excuse for it the panic, I say that you ought to extend the same charity to the State of Virginia, and if we could not always make our revenue pay our interest, we ought to be indulged a little.

The report of the auditor who has control of the debt of Virginia shows that there are some arrears of interest due on the coupon portion, as it is called, and the other portion of the debt. How much of that is actually due and how much attaches to bonds which will never be presented, I do not know. I believe—and it is the belief in Virginia, and I think a justifiable belief—that a considerable part of that arrearage of interest will never be called for, because the bonds themselves upon which it has accrued have disappeared. How much that may be I do not know; nor do I know certainly that that is the fact; but as some of this interest has not been claimed for a long time back, I think we are justified in supposing that that portion at least of it will never be demanded. The same state of things happens here in regard to the debt of the United States. Here is the public debt statement of the United States for the month of March, 1881, and I find—

Interest due and unpaid $2,140,893.07.

This is outstanding against the United States, and the late Secretary of the Treasury told me last Friday that about a million of that extended back as far as the year 1840.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator understand that that is interest uncalled for?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes, sir; and what I mean to say is that a portion of this interest which is due from the State of Virginia is interest uncalled for just as that is.

Mr. DAWES. May I put another question to the Senator?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I will hear it.

Mr. DAWES. I do not desire to embarrass the Senator, but it was announced on the other side that the public owed me a debt of gratitude for the interrogatories I put to the Senator the other day, and I want to increase that debt, if I can, because I am after information as to this local question in Virginia. I wanted to inquire of the Senator if it was his opinion that the State of West Virginia ought to pay a part of the debt of the old Commonwealth?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes, it is my opinion.

Mr. DAWES. About what part?

Mr. JOHNSTON. About one-third.

Mr. DAWES. You agree with your colleague that one-third of your debt should properly stand over and be charged to West Virginia?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I do; and I agree with the Supreme Court of the United States in that and with the constitution of the State of Virginia and the constitution of the State of West Virginia.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will allow me to say that I hope he will not feel that I am damaging him by bringing him in accord with his colleague.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Not on that point. The Senator must understand that the constitution of the State of Virginia provided for a settlement of the debt between the State of Virginia and the State of West Virginia, and the constitution of the State of West Virginia did the same thing.

Mr. DAWES. Somebody voted it out of the West Virginia constitution.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I do not know what they did there. I speak of the constitution they adopted first. They may have changed it for aught I know.

Mr. DAWES. I understand that the party that control West Virginia have voted that out of their constitution.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I do not live in West Virginia.

Then, Mr. President, I quote the late case in the Supreme Court of the United States on this subject, Hartman vs. Greenhow, from which I will read for the edification of the honorable Senator:

During the war a portion of her territory was separated from her, and by its people a new State, named West Virginia, was formed, and by the Congress of the United States was admitted into the Union. Nearly one-third of her territory and people were thus taken from her jurisdiction. But as the whole State had created the indebtedness for which the bonds were issued, and participated in the benefits obtained by the moneys raised, it was but just that a portion of the indebtedness should be assumed by that part which was taken from her and made a new State. Writers on public law speak of the principle as well established, that where a State is divided into two or more States, in the adjustment of liabilities between each other, the debts of the parent State should be ratably apportioned among them. On this subject Kent says: "If a State should be divided in respect to territory, its rights and obligations are not impaired; and if they have not been apportioned by special agreement, their rights are to be enjoyed and their obligations fulfilled by all the parts in common." (Commentaries, volume 1, 26.) And Halleck, speaking of a State divided into two or more distinct and independent sovereignties, says: "In that case, the obligations which have accrued to the whole before the division are, unless they have been the subject of a special agreement, ratably binding upon the different parts. This principle is established by the concurrent opinions of text-writers, the decisions of courts, and the practice of nations." (International Law, chapter 3, section 27.)

In conformity with the doctrine thus stated by Halleck, both States—Virginia and West Virginia—have recognized in their constitutions their respective liability for an equitable proportion of the old debt of the State, and have provided that measures should be taken for its settlement. The constitution of Virginia of 1870 declared that the General Assembly should "provide by law for adjusting with the State of West Virginia the proportion of the public debt of Virginia proper to be borne by the States of Virginia and West Virginia," and should "provide that such sums as shall be received from West Virginia shall be applied to the payment of the public debt of the State." (Art. 10, sec. 19.)

We have the constitution of both States agreeing that it is proper that the State of West Virginia should pay a proportion of this debt. We have it laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in this recent case that that is the general law and is right, and we have the creditors agreeing to it. The State of West Virginia accepted that principle, and agreed to it in her constitution.

While I am on that subject I have here, which I will ask be made part of my remarks at this point, a tabular statement showing the provisions of the McCulloch bill, of the Riddleberger bill, and at the same time what my colleague stated in the Mozart Hall convention about the debt, as already read by the Senator from Georgia:

The McCulloch or Bourbon bill	The amount of the debt as stated by General Mahone, February, 1879, and what he was willing to do about it.	The Riddleberger bill.
Was the result of a conference between the creditors and the State. It was acceptable to the bondholders, who funded under it as fast as possible, till arrested by the readjusters. It paid the whole debt, being in round numbers about $32,500,000, with interest at 3 per cent. for ten years, 4 per cent. for twenty years, and 5 per cent. for ten years. The coupons were to be received for taxes and demands due the State, and the bonds were not taxable. The third set aside for West Virginia was not embraced in the above sum.	I would use my best endeavors to secure a vote of the people sanctioning a settlement at 3 per cent. for forty-five years on the basis of $32,977,090.02. And this settlement being ratified, I would enforce it by the Legislature and courts, whose powers I believe to be fully adequate thereto. I would do so because I believe it to be right; because I believe it is the only way to avoid consequences we would all regret deeply; because I believe it is to the best interest of the bondholder and tax-payer, and because I believe it is a duty we owe to the Commonwealth of Virginia.	This bill not only threw off the one-third set aside by the funding bill of 1871 and the McCulloch bill for the share of West Virginia, but it threw off more than one-third of the remainder. It fixed the debt at the sum of $19,665,196, or about $13,000,000 less than the McCulloch bill. The bonds were to bear a uniform rate of interest at 3 per cent., and were not exempt from taxation. The usual legal remedies against an unjust, illegal, or unconstitutional tax were taken away from the people, but they were to be forced to pay the taxes, right or wrong, and then sue for their recovery. And the consent of the creditor was not to be asked, but he was to be compelled to take these bonds or get nothing. No interest was to be paid that accrued during the war or the period of reconstruction, thus putting the war and reconstruction on the same footing.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question. He has asked me a good many, and I want to see if he is as ready to answer the question I will ask him as I have been to answer his. Here is what the Senator said a few days ago in his place on this floor:

I am not blind to the current of political events; I do not turn a deaf ear when those who have been clothed by the Constitution of the United States with the ballot have struggled in vain these long years for the exercise of that right, and whenever they have asserted it have had to wade through blood to the ballot-box; and when I see a body of men in one of these States asserting and maintaining that, however those men may vote, they shall have the free, untrammeled right to cast their ballots and assert their power, whether it be with them or against them, it is not necessary for me to inquire of the Senator from Virginia whence I learned these facts, or of the Senator from Tennessee where it is my duty to stand in any such struggle as that.

I ask the Senator whereabouts in Virginia and when in Virginia anybody ever had to wade through blood to get to the ballot-box? Will the Senator answer?

Mr. DAWES. At any time when it will be most acceptable to the Senator from Virginia I will answer.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Will the Senator answer the question now?

Mr. HOAR, (in his seat.) Petersburgh.

Mr. JOHNSTON. At Petersburgh, did I hear somebody say?

Mr. DAWES. Do you propose to have my answer now?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Answer at your own convenience, sir.

Mr. DAWES. I will answer now.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I want you to take time. I do not want to be interrupted now. You can answer after I sit down.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSTON. Go on, then.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator wants that I should take time. He was kind and gallant enough to serve this notice on me several days ago, and I wish to state to him in all frankness that if he thinks this question of the right of a poor, feeble man to cast his ballot unmolested is local and confined to the State of Virginia, he dwarfs the question amazingly.

Mr. President, what is called "the Mississippi plan" is a generic term, a specific name attached to all the different phases of it in the Southern States, but it is all one plan. It was announced lately at Richmond to be a question of the supremacy of the white race, and I see in leading publications that that at this moment is considered to be of greater importance even than the question of the public debt. It took on the phase of blood in one State; it took on the phase a little after of tissue ballots in another; and in another State it took on the phase of forging returns. The purpose, the object of it in all the States was one and the same. I saw it called in Virginia within a few days "an opposition to vagabond suffrage" from those who call themselves democrats. They worship one day at the shrine of Jefferson, and the next day at the shrine of those that hunt the poor negro.

Sir, the Senator will have to explain those phases of this general plan that they have brought out and developed themselves in Virginia before he arrogates to himself and his party any such assurance that they are holier in their politics than anybody else. Does the Senator know that in public judgment in one district of Virginia representation in the other House has not for two Congresses at least had any reference to the number of voters who desired to and actually did cast their votes in that district? Has the Senator forgotten that the Army of the United States was called out at Petersburgh——

Mr. JOHNSTON. Well, sir——

Mr. DAWES. To put down violence there; and does the Senator pretend to say that nobody got hurt in and about Petersburgh in the vain attempt of citizens to assert their rights as voters? I know what the Senator said about that. He has said already upon this floor that the United States was mistaken about any danger of any serious riot; but men got hurt.

When the plan was adopted that took the name of "the Mississippi plan" in one State and succeeded, it spread, and it is now in process silently in some States, in other States with more or less violence, pervading all those unfortunate States where there is a predominance of numbers of the weak and defenseless voters, and we are to meet it, and we meet it in Virginia just as the mathematician meets the solution of all the questions—he leaves nothing behind unsolved—and we are carrying it through Virginia into those States where that plan has been demonstrated more positively and more effectively to silence as dead men the voters; and that is what troubles my friend from Virginia. He sees the logic of events, and he knows that every voter is entitled to vote, and to be secured——

Mr. JOHNSTON. I yielded for an answer to my question, not to have a long speech made.

Mr. DAWES. I suppose the Senator did not measure out to me what should be the length of the answer.

Mr. JOHNSTON. No; but I want you to answer, not to make a speech.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator has enough, I am satisfied. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSTON. Quite enough for an interruption. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. President, I want to say a few words in regard to that very charge about the vote of Virginia. It is easily disproved. I have here a statement of the vote of the State from 1872 down, which I propose to read and have spread upon the RECORD to show how false is the charge that there has been any smothering of the republican vote in that State. I will begin with 1872. In that year General Grant and Horace Greeley were the candidates—Horace Greeley nominated and supported by the democrats. The State government was in the hands of the democrats. Let us see what the vote was then. The vote for Grant was 93,468; for Greeley, 91,654, General Grant, the republican candidate, carrying the State. Then we come to the next election where there was a contest throughout the State which will afford anything like a fair indication of the vote, the election of 1873. That was between Kemper, the democratic or Bourbon candidate, if you choose to call him so, and Hughes, the republican candidate for governor. At that election Kemper got 120,747 votes and Hughes 93,490. You see at each of these elections the republicans got about the same vote. Then the year 1876 was the largest vote we have had since the war, I believe. In that year Tilden received 139,670 and Hayes 95,558, still preserving the uniformity of the republican vote and increasing it a little. The next general election in the State where there was a republican canvass all over the State was the year 1880, the last general election. In that year Hancock got 128,586 and Garfield 84,020. The falling off from 1876 to 1880 was about the same on both tickets. The democratic and republican tickets declined 11,000 about; the votes were relatively the same as in preceding elections. In 1876 and in 1880 there was the same proportion of republican votes. In 1872 the republican vote was 93,468; in 1873, 93,490; in 1876, 95,558, and in 1880, 84,020; the democratic vote falling off also at the election of 1880.

The population of the State, as shown by the last census, was—whites 880,376 and colored 631,827. Anybody who will take the trouble to look over the figures will see that the ratio of republican votes to the colored population is about the ratio of the other vote to the white population, and the parties in the State are divided very nearly upon that line. There are some white republicans in the State, I do not know how many, and some colored democrats. These various elections beginning in 1872 and coming down to 1880 show that the republican vote all the time has been the fair ratio of the colored population of the State, and all the time borne about relatively the same proportion to the democratic vote, except the year 1872, when the democrats did not relish Mr. Greeley very much, and did not turn out and vote for him fully, but the republicans turned out for Grant. That disposes, I think, of the charge in regard to the oppression on colored voters.

Mr. DAWES. Is it not just as effectual a way to suppress the vote by snowing it under with tissue ballots as any other way? I showed the Senator tissue ballots from Virginia the other day that were put by thousands in the boxes.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Whenever I heard of tissue ballots they were used in the district of my colleague. That is the only district I ever heard of such reports from.

Mr. MAHONE. What does my colleague say about his colleague?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I say I never heard of tissue ballots in Virginia but there. Where did the Senator from Massachusetts get his tissue ballots from?

Mr. DAWES. The State of Virginia.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Whereabouts in Virginia?

Mr. DAWES. They were so thick in the district to which I allude that anybody could pick them up.

Mr. JOHNSTON. What district do you allude to?

Mr. DAWES. The district of Norfolk was one.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Was not Petersburgh one?

Mr. DAWES. No; at Petersburgh they resorted to the other part of the method—"the Mississippi plan;" that was violence.

Mr. JOHNSTON. That is the district my colleague lived in.

Mr. DAWES. I know that was. He has seen the error of that. I wish my friend would.

Mr. JOHNSTON. My colleague took occasion the other day to advert to the fact that in the congressional district in which I live, which is bigger than several States in the Union, at a certain election held there the party to which I belong was badly beaten. That is a sort of argumentum ad hominem which does not have much, if any, weight. But if it has against me it ought to have against him also. My colleague lives in the city of Petersburgh, and on the 28th day of October, 1880, he appeared in the rôle of a prophet and published this card, addressed I suppose to his own party friends:

COMMITTEE-ROOMS, READJUSTER ORGANIZATION,
Richmond, Virginia, October 28, 1880.

Let me assure you, as I do confidently, that our electoral ticket, headed by Cameron and Riddleberger and pledged to Hancock, will carry the State by a plurality of 25,000; that it will beat either the funder or grip-sack tickets by this vote—not less. Rely on this.

WILLIAM MAHONE.

By the funder ticket my colleague means the ticket that I was for. By the grip-sack ticket he means the ticket of the party to which the Senator from New York belongs, the republican ticket. Now, let us see how my colleague came out as a prophet. Here is the vote of the State: The Bourbon-Hancock ticket, 96,912; the republican or grip-sack ticket, 84,020; for the readjuster ticket, 31,674; and in the town of Petersburgh, where my colleague lives, the whole vote was 3,383, out of which his ticket only got 725, the vote in that city being: Bourbon ticket, 1,045; republican ticket, 1,613; readjuster ticket, 725.

In connection with matters in the State of Virginia let me read what occurred on this floor some time since. Mr. SHERMAN, then Senator from Ohio, offered a resolution which is found on page 152 of the Globe for 1871-'72, and I ask the Clerk to read what I have marked.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution offered by me the other day.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. SHERMAN on the 16th instant:

"Resolved, That as organized bands of desperate and lawless men, mainly composed of soldiers of the late rebel armies, armed, disciplined, and disguised, and bound by oaths and secret obligations, have by force, terror, and violence subverted all civil authority in large parts of the late insurrectionary States, thus utterly overthrowing the safety of persons and property, and all those rights which are the primary basis and object of all civil government and which are expressly guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States to all its citizens, and as the courts are rendered utterly powerless by organized perjury to punish crime: Therefore,

"The Committee on the Judiciary is instructed to report a bill or bills that will enable the President and the courts of the United States to execute the laws, punish such organized violence, and secure to all citizens the rights so guaranteed to them."

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator says that this band exists in eleven States. Let me say to him that there is no such band in my State, and that there is as much law and order in Virginia as in any State in this Union. If there is a band of Ku Klux there it is not known to me.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am perfectly aware that there is no testimony showing it to exist in Virginia.

* * * * * * *

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further?

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to make a regular, connected statement, but I will yield to my friend from Virginia if he desires me to do so now, before I have commenced to make my remarks.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I desire to make a single statement. If I understand the resolution—I have not had an opportunity of reading it and only heard it read—it declares that the state of things set forth in it exists in the late insurrectionary States. I presume the Senator who drew the resolution means to include the State of Virginia as one of the late insurrectionary States, and to declare by resolution that the Ku Klux Klan and organized perjury and resistance to the laws exist in that State. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator any further than to deny positively the statements of that resolution in regard to the State of Virginia and to declare that they are utterly untrue.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I stated before that I have no testimony now bearing on the case of Virginia; but I intend to give to the Senate this day a connected statement of the evidence disclosed, not only in this document, but in other proof that I shall present, to show that there is a condition of society in nearly all, and I believe with the exception of Virginia the evidence will go to all, the lately rebellious States that is disgraceful to American civilization, that is so startling that although I had read the newspapers from time to time yet it startled me.

Mr. JOHNSTON. There is the testimony of the honorable Senator from Ohio, now again a member of this body, exonerating the State of Virginia from any complicity in all these matters.

About two years ago a charge was got up by somebody in Virginia, originating out of the Lee case, I believe, that the county court judges of the State did not do the colored men justice and excluded them from the juries upon which they were entitled to be put. Judge Rives, the United States district judge of that State, is a man whose character I do not mean to deny, but he is a very strong and decided republican and has as exalted an idea of the dignity of the United States and of the importance of enforcing its laws in all respects as any man in the whole country, North or South. This matter was brought before him, and these Virginia judges were indicted on this charge, several of them; I do not recollect their number. One of them was put to the bar and tried, and upon the trial entirely acquitted, and the prosecution against the others was dismissed by Judge Rives himself, as I am told.

Mention has been made, Mr. President, of that feature of the constitution of Virginia which requires the prepayment of a capitation tax in order to entitle a man to vote. This thing has been urged more by the Senator from Massachusetts than by anybody else. Now I want to read a portion of the constitution of Massachusetts adopted as late as the year 1857:

ART. 20. No person shall have the right to vote, or be eligible to office under the constitution of this Commonwealth, who shall not be able to read the constitution in the English language, and write his name: Provided, however, That the provisions of this amendment shall not apply to any person prevented by a physical disability from complying with its requisitions nor to any person who now has the right to vote, nor to any persons who shall be sixty years of age or upward at the time this amendment shall take effect.

The provision in our constitution is that no man shall vote who has not paid his capitation tax. That capitation tax goes to the schools. We have such regard for the schools that we wish to keep up the school fund in every possible way, and in order that we may do that we say that every man must pay that tax before he shall vote, no matter whether he pays the other taxes or not. We do not require him to pay taxes for the support of the State government, nor for the purpose of meeting the interest on the public debt, nor his county, town, or corporation tax; he may default in every one of them and still vote, but we do say that, "Here is a tax of one dollar only, which goes to the public schools, and you must pay that tax before you shall vote;" and we do it out of regard for the public schools, not to disfranchise the citizen. It is a sum that any hearty, able-bodied man can discharge with two days' work, or if he is a mechanic with one, and thus exercise the right of suffrage. It is no disfranchisement; it is a condition imposed on him that he can most easily remove, and it only applies to voters, not to the right to hold office. A man need not pay any tax to hold office there.

But how is it in the State of Massachusetts? In that State a man can neither vote nor hold office unless he can read the Constitution of the United States and write his name. In order to entitle him to vote there it takes six months or a year of hard work. It is not a thing to be removed in a short time by a little labor, but by work and study for a year or more; and if poverty intervenes, and a man must labor each day for his daily bread, if he has not time to go to school and learn these things, he can never vote or hold office in that State. And yet we bear attacks on the State of Virginia from Massachusetts that we are derelict and seek to disfranchise our citizens because we desire to increase the fund devoted to education by the constitution of the State, and require that tax, and that tax only, to be paid before any man shall vote, no matter what his color or previous condition.

Mr. DAWES. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. JOHNSTON. For how long?

Mr. DAWES. The Senator is citing constitutional law, and I thought perhaps I might aid him a little about the constitution of Massachusetts.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I have read the constitution; there it is.

Mr. DAWES. But you commented on it in a way to show you did not understand it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The provision is very plain. If the Senator wants to ask a question——

Mr. DAWES. No; I should like to tell you what it means.

Mr. JOHNSTON. It does not require you to explain that; it is very clear.

Mr. DAWES. So it would seem, but it was evident when you came to talk about it that you did not understand it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Now, Mr. President, this movement to elect Riddleberger is put upon the ground by the republicans of liberalism, breaking the solid South, giving the colored people all their rights, suppressing all these alleged outrages. I want to look into the sincerity of that a little, and see how true that is; see what this man Riddleberger, around whom the republican Senators are now rallying as a sort of champion, as they say, of a free ballot, has done and said to deserve their support for such a reason, and what the party that he belongs to in the State has done, and how true is their claim of progress and advancement.

I read what my colleague, who aspires to be Mr. Riddleberger's biographer, quoted from a late manifesto of that gentleman, and if I am not mistaken—if I am I can be corrected—Mr. Riddleberger said that he had opposed both in the Legislature and before the people the amendment to the constitution by which the prepayment of the capitation tax was required in order to vote. I have looked into Mr. Riddleberger's record on that subject, and let us see what it is. The law proposing this amendment to the constitution was passed on the 20th of March, 1875. Our constitution in Virginia provides how it may be amended. It is done by one Legislature passing a law proposing the amendment by a majority of the members elected to each house. Then public notice is given of that law three months in advance of the next election of members of the Legislature, and it has to be adopted by a second Legislature by the same vote, a majority of all the members of each house. Then that second Legislature provides that it shall be submitted to a vote of the people, and it only becomes a part of the constitution when it has passed two Legislatures and been ratified by the people.

Mr. Riddleberger and his party in the State had these three opportunities to contest this constitutional amendment, and let us see what they did. He was a member of the Legislature that passed it. I have the journal of that body, and here is the record of the question coming up on that particular constitutional amendment, and I find the yeas and nays recorded upon it. On page 455 you will see that Mr. Riddleberger was then a member of the Legislature from the county of Shenandoah. Now I will ask the Clerk to look among the yeas and nays and state whether he sees Mr. Riddleberger voting against it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The vote required by the constitution was recorded as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Speaker, Alexander, Allen, Armentrout, Armstrong, Bagwell, Banks, Barnes, Beaton, Bohannon, Brooks, Campbell, J. A. Carter, A. L. Clark, Cockerille, Coghill, Crank, Critz, Davis, Dooley, Finney, Fitzpatrick, Flood, Foster, Friend, Gaines, Gardner, P. Gibson, Gilman, Graves, Griffith, Hale, Henderson, Hoenniger, Holbrook, William Hoskins, Howard, Hudgin, Hunter, James Jett, Jordan, B. W. Lacy, J. H. Lacy, Lamkin, Lee, Lewis, Lightner, Lovell, Lovenstein, Lybrook, Magruder, Massey, McMullan, Montague, Moore, Morrison, Ould, Pannill, Pendleton, Powell, Richmond, Scruggs, Shumate, Spratt, Strother, Stuart, Swann, Taliaferro, Taylor, Wallace, Webb, Wharton, Williams, Winn, Withers, and Yager—77.

NAYS—Messrs. Bickings, Branch, Jack Carter, Cecil, Matt Clark, Cox, Fulkenson, Gilliam, Goodwyn, Grayson, Hamilton, Harris, Hill, John T. Hoskins, P. K. Jones, R. S. Jones, Lemmon, Lipscomb, May, McGonigal, W. A. Nash, Nickens, Rains, Stovall, Syphax, Thomas, Turner, Webber, Whittaker, and Young—30.

Mr. JOHNSTON. You do not find Mr. Riddleberger's name there. Now turn over on the next page, and see if a little while after he did not vote on some little bill.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Special order No. 49. House engrossed bill for the management of land purchasers and actual settlers in Virginia, and to repeal an act approved March 29, 1873, entitled an act for the encouragement of immigration, came up.

The motion by Mr. Foster to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected was agreed to.

The question recurring on the passage of the bill was put, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 70, nays 37.

The vote required by the constitution was recorded as follows:

Yeas—Messrs. * * * Riddleberger.

Mr. JOHNSTON. There in the Legislature of Virginia, Mr. Riddleberger being present, as that journal shows, and this great measure about which so much is now said in regard to his position, and on which he is championed on this floor, being up, he sits there dumb—dumb when it was time to speak and now clamorous when the time has passed.

On this subject of what the readjusting party has done in the State of Virginia and what they propose to do to entitle them to what is now claimed for them, I shall have to give a little history, and I want to call attention to the fact, in the first place, that on the 5th day of January last the readjusters of Virginia issued an address signed "William Mahone, chairman," in which this statement is made:

And yet when the 1st day of January came—

That is, the 1st day of January, 1880—

though funderism had controlled the government without interruption to the very day, it was ascertained and disclosed by the auditor installed by your party that the treasury contained $22,497.09, &c.

Thus the readjusters, through their chairman, my colleague, not only admit but charge that the funder party had held control of the government without interruption to the 1st of January, 1880, and were responsible for the previous legislation. At the Mozart Hall meeting the same declaration was made by Mr. Blair, the temporary chairman, who said:

The negroes have been freed and the State has been ravaged throughout her borders, and her territory has been rent in twain. Regard to these facts should be had in any readjustment. The conservative party had had control ever since reconstruction, and yet no relief has come.

Then if this was true, and if there was any legislation in the interest of reform, economy, and public education, it was the work of the funders or Bourbons and not of the readjusters. The readjusters came into possession of the Legislature in 1879. Here are the acts of their Assembly of 1879–'80, and they paid what was only a just and due compliment to the conservative party of the State, because in that whole volume there is not one single law for the protection of schools, or preserving the school-fund, or making any other reform. But the readjuster legislature found the work of the preceding conservative body so perfect and so complete and so good and so wise and so just that they did not even undertake to change or correct it. Here in the volume of their acts, they did not even pass a law imposing taxes for the support of the government, nor one improving the public revenues; they did not try to do it. They took everything as the Bourbon democrats had left it. They found the legislation of the Bourbons like a perfect statue from which nothing could be taken and to which nothing could be added. They virtually admitted that by their failure to perform that duty usual and proper in legislative bodies, to raise and appropriate the annual revenue, that they could not improve upon the laws as they found them. They accepted the work of the Bourbons, conceded its wisdom and fitness, and let it stand.

So when they complain of what the funders have done, there is their record. If what the funders have done, if what the McCulloch legislature did was wrong, if they had misappropriated public funds, if they had imposed improper taxation, if they had made taxes too high or too low, if they were unjust or illegal or unconstitutional, then it was the imperative duty of that Legislature to correct these things; but they did not even make the effort.

Now, on the subject of schools, about which so much clamor has been made. During the funder reign, in addition to the fact I referred to the other day that the Legislature, long before they were required to do so by the constitution of the State, put public schools into operation, the Bourbons passed what is called the Henkel bill, which protected the school fund in the counties. It was claimed that if all the money collected from the people was put into the treasury and mixed together there might be danger that some of it would be diverted from the schools; and to prevent that the Henkel bill was passed by one of those Bourbon-funder legislatures, by which it was provided that the school fund of each county should be kept in the county and never go to the treasury at all, so as to make it impossible that there could be any misapplication of the fund in the way charged.

That was one of the Bourbon measures; and if the schools now are efficient it is on account of that Henkel bill and other measures to which I will refer. I want to read what the superintendent of public instruction says about this Bourbon measure. The Henkel bill was passed in March, 1879, by the same Legislature that passed the McCulloch bill and who are now denounced as the enemies of the public-school system. I read from the last report of the superintendent of public instruction in Virginia:

Under the act of March 3, 1879, commonly called the Henkel act, the amount apportioned November 29, 1879, was $459,515.95.

That is the sum this Bourbon measure secured the schools, and the Riddleberger bill only claims for them under its provisions the annual sum of $431,700, for this is one of the recitals in its long preamble:

Whereas the necessary expenses of conducting the government, after adopting and applying every practicable measure of reform and economy, cannot safely be estimated below the sum of $900,000, and the proportion of such estimated revenue due to the public schools will be $431,700.

There on the face of the bill itself it is stated that the portion of the revenue going under it to the public schools is $431,700, and on the other hand the Henkel or Bourbon bill yielded to the schools the sum of $459,515.95, or twenty-odd thousand dollars more than the proposed Riddleberger bill.

But that is not all. There is another bill which Mr. Riddleberger himself has indorsed, as I have already read here, in the controversy in the congressional election last fall between Mr. Allen and Mr. Paul about this very question of the public schools—Allen claiming that what the public schools were then getting was due to the Henkel bill, and Paul and Riddleberger claiming that it was due also to another bill passed in 1877–'78, by which an amount was required to be paid quarterly out of the treasury to the counties. There, the readjusters say, is where the help came from. No matter where it came from, it was a Bourbon measure either way. The Bourbons had power, according to my colleague, until 1880. Both the Henkel bill and that of 1877–'78 were their measures, and the only question even among the readjusters is, which of these two acts did most for our schools?

That is not the only thing, Mr. President. During the time the Bourbons were in power let us see whether they made any reforms in the State. Recollect, as I said before, that when we started it was under difficult circumstances. Everybody will admit that the situation was one which required wisdom and in which difficulties might be expected to be encountered at every step. But when we got the government into operation and found what the troubles were, step by step these Bourbons sought to reform them and have done so successfully.

They have diminished the public burdens in more ways than one. In the first place, under acts of Bourbon legislatures biennial sessions of the Legislature were provided, and one-half the legislative expenses thus cut off. In the second place the number of members of the Legislature was reduced and thus a large saving was effected. In the next place their pay was cut down, and thus another economy practiced. Salaries generally through the State were reduced, and the bill to which I have alluded, the bill of 1877–'78, and the Henkel bill were passed, by which the school fund was put out of the reach of being captured for any other purpose. And by the operation of the McCulloch bill about two hundred and forty thousand dollars a year of the interest upon the public debt was saved.

These are the reforms made by the Bourbon legislature; and if now the State has more means at its control, if it has more money to apply to the public debt and to public education, it is because the Bourbons did these things.

Let me examine a little further this alleged progressive and free and liberal movement in the State of Virginia. I find some resolutions passed lately by republicans in that State. I have here a paper signed by John Callahan, chairman republican executive committee, Portsmouth, Virginia; Jacob E. Reid, chairman Norfolk County republican executive committee; T. F. Paige, jr., chairman Norfolk City executive committee; Richard Goodson, secretary of Portsmouth republican executive committee; Z. T. Hutchins, sr., secretary Norfolk County republican executive committee; and W. H. Mills, secretary Norfolk City republican executive committee, who certify to the adoption of certain resolutions, in which they say that they represent 6,000 republican voters, and it is resolved—

That as republicans we cannot conscientiously approve of the proceedings of the recent convention held in the city of Petersburgh, and we desire all good republicans to beware of those men who claim to be the champions of "liberalism."

Those gentlemen, occupying a conspicuous position in the republican party, and representing, as they say, 6,000 republicans, seem to think that this "liberal" movement is a wolf in sheep's clothing.

And now let me show something of the spirit which moves and animates this party in Virginia. I read now from what is a reported speech of Mr. John Paul, of Rockingham, a prominent readjuster, who has been elected to Congress from the seventh district. This speech is reported as having been made at the Mozart Hall convention, and I suppose it was made there. See how liberal this is:

The people are here in grand convocation, to take their own affairs into their own hands; and he was proud to see so vast a gathering. They had trusted too long to others, only to be deceived; and now there is to be an organization that shall secure discipline and carry out the will of the majority. There must be no truce with traitors; and a drum-head court-martial must await all deserters.

Some resolution was passed in the city of Norfolk only a few days ago by the readjusters, and I will read the first, and before reading it I wish to call attention to what you yourself, sir, [Mr. HOAR in the chair,] said on this floor within the last day or two, I believe. You, or the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] I do not now remember which, took occasion to warn us that this was a nation. A "nation" was the language that you used, not a mere aggregation of States and Territories, but a nation. Let us see whether the readjusters down in Virginia think that this is a nation or not, and what they would accord to people outside of the State. They enunciate stronger State-rights doctrines than anybody in the South ever uttered. Here is their resolution:

That we, the readjusters of the city of Norfolk, and others, heretofore acting with the so-called democratic and republican parties, hereby express our hearty approbation of the manly and independent course pursued by General MAHONE, Senator from Virginia, upon the floor of Congress, in refusing to co-operate with BAYARD, who had grossly misrepresented him and his party and who lacked the manliness to correct his misstatements when informed of them; or to go in caucus with HAMPTON, VANCE, and MORGAN, who came from repudiating States, to teach honesty to and defeat our party in Virginia who were striving for a just and equitable settlement of the State debt; or to act with JOHNSTON, whose interference with our debt question the people of the Commonwealth had emphatically repudiated at the polls.

It declared that it was a piece of insolence and intrusion in this nation to freemen from the other States to go into Virginia to speak in the presidential canvass. They absolutely deny in this nation, as you call it, sir, the right of a Senator from another State to raise his voice in Virginia in a presidential campaign. Not only that, but the Mr. JOHNSTON referred to there is myself, a man who was born in Virginia, and whose people have lived there for more than one hundred years. They spoke of my "interference" in the affairs of my own State. They are so intolerant as to denounce the fact that I ventured to express an opinion on the State debt, and ventured to do what other citizens of the State had a right to do, to vote and to speak. That is now the party of free speech and free opinion and free action, the party of the nation, that you gentlemen are defending so strongly here.

I will read now some extracts from some of the readjuster papers in order to see if we can get at what the principles of the party are.

My colleague the other day read with disapprobation, as I understood him, from a speech delivered by Major John W. Daniel, in which he talked about greenbacks, national banks, &c. Here is a leading editorial from the Richmond Whig of July 11, 1878. I will read what that paper says. Here is what he says the country wants:

1. A deluge of greenbacks. Our present sufferings are mainly due to the scarcity of currency and the apprehension that it may be still scarcer. The way to meet the evil is to drown out the money-changers as you would so many burrowed rats—flood them with greenbacks.

* * * * * * *

2. It is the credit system by which the money-dealer has his strongest hold upon the toiling millions. Abolish that, and humanity is free and stands on solid ground. It is by the credit system that the money-dealer gets interest on five times as much money as he has, and thereby makes the rest of the community hewers of wood and drawers of water for his benefit—in a word, his abject slaves. To this end all that is necessary is a clause in the State and Federal constitutions to the effect that no contract between individuals shall be enforced in any court. That will settle the matter.

Further this editorial says:

We shall then be able to make a bonfire of that law library in Washington of 40,000 volumes, and all other law libraries in which conclusive authority may be found for every rascality conceived by the human intellect.

That library contains the decisions of Marshall, of Taney, of Chase, and of Waite. Further, I read from a speech made by W. W. Newman on the 23d of September, 1878. This Newman was then a candidate for Congress in the Richmond district, and was elected a judge by the readjusters last winter, and is now a judge. They elected him judge after the sentiments that he delivered then. See how fit this man is for a judge. He said:

Now, gentlemen, before we resume a specie currency, I submit that according to all principles of equity and justice, it is the duty of this Government to go back to the origin of all contracts, see what the money was worth as compared with gold, and thus reduce all debts to a gold standard. Until this is done, specie resumption is the most gigantic swindle ever perpetrated on earth.

Further he says:

Sherman has turned the screw of contraction until it has produced 40,000 business failures, with a loss of one thousand millions to the country.

Still further on he says:

The Government, before returning to gold and redeemable paper, is bound by every principle of justice to reduce all contracts to a gold basis and scale them accordingly.

This man, elected a judge, advocates the scaling of all contracts; and, I suppose, as he was a candidate for Congress, that could only be done by Congress. These are some of the declarations of their journals and judges.

In the Mozart Hall convention Mr. Riddleberger made a speech; he was chairman of the committee that reported the resolutions:

At the night session Mr. Riddleberger, from the committee on business, submitted their report, consisting of a statement of our present condition, the objections to the McCulloch bill, and the following:

In view of all these facts—

Says Mr. Riddleberger—

beleaguered by a clamorous host without, and beset by a combination within.

That is the way in that published address he designates the creditors of the State who are only after their just debts, "beleaguered by a clamorous host without."

From the Richmond Whig of July 11, 1878, the leading readjuster paper of the State, and from the speeches of the candidates and one of their judges, I gather that this is their platform:

1. A deluge of greenbacks—to drown out the money-changers as you would so many burrowed rats—flood them with greenbacks.—Richmond Whig, of July 11, 1878, the leading readjuster paper in Virginia.

2. Put a clause in the State and Federal constitutions to the effect that no contract between individuals shall be enforced in any court.—Same journal.

3. We shall then be able to make a bonfire of that law library in Washington of 40,000 volumes, and all other law libraries, in which conclusive authority may be found for every rascality by the human intellect.—Same journal.

Then from the same journal of August 26, 1879:

4. The truth is that if Virginia should at once repudiate her whole debt it would be the most effective means possible to entice within her borders both capital and immigrants.

Mr. Frank Blair, temporary chairman, whom I have already quoted, said at the Mozart Hall convention:

Having achieved a great triumph in the State on our view of the debt issue, I now favor a vigorous application of the readjustment principle to the national debt.

Then follows the resolution, which I have already read, of the Norfolk City meeting and what I have read from the speech of Mr. Newman.

Then we gather this from the Riddleberger bill as one of their principles:

That in its direful operation upon Virginia the reconstruction period was equivalent to the war, and equally exonerated the State from the payment of interest on a just debt.

However, let me call attention to a little article that I believe appeared on Friday or Saturday in the National Republican of this city, edited by Mr. Gorham, whose name is before the Senate now for the Secretaryship, in which he said:

THE COURT DEMORALIZED.

It is a fact that all the business before the United States courts in this District is at a complete stand-still on account of the failure to nominate a United States marshal, and it seems decidedly unjust that the interests of 180,000 citizens should be so long jeopardized because the President is unable to come to a decision as to the proper person to appoint. It is to be hoped that some one of the many aspirants may be selected without further delay, and thus end the present dead-lock in the courts.

This is the condition of the business of this District and if that nomination should be sent in it would lie on that table and could not even be opened because we cannot get into executive session.

Now I want to say in conclusion that if the republicans in this body think it of more importance and interest to the country and a more imposing constitutional duty to persist in this effort to elect Senate officers where no vacancies exist rather than to fill the vacancies on the supreme bench in the fifth judicial circuit and the Court of Claims, to consider the important treaties known to be pending, and to act upon the numerous nominations already sent in by the President, well and good. They claim a constitutional majority in this body and they must take the responsibility.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BLAIR in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] that the resolution be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I desire to appeal to our friends on the other side no longer to obstruct the public business by refusing to go into executive session.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I cannot hear the Senator.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to appeal to our friends on the other side of this Chamber no longer to obstruct the public business by refusing to proceed to the consideration of executive business. We have been here for a full month, and yet there has been scarcely any of the business performed for which we were convened in executive session. I have heard numerous motions made from this side of the Chamber to proceed to executive business, and the record will disclose the fact that we have been persistent in our appeals to the other side of the Chamber not to obstruct the public business, but to proceed to discharge the duties for which we have been called together. The Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] with courteous bearing and language, has appealed in a manner that would have been heard and respected in almost any deliberative body in the world, and yet his appeals have been totally disregarded, and my friend the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] who has, with a persuasive manner and imploring voice, importuned and pleaded with the other side to come to the discharge of the duties for which they are here convened, and yet his language has fallen on deaf ears. So the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has repeatedly tried to demonstrate to the Senator from Massachusetts who has this matter in charge [Mr. DAWES] that it was his imperative duty to proceed with the consideration of the public business; and yet he has been callous and deaf to the claims of duty upon him. These appeals have been made to the patriotism of the other side of this Chamber, to their sense of duty, but made in vain. I come now and appeal to republican Senators upon another ground. I appeal no longer to the sense of duty that ought to animate that side of the Chamber to progress with the public business; I appeal no longer to their patriotic feelings; but I come to ask them——

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me——

Mr. SAULSBURY. No, sir; I will make my appeal, and then you can speak.

Mr. DAWES. I wanted before the Senator departed from patriotism to respond to him.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I now come to appeal perhaps to a feeling which is more near to the hearts of the other side of the Chamber than that of patriotism or a sense of duty. I come to ask them in the name of party fealty to ground the weapons of their rebellion against their own administration.

Mr. DAWES. You have no business to speak on that point.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If there is any man in this land to-day who deserves commiseration and pity it is the President of the United States. Why, sir, no man ever occupied the presidential chair who has been treated with such marked disrespect by his own friends. I see the papers state that comparatively few persons now call at the White House. Even the great press of office-seekers have found that the President of the United States is unable to do anything for them, and they have ceased to pay their visits to the tenant of the presidential mansion. He may at this very hour be indulging in soliloquy and saying to himself, "I have been in this office for one month; I have been in this mansion, once occupied by Madison and Jefferson and Adams and all those great men who preceded me, and every man that has ever occupied this place has commanded the respect at least of his own party but myself. Even my immediate predecessor, Mr. Hayes, (whom nobody believed was elected to the Presidency,) did in the early days of his administration at least command some respect; and though his administration was broken down in the Senate Chamber before he went out of office, completely broken down, and his administration disgraced, disgraced by his own political friends, yet even he, in the early days of his administration, did command some respect, and I sit here unhonored and alone. I did not expect this treatment from my republican friends. I supposed that I would command respect enough on my own side of the Chamber at least to have their co-operation in the performance of my duties; but I have sent my messages to the Senate Chamber and they lie unopened; they are not even considered; no respect is paid to them; they are utterly disregarded by my republican friends in the Senate. Was ever a President treated as I am treated? Certainly it is not within the memory of living man that any other President was so contemptuously disregarded by his own political friends in the Senate."

Mr. HOAR and Mr. DAWES addressed the Chair.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire not to be interrupted. I want you to hear my appeal. I am making an appeal in behalf of your President, and I want you to listen calmly, for in the interest of your own party I now appeal to you.

Mr. DAWES. Good.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Perhaps he is saying, "There are some in the Senate Chamber from whom I did not expect much better treatment."

Mr. DAWES. We are pretty badly off now.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Perhaps he may be saying, "There is a portion of the republican party that I did not expect to give me much consideration, because I antagonized them and the third-term men in the Chicago convention; perhaps they are treasuring up some idea of avenging a wrong to them, and I might perhaps have expected to meet with some opposition from that quarter; but then there is the Senator from my own State, the man that I went to the Chicago convention for the purpose of nominating, and he, too, sits in silence and does not give respect to the messages which I send to the Senate. Perhaps he is dreaming that I was not loyal to him at Chicago—that I did not desire his nomination by the convention—that I was false and treacherous. Can it be such thoughts disturb his soul? If so, alas! he wrongs me. I despise treachery, and hate the man that betrays a trust—

> May life's unblessed cup for him
> Be drugged with treacheries to the brim;
> And when from earth his spirit flies,
> Just prophet, let the damned one dwell
> Full in the sight of Paradise,
> Beholding Heaven and feeling Hell.

"No, my own Senator does not, cannot believe that I was false to him at Chicago. Why, then, does he sit in silence? Then there is the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] that has charge of the resolution obstructing executive business. I served with him in the other House; we were friends then; but he has turned against me, and will not let my messages be opened and considered. And then there is the other Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] who presided so conspicuously over the convention that gave me the nomination, and he, too, has turned against me; I did not expect that from him. I remember the joy that lit up his countenance when my name was announced as the nominee; but I begin to believe now that the satisfaction he manifested then was not so much on my own account as it was that he assisted to defeat the third-term candidate. He sat with me, too, on the electoral commission, he is privy to all the secrets of which I am cognizant with reference to that affair, and I had not expected that that Senator would have turned his hand against me.

"Then there are the Senators from Maine; I ought to have their co-operation, for we served together in the other House. There was perhaps some little jealousy, some little rivalry about the leadership of our party in the House of Representatives; but that should have passed away when I was called to another sphere. They ought to remember that I took my premier from their State, and whatever disgrace is brought upon my administration must be shared by their own particular friend, the Secretary of State; and one of them ought especially to remember that by so taking my premier from that State he had an opportunity given to him to be elevated to the Senate. I had not expected that kind of treatment from the Senators from Maine.

"Then there is the Vice-President, he whose name was inscribed with my own on every banner and whose image is now stuck up in almost every junk-shop beside my own; he ought not to turn his heel against me. By his casting vote he has assisted to put the Senate into such a position that they now will not give any respect to my messages sent to them. Was ever a President in such a lamentable condition?" Such perhaps are the thoughts, if not the language, of the President.

Now, I appeal to you, republican Senators, in behalf of your own President. Disgrace is being brought on his administration by the very fact that his party is seeking to make alliance with repudiation throughout the country. Disgrace is about to be entailed upon his party as well as upon the man himself by the contempt with which he is treated. I appeal to you, gentlemen, to stop—stop this greed for a few offices, and march up to the performance of public duty. Perhaps the Vice-President ought himself to go, being so near to the throne and the heir-apparent to it, he ought at once to go and tell the President in his despair that you are engaged in a more important duty; that the Senator from Virginia has assisted you to organize the Senate, and, animated by gratitude, that noblest feeling of humanity, you have a higher duty to perform than that which you owe to the President of the United States. Send your Vice-President, and let him pour into the executive ear the words of consolation and hope; tell him that after this more important function has been discharged then you will take up the messages he has sent here and act upon them.

Now, I appeal to you, my republican friends, if you have no patriotic sense of duty to prompt you, I ask you in the name of party fealty to give some attention to your President, and perform the duty for which you were called together in executive session. I hope this appeal will not be in vain. I have volunteered it as a friend to the President, whom I have known long, and for whom I have had a high regard, seeing the unfortunate position in which he is placed, and that his administration is in danger of sharing the same fate as that of his immediate predecessor, of being broken down.

I appeal to Senators to sustain the President of your own choice, and we on this side will co-operate with you, so that his administration shall not go down despised and neglected at its very beginning.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAWES. I have the floor, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts was recognized before the motion was made.

Mr. DAWES. Let us continue the exercises of this solemn occasion by a few brief remarks. [Laughter.] The delusion into which the Senator from Delaware has fallen——

Mr. SAULSBURY. My motion was to go into executive session, and it is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator did not submit the motion until the Senator from Massachusetts had asked for the floor and it had been awarded to him. The motion was then made, but it was not then in order.

Mr. DAWES. I was about to say, Mr. President, that the delusion into which the Senator from Delaware had fallen, that he was the President of the United States, was not the only delusion which seems to have got possession of him. He is greatly mistaken and does not seem to be aware of where he is, when he appeals to what he calls this side of the Chamber to regard the will of the majority and to evoke the assistance of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee in order to bring back what he calls this side of the Chamber to a sense of duty. The last distinguished effort of that Senator was rebuked by a considerable, certainly an emphatic and indisputable majority of the Senate. It is the Senate that the Senator from Delaware is quarreling with, not this side. The Senate is against him. The Senate decided, not by an even, but by a positive and pronounced majority on the very last record that they would not do what the Senator from Delaware, in the most solemn, I will not say psalm-singing, but devout tone, invoked what he called this side of the Senate to do. Will not the Senator from Delaware admit the a, b, c, the rudiment of principle upon which all this fabric rests, that the majority shall rule?

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President——

Mr. DAWES. I cannot be interrupted at this interesting moment.

Mr. PENDLETON. I only interrupt to make a statement of fact to the Senator which I am sure would interest him just at this particular moment.

Mr. DAWES. Well, I would not disappoint the Senator.

Mr. PENDLETON. I only desire to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that the majority which he says was so decided this morning arose from the circumstance that two of the gentlemen on that side forgot their pairs and inadvertently voted.

Mr. DAWES. Ah, indeed! Mr. President, I will submit it at this moment—we will have no further question—just take the vote on the resolution, and if the resolution has not a majority at this moment I will hold my peace forever. Will the Senator accept the proposition? He questions the idea of a majority. I say to him I will submit that question, and, as the people say who distribute the Holy Writ, "without note or comment." I will submit the question now to the Senate, and as the majority shall be recorded, so shall he or I forever hold our peace. I say it is the majority, it is the Senate—for what the majority is is the Senate—that the Senator from Delaware who quotes Moore and Byron and all the ancient poets is quarreling with.

I went into an insane asylum a little while ago, and the first man I met came and shook hands and said to me, "I am the President of the United States." [Laughter.]

Mr. SAULSBURY. What was his name?

Mr. DAWES. I do not know his name. The man who gets that delusion into his head and undertakes to talk as if from the Executive Mansion would say anything. [Laughter.] Now, if my friends on the other side have any doubt about the majority and will just join me in settling it forever, I will ask for a vote on the resolution.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I submitted a motion to go into executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware moves——

Mr. DAWES. Why will not the Senator test the question of the majority by a vote on the resolution?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Because I want to carry you into executive session to perform your duty.

Mr. DAWES. If the majority say they will go into executive session, well and good; but they have just said they would not; and if you will just submit this question to the majority of the Senate, I will pledge you my word to move myself in ten minutes to go into executive session.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The question is on the motion I have made.

Mr. DAWES. I am afraid the Senator is not half as sincere as he thinks he is about this anxiety to go into executive session.

Mr. FARLEY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion is now pending, made by the Senator from Delaware. The question is on that motion.

Mr. SAULSBURY and others called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROWN, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. MILLER.] I do not see him in his seat, and therefore I decline to vote.

Mr. HARRIS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] and upon all kindred questions. I should vote "yea" if at liberty to do so.

Mr. HAWLEY, (when his name was called.) For this afternoon I am paired with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES.]

Mr. COKE, (when Mr. MAXEY's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.]

Mr. MORRILL, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE.]

Mr. TELLER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. VEST, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB,] and I announce the pair now for the day.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. SAUNDERS] is paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Mr. HARRIS. I see the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] in the Chamber, and I therefore record my vote. I vote "yea." I call the attention of the Senator from New York to the fact that I have recorded my vote.

Mr. CONKLING. If the honorable Senator allows his vote to stand, I will vote if that is agreeable to him.

Mr. ALLISON, (after having voted in the negative.) I desire to withdraw my vote, having voted under a misapprehension. I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. CONKLING. As the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] has voted, I vote "nay."

Mr. FAIR. I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. JONES, of Nevada.]

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Bayard,	Gorman,	Johnston,	Pugh,
Beck,	Groome,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Butler,	Grover,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, inasmuch as——

Mr. DAWES. I hope now, as the Senate have decided, they will take this vote——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. Inasmuch as our friends on the other side decline to go into executive session and attend to the business for which we were convoked, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. I hope we shall not abandon the business before the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senate very clearly declines to transact business, and therefore I wish to adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Massachusetts is willing to submit to the majority.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina, that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President——

Mr. BUTLER. My friend from Florida desires to submit some remarks, and therefore I withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. DAWES. I am glad the motion is withdrawn.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I was not in my seat the other evening when the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] took occasion to refer to some grave occurrence in my State in connection with the elections, some outrage perpetrated upon an animal. I do not know how much that might weigh with the country, but as we all have a very great disposition to keep up the character of that little Commonwealth for peace and order, I am not willing to let what the Senator said pass without a little notice from me. It is true my colleague [Mr. CALL] was here at the time and very properly put in a denial to the statement of the outrage; but after looking at the RECORD I felt that something more might be said in justice to my people; and I do not propose now to bring forward any democratic authority, but I propose to show from the very highest republican authority that these constant imputations which are being cast upon the people of the State which I partly represent here have no foundation in truth and are circulated in my opinion for nothing in the world but to warp the public mind of the North, the great body of whose people never have an opportunity of looking into the internal condition of things in the South.

I was a year or two ago very much delighted when the Senator from Maine, now the Secretary of State, (Mr. Blaine,) who always illuminated this Chamber by his presence, in speaking of the condition of things in Florida, took occasion to except that State from the number of Southern Commonwealths upon which he was willing to raise the charge of violence and wrong. While I believe with respect to the other communities of the South that all that has been said is just as far short of the truth as in regard to Florida, still I know from my own personal knowledge and observation that the public press of this country has been filled with slanders, vile and infamous, with respect to the condition of things there.

Now, Mr. President, I propose to read from the message of the governor of Florida, a republican governor, in 1874. Upon the assembling of the Legislature of that State he took occasion to speak to the representatives of the people, and indeed to the whole country, in regard to the internal condition of the Commonwealth over which he was called upon to preside as chief magistrate—Governor Stearns, whose republicanism I think will not be questioned by any gentleman on the other side of the Chamber. He said:

> During the past year peace, the offspring of contentment and harbinger of prosperity, has prevailed throughout the State. The laws have generally been well executed. Crime has perceptibly diminished, especially offenses of the higher grades. The election last November was passed with unprecedented order and quiet, and it is believed that a fair expression of the people's will was had. I have yet to learn of a single collision or disturbance at the polls between races or opposing parties growing out of that exciting contest.
> Freedom of political opinion and action has been accorded alike to all and recognized as an essential principle of free government. Equal civil and political rights are denied to none, and the most cordial good-will prevails among all classes of our people. We need no congressional enactment or other interference to secure to any class of our citizens the full enjoyment of their just constitutional rights.
> Since slavery and secession are things of the past, buried beyond the possibility of resurrection; since all the States are restored to their constitutional relations with the General Government, and a true and lasting peace has come; since equal civil rights and political privileges are guaranteed to all, irrespective of race, color, or previous condition of servitude—has not the time come when we may safely recur to fundamental principles which underlie our system of government as established by our fathers, and base our political action upon them? It is a sound political maxim that "a frequent recurrence to the fundamental principles of government is essential to civil liberty." I believe there is a strong feeling among all classes of our citizens for a radical reform in governmental affairs and a more economical expenditure of the public moneys. I believe there is a true desire for a more perfect restoration of friendly and fraternal relations and mutual confidence between all sections of our common country. The citizens of Florida are loyal to the Government, and would cheerfully render any assistance in their power to uphold and defend it. A patriotism as broad and comprehensive as the American Union possesses their hearts, and I doubt if any State has a more loyal and patriotic class of citizens than the people of Florida are to-day.

That is the evidence that I produce to support the character of the people of that State from the republican governor to the Legislature in 1874, written with full knowledge of the history of the past, in the midst, I may say, of some excitement and after we had passed through many exciting local contests in that State.

Now, need I say to Senators that there has been no material change in the condition of public sentiment in that Commonwealth, and that the situation as presented to the country and to the State by Governor Stearns in 1874 has been its condition from that day to this? And when gentlemen get up here and try to make it appear that we are lawless and ready to cut each other's throats over an election matter, it is an imposition on the intelligence of this people, and it brings to my mind some of the melancholy chapters in the history of darker days. I am reminded by it of a passage in Macaulay which I cannot forbear to read. It only shows that history repeats itself when the designs and purposes of men are the same. Those who have read the history of other countries and times will remember the condition of things in England in the reign of Charles II when party feeling, I suppose, ran higher than at any other time in its history and each resorted to every possible means to crush the other; the court was supposed to be in sympathy with the Catholics and under the leadership of France, and every falsehood that could possibly be taken hold of was nurtured by the opposition to crush the opposing party. The infamous history of Titus Oates is familiar to all. The tales that he invented and which were received by great statesmen as truths and put before the country to warp the English mind afford some instructive lessons that we ought to profit by. Speaking of the condition of things, Macaulay says:

> Meanwhile the courts of justice, which ought to be in the midst of political commotion sure places of refuge for the innocent of every party, were disgraced by wilder passions and fouler corruptions than were to be found even on the hustings. The tale of Oates, though it had sufficed to convulse the whole realm, would not, unless confirmed by other evidence, suffice to destroy the humblest of those whom he had accused. For, by the old law of England, two witnesses are necessary to establish a charge of treason. But the success of the first impostor produced its natural consequences. In a few weeks he had been raised from penury and obscurity to opulence, to power which made him the dread of princes and nobles, and to notoriety such as has for low and bad minds all the attractions of glory. He was not long without coadjutors and rivals. A wretch named Carstairs, who had earned a livelihood in Scotland by going disguised to conventicles and then informing against the preachers, led the way. Bedloe, a noted swindler, followed; and soon from all the brothels, gambling houses, and spunging houses of London, false witnesses poured forth to swear away the lives of Roman Catholics. One came with a story about an army of 30,000 men who were to muster in the disguise of pilgrims at Corunna and to sail thence to Wales. Another had been promised canonization and £500 to murder the king. A third had stepped into an eating house in Covent Garden, and had there heard a great Roman Catholic banker vow, in the hearing of all the guests and drawers, to kill the heretical tyrant. Oates, that he might not be eclipsed by his imitators, soon added a large supplement to his original narrative. He had the portentous impudence to affirm, among other things, that he had once stood behind a door which was ajar, and had there overheard the queen declare that she had resolved to give her consent to the assassination of her husband. The vulgar believed and the highest magistrates pretended to believe even such fictions as these. The chief judges of the realm were corrupt, cruel, and timid. The leaders of the country party encouraged the prevailing delusion. The most respectable among them, indeed, were themselves so far deluded as to believe the greater part of the evidence of the plot to be true. Such men as Shaftesbury and Buckingham doubtless perceived that the whole was a romance. But it was a romance which served their turn; and to their seared consciences the death of an innocent man gave no more uneasiness than the death of a partridge. The juries partook of the feelings then common throughout the nation and were encouraged by the bench to indulge those feelings without restraint. The multitude applauded Oates and his confederates, hooted and pelted the witnesses who appeared on behalf of the accused, and shouted with joy when the verdict of guilty was pronounced.

This history, written with respect to an enlightened people, teaches us how far prejudice for a time may glow against the claims of justice. The man who created all that furor, who had succeeded in impressing the mind of the court, was afterward whipped at the cart's tail as an infamous scoundrel and villain who had sworn away the lives of his fellow-countrymen.

I say, Mr. President, when such grave accusations are brought forward here which impeach the character of your fellow-citizens in other portions of the Union, it is not proper in the Senate of the United States to let an accusation of that kind rest upon the simple statement of any one individual.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I move to lay the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts on the table.

Mr. DAWES. Why not take a vote on the resolution itself?

Mr. HARRIS. The motion is not debatable, Mr. President.

Mr. DAWES. I know; but I inquire of the Senator.

Mr. HARRIS. Because I choose to move to lay it on the table. That is the shortest method of getting rid of it, and one quite satisfactory to myself.

Mr. DAWES. Oh, take the test vote on the resolution itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to lay the pending resolution on the table.

Mr. HARRIS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BROWN, (when his name was called.) I am still paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. MILLER,] whom I do not see in his seat.

Mr. COKE, (when Mr. MAXEY's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.] I make the announcement now for the day.

Mr. MORRILL, (when his name was called.) I am paired to-day with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE.]

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) On another vote I announced the transfer of the pair between the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] and myself to the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.] The Senator from Kansas is now in his seat, and I shall not vote on this question on account of the pair.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to inquire if any pair with me has been announced?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. HAWLEY, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I voted inadvertently. I am paired with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES,] as I announced before. I ask that my vote be withdrawn.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. WALKER.]

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—23.

Bayard,	Gorman,	Johnston,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Groome,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Butler,	Grover,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,
Call,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Slater,
Cockrell,	Harris,	McPherson,	Vance.
Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	Morgan,

NAYS—27.

Anthony,	Dawes,	Ingalls,	Platt of Conn.,
Blair,	Edgerton,	Kellogg,	Platt of N. Y.,
Burnside,	Ferry,	Logan,	Rollins,
Cameron of Pa.,	Frye,	McDill,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hale,	McMillan,	Sewell,
Conger,	Harrison,	Mahone,	Sherman.
Conkling,	Hoar,	Mitchell,

ABSENT—26.

Allison,	Farley,	Maxey,	Van Wyck,
Brown,	Garland,	Miller,	Vest,

Davis of Illinois,	Hawley,	Plumb,	Walker,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Colorado,	Saulsbury,	Williams.
Edmunds,	Jackson,	Saunders,
Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Teller,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. After so decided a vote of the majority of this body against these dilatory motions, I hope we may have a vote on the resolution itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone the resolution indefinitely.

Mr. DAWES. I hope that will be withdrawn and a vote taken on the resolution.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON, (when his name was called.) I desire to state once for all to-day, that I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS,] and therefore refrain from voting.

Mr. BROWN, (when his name was called.) As stated on previous roll-calls, I am paired for the rest of the day with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK,] unless he should return to the Hall.

Mr. INGALLS, (when his name was called.) For the remainder of the day I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Mr. MORRILL, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE.] I shall not again repeat the announcement.

Mr. VEST, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CAMDEN. I wish to announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia] with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Bayard,	Farley,	Jackson,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Gorman,	Johnston,	Pugh,
Butler,	Groome,	Jonas,	Ransom,

Cameron of Wis.,	Hale,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Conger,	Harrison,	Miller,	Sewell,
Conkling,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Sherman.

ABSENT—21.

Allison,	Garland,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Brown,	George,	Morrill,	Walker,
Davis of Illinois,	Hawley,	Plumb,	Williams.
Davis of West Va.,	Hill of Colorado,	Teller,
Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Van Wyck,
Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Vest,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, the Senate has accomplished so little in the last few weeks that in the hope that we may get on with the public business more rapidly than we have done, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at nine o'clock to-morrow morning, and upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at nine o'clock to-morrow morning, and upon that motion he asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SLATER. I move to amend the motion by inserting "ten" instead of "nine" and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon, upon which he calls for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BECK. Before these votes are taken, assuming that the Senator from Massachusetts is determined to make us sit to-night all night, as I hope he will, to test how much endurance there is on this side, as the Senator from Pennsylvania has been endeavoring for two weeks to see whether we will or not endure, and ten o'clock coming very early if we sit till five or six, I move to amend by making the hour "eleven," and on that I call for the years and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is not in order.

Mr. BECK. I think the amendment is in order.

Mr. DAWES. Is the question debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that it is in order. The Senator from Kentucky moves to amend the amendment of the Senator from Oregon by making the hour of meeting to-morrow eleven o'clock, and on that motion the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken resulted—yeas 27, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Bayard,	Camden,	Gorman,	Harris.
Beck,	Cockrell,	Groome,	Hill of Georgia,
Butler,	Coke,	Grover,	Jackson,
Call,	Farley,	Hampton,	Johnston,

Jonas,	McPherson,	Pugh,	Slater,
Jones of Florida,	Morgan,	Ransom,	Vance.
Lamar,	Pendleton,	Saulsbury,

NAYS—28.

Anthony,	Dawes,	Kellogg,	Platt of Conn.,
Blair,	Edgerton,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Burnside,	Ferry,	McDill,	Rollins,
Cameron of Pa.,	Frye,	McMillan,	Saunders,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hale,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Conger,	Harrison,	Miller,	Sewell,
Conkling,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Sherman.

ABSENT—21.

Allison,	Garland,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Brown,	George,	Morrill,	Walker,
Davis of Illinois,	Hawley,	Plumb,	Williams.
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Colorado,	Teller,
Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Van Wyck,
Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Vest,

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.]

Mr. GROOME. Mr. President, the question being now in the second degree, I move to amend the amendment by making the time of meeting 11.45 to-morrow, and on that I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland moves to amend the amendment of the Senator from Oregon by substituting the hour of "11.45" for "10" as the hour to which the Senate shall adjourn.

Mr. HOAR. Is that motion debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it is not.

Mr. DAWES. I hope there will be no objection to my making an inquiry of the other side. If we can come to some arrangement as to the time when we shall take the vote on this resolution, I shall be very glad to accommodate the gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Massachusetts will have no difficulty if he will postpone the consideration of the resolution until next December, I imagine, in arriving at a conclusion.

Mr. DAWES. I might be willing, but the majority of the Senate seem to be otherwise. I would inquire of the Senator if he does not think we can come to some arrangement to dispose of it to-night, and then not meet so early in the morning?

Mr. COCKRELL. Postpone it until December, and you will have no trouble.

Mr. DAWES. The majority of the Senate have decided over and over again that they will not do that.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us go on and try.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GROOME] to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. SLATER,] that when the Senate adjourns it be to meet to-morrow at 11.45 o'clock, upon which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAWES. If Senators think we could take the vote in that fifteen minutes to-morrow morning, I should be very glad to agree with them.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 27, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Bayard,	Farley,	Jackson,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Gorman,	Johnston,	Pugh,
Butler,	Groome,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Call,	Grover,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,
Camden,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Slater,
Cockrell,	Harris,	McPherson,	Vance.
Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	Morgan,

NAYS—28.

Anthony,	Dawes,	Kellogg,	Platt of Conn.,
Blair,	Edgerton,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Burnside,	Ferry,	McDill,	Rollins,
Cameron of Pa.,	Frye,	McMillan,	Saunders,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hale,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Conger,	Harrison,	Miller,	Sewell,
Conkling,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Sherman.

ABSENT—21.

Allison,	Garland,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Brown,	George,	Morrill,	Walker,
Davis of Illinois,	Hawley,	Plumb,	Williams.
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Colorado,	Teller,
Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Van Wyck,
Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Vest,

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, in response to a question that was asked by the Senator from Massachusetts a few minutes ago in relation to the time when the vote might be taken upon this resolution, I make to him the suggestion that we now go to the actual business before the Senate, the business of considering the names that are sent to us, and after we shall have cleared the table and done the business which the country is waiting for, we can determine when we will take a vote on this resolution. I therefore, and I hope with his concurrence, move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me in order——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not in order.

Mr. HARRIS. The motion is certainly in order under Rule 43:

When a question is pending no motion shall be received but—
To adjourn,
To adjourn to a day certain, or that, when the Senate adjourn, it shall be to a day certain,
To take a recess,
To proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending motion is one relating to adjournment, and it has precedence of the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator's motion is not now in order.

Mr. HARRIS. It may not be in order pending the motion to adjourn to an hour certain to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the motion pending, which by the rules of the Senate takes precedence.

Mr. HARRIS. I had forgotten that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] by substituting as the hour of meeting to-morrow ten o'clock for nine o'clock.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to respond to the Senator from Ohio in the hope that we may come to some understanding. I reciprocate——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. DAWES. I reciprocate the patriotic sentiment which has just been enunciated——

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to interrupt the gentleman to say that the rules of order cut off my motion, and therefore debate is out of order upon it.

Mr. INGALLS. One moment on the question of order. The ruling of the Chair is incorrect. The motion was in order and could be properly made by the Senator from Ohio. The only question is one of precedence as to which motion should be first submitted.

Mr. BAYARD. The question of precedence is a question of order.

Mr. INGALLS. It is a question of priority in submitting the motions to the Senate.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the Senator from Ohio will not lose sight of his desire to proceed to the actual business before the Senate as soon as the pending motion is out of the way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] to amend the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] so that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet to-morrow at ten o'clock, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 27, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Bayard,	Farley,	Jackson,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Gorman,	Johnston,	Pugh,
Butler,	Groome,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Call,	Grover,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,
Camden,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Slater,
Coke,	Harris,	McPherson,	Vance.
Cockrell,	Hill of Georgia,	Morgan,

NAYS—28.

Anthony,	Dawes,	Kellogg,	Platt of Conn.,
Blair,	Edgerton,	Logan,	Platt of, N. Y.,
Burnside,	Ferry,	McDill,	Rollins,
Cameron of Pa.,	Frye,	McMillan,	Saunders,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hale,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Conger,	Harrison,	Miller,	Sewell,
Conkling,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Sherman.

ABSENT—21.

Allison,	Garland,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Brown,	George,	Morrill,	Walker,
Davis of Illinois,	Hawley,	Plumb,	Williams.
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Colorado,	Teller,
Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Van Wyck,
Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Vest,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet to-morrow at nine o'clock, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 27, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Bayard,	Farley,	Jackson,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Gorman,	Johnston,	Pugh,
Butler,	Groome,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Call,	Grover,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,
Camden,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Slater,
Cockrell,	Harris,	McPherson,	Vance.
Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	Morgan,

NAYS—28.

Anthony,	Dawes,	Kellogg,	Platt of Conn.,
Blair,	Edgerton,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Burnside,	Ferry,	McDill,	Rollins,
Cameron of Pa.,	Frye,	McMillan,	Saunders,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hale,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Conger,	Harrison,	Miller,	Sewell,
Conkling,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Sherman.

ABSENT—21.

Allison,	Davis of Illinois,	Edmunds,	Garland,
Brown,	Davis of W. Va.,	Fair,	George,

Hawley	Maxey,	Van Wyck,	Williams.
Hill of Colorado,	Morrill,	Vest,
Ingalls,	Plumb,	Voorhees,
Jones of Nevada.	Teller,	Walker,

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to lay the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts and all proceedings upon the table.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator withdraw that motion? I want to read one or two democratic speeches, and he will wish to hear them.

Mr. COCKRELL. There will be plenty of time for that before we get through.

Mr. HOAR. All right.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the yeas and nays on my motion to lay on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri moves to lay the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts and all pending proceedings upon the table, upon which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRIS. Pending that motion, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GROOME. As there seems to be no probability that the public business for which we were called together can be transacted in the present temper of the Senate, I move that the Senate take a recess until noon this day two weeks; and upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Pending the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GROOME] moves that the Senate take a recess of two weeks, upon which motion the yeas and nays are demanded.

Mr. HOAR. Is the motion to take a recess debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it is not.

Mr. HARRIS. It is not debatable under the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. GROOME. Rule 43 settles that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon the motion the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. COCKRELL. Pending this motion, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet to-morrow at 11.30 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL,] that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet to-morrow at 11.30 o'clock.

Mr. COCKRELL. I believe that is a debatable motion; and I hope that the Senator from Massachusetts will vote for it, as he wants to attend the exhibition going on.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator refer to me?

Mr. COCKRELL. No, to the other Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I think the exhibition made by the democratic Senators is better than the circus. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is not in order. Pending the motion to take a recess for two weeks, the Senator from Missouri moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet to-morrow morning at 11.30 o'clock, upon which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOAR. That motion cannot be in order.

Mr. HARRIS. I move to amend the motion of the Senator from Missouri by striking out "11.30" and inserting "eleven."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to amend is not in order. The question must first be taken upon the longest time.

Mr. HARRIS. So it may, but the amendment is in order pending the longer time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair decides otherwise.

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is to adjourn for the longer time, and the shorter time as an amendment cannot be in order. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MILLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. FARLEY.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 25, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Bayard,	Gorman,	Johnston,	Ransom,
Beck,	Groome,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Butler,	Grover,	Lamar,	Slater,
Call,	Hampton,	McPherson,	Vance.
Camden,	Harris,	Morgan,
Cockrell,	Hill of Georgia,	Pendleton,
Coke,	Jackson,	Pugh,

NAYS—27.

Anthony,	Dawes,	Kellogg,	Platt of N. Y.,
Blair,	Edgerton,	Logan,	Rollins,
Burnside,	Ferry,	McDill,	Saunders,
Cameron of Pa.,	Frye,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hale,	Mahone,	Sewell,
Conger,	Harrison,	Mitchell,	Sherman.
Conkling,	Hoar,	Platt of Conn.,

ABSENT—24.

Allison,	Farley,	Jones of Florida,	Teller,
Brown,	Garland,	Jones of Nevada,	Van Wyck,
Davis of Illinois,	George,	Maxey,	Vest,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hawley,	Miller,	Voorhees,
Edmunds,	Hill of Colorado,	Morrill,	Walker,
Fair,	Ingalls,	Plumb,	Williams.

So the motion was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GROOME] to take a recess for two weeks.

Mr. GROOME. As I find that several democratic Senators have not yet abandoned the hope that if we remain in continuous session our republican brethren within two weeks will agree to proceed to the consideration of executive business——

Mr. HOAR. Is the question debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not.

Mr. GROOME. And as I think my motion is more likely to delay than expedite the public business, I ask leave to withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland cannot withdraw the motion, the yeas and nays having been ordered.

Mr. HARRIS. By unanimous consent the motion can be withdrawn.

Mr. GROOME. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the motion.

Mr. LOGAN. I object.

Mr. DAWES. I hope unanimous consent will be given to withdraw all dilatory motions. I should like to know who objects.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Illinois objects.

Mr. GROOME. Then I ask Senators to join me in voting down the motion.

Mr. LOGAN. In voting your own motion down?

Mr. GROOME. I do.

Mr. DAWES. I hope no Senators will object to the withdrawal of these dilatory motions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois objects. The roll will be called on the motion of the Senator from Maryland, that the Senate take a recess for two weeks.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when Mr. BUTLER'S name was called.) The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] is paired with me on all these votes.

Mr. VEST, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] but have transferred it for the present to the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMPTON.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 2, nays 47; as follows:

YEAS—2.

Camden,	Vance.

NAYS—47.

Anthony,	Edgerton,	Jonas,	Platt of Conn.,
Bayard,	Ferry,	Jones of Florida,	Platt of N. Y.,
Beck,	Frye,	Kellogg,	Ransom,
Blair,	Gorman,	Lamar,	Rollins,
Burnside,	Groome,	Logan,	Saulsbury,
Call,	Grover,	McDill,	Saunders,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hale,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Cockrell,	Harris,	McPherson,	Sewell,
Coke,	Harrison,	Mahone,	Sherman,
Conger,	Hill of Georgia,	Mitchell,	Slater,
Conkling,	Hoar,	Morgan,	Vest.
Dawes,	Jackson,	Pendleton,

ABSENT—27.

Allison,	Fair,	Ingalls,	Pugh,
Brown,	Farley,	Johnston,	Teller,
Butler,	Garland,	Jones of Nevada,	Van Wyck.
Cameron of Pa.,	George,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Davis of Illinois,	Hampton,	Miller,	Walker,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Williams.
Edmunds,	Hill of Colorado,	Plumb,

So the motion was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. VEST, (when Mr. HAMPTON'S name was called.) The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] is paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.]

Mr. MILLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. FARLEY.]

Mr. WALKER, (when his name was called.) My colleague [Mr. GARLAND] is paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] I am paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. HILL.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. On this question I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.] If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Bayard,	Groome,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Call,	Grover,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,
Camden,	Harris,	Lamar,	Saulsbury,
Cockrell,	Hill of Georgia,	McPherson,	Slater,
Coke,	Jackson,	Morgan,	Vance,
Gorman,	Johnston,	Pendleton,	Vest.

NAYS—25.

Anthony,	Edgerton,	McDill,	Saunders,
Blair,	Ferry,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Burnside,	Frye,	Mahone,	Sewell,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	Mitchell,	Sherman.
Conger,	Hoar,	Platt of Conn.,
Conkling,	Kellogg,	Platt of N. Y.,
Dawes,	Logan,	Rollins,

ABSENT—27.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Hawley,	Plumb,
Beck,	Fair,	Hill of Colorado,	Teller,
Brown,	Farley,	Ingalls,	Van Wyck,
Butler,	Garland,	Jones of Nevada,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Pa.,	George,	Maxey,	Walker,
Davis of Illinois,	Hale,	Miller,	Williams.
Davis of W. Va.,	Hampton,	Morrill,

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to lay the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] and all pending proceedings on the table, upon which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HOAR. How can that motion be in order? I object——

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Pending which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] moves that the Senate adjourn. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.] Were he present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. VEST, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BECK. I am paired on all questions with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Bayard,	Groome,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Call,	Grover,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,
Camden,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Slater,
Cockrell,	Harris,	McPherson,	Vance.
Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	Morgan,
Farley,	Jackson,	Pendleton,
Gorman,	Johnston,	Pugh,

NAYS—26.

Anthony,	Edgerton,	McDill,	Rollins,
Blair,	Ferry,	McMillan,	Saunders,
Burnside,	Frye,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	Miller,	Sewell,
Conger,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Sherman.
Conkling,	Kellogg,	Platt of Conn.,
Dawes,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,

ABSENT—25.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Vest,
Beck,	Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Voorhees,
Brown,	Garland,	Maxey,	Walker,
Butler,	George,	Morrill,	Williams.
Cameron of Pa.,	Hale,	Plumb,
Davis of Illinois,	Hawley,	Teller,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Colorado,	Van Wyck,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. PENDLETON. I notice that my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] voted "nay" on the motion to adjourn. I take this as an evidence, however slight, that he intends to abandon his ways of obstruction to the public business; and in order that I may meet him half way and encourage him in that laudable disposition, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt as to the result.

Mr. HARRIS and Mr. ROLLINS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when the name of Mr. BUTLER was called.) I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 25, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Bayard,	Groome,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Call,	Grover,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,
Camden,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Slater,
Cockrell,	Harris,	McPherson,	Vance.
Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	Morgan,
Farley,	Jackson,	Pendleton,
Gorman,	Johnston,	Pugh,

NAYS—26.

Anthony,	Cameron of Wis.,	Dawes,	Frye,
Blair,	Conger,	Edgerton,	Harrison,
Burnside,	Conkling,	Ferry,	Hoar,
Kellogg,	Mahone,	Platt of N. Y.,	Sewell,
Logan,	Miller,	Rollins,	Sherman.
McDill,	Mitchell,	Saunders,
McMillan,	Platt of Conn.,	Sawyer,

ABSENT—25.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Vest,
Beck,	Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Voorhees,
Brown,	Garland,	Maxey,	Walker,
Butler,	George,	Morrill,	Williams.
Cameron of Pa.,	Hale,	Plumb,
Davis of Illinois,	Hawley,	Teller,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Colorado,	Van Wyck,

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to lay the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] and all pending proceedings on the table.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order. We cannot lay more than one thing on the table at a time. The motion to lay all pending proceedings on the table is out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are no pending proceedings but the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. HOAR. There are half a dozen resolutions introduced by my colleague, and they are all pending of necessity.

Mr. DAWES. While the suggestion of my colleague is correct, in point of fact there are no pending proceedings except the motion to lay on the table, as I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion was made in the form in which the Chair has stated it.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the point of order raised by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR?]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The junior Senator from Massachusetts raises the point of order that the motion of the Senator from Missouri to lay the resolution of the senior Senator from Massachusetts and all pending proceedings on the table is out of order, the latter clause being surplusage.

Mr. COCKRELL. If it is surplusage and does not mean anything, it cannot be out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules it out of order, and will put the question on the motion of the Senator from Missouri to lay the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts on the table, upon which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.] If he were here, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 24, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Bayard,	Groome,	Johnston,	Pendleton,
Call,	Grover,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Camden,	Hampton,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,
Coke,	Harris,	Lamar,	Saulsbury
Farley,	Hill of Georgia,	McPherson,	Slater,
Gorman,	Jackson,	Morgan,	Vance.

NAYS—26.

Anthony,	Edgerton,	McDill,	Rollins,
Blair,	Ferry,	McMillan,	Saunders,
Burnside,	Frye,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	Miller,	Sewell,
Conger,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Sherman.
Conkling,	Kellogg,	Platt of Conn.,
Dawes,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,

ABSENT—26.

Allison,	Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Colorado,	Van Wyck,
Beck,	Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Vest,
Brown,	Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Voorhees,
Butler,	Garland,	Maxey,	Walker,
Cameron of Pa.,	George,	Morrill,	Williams.
Cockrell,	Hale,	Plumb,
Davis of Illinois,	Hawley,	Teller,

So the Senate refused to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. DAWES. The Senate has now decided by a majority that it will not lay aside the resolution pending before it for the transaction of other business. It has also decided upon a test vote that it will not reject the resolution. Further resistance to it, therefore, becomes resistance to the will of the majority. I desire to call the attention of the Senate and of those who are thus obstructing public business by resistance to the will of the majority to the fact that it is the old struggle in which they have been engaged before, and in which they lost. The will of the majority in this matter must prevail. Whatever that will, honestly and fairly expressed, it is the law to which all good citizens must bow.

I trust that we shall come here to-morrow forgetting all differences and resolve solely to conform to the known and expressed will of the majority of this body, and no longer any portion of us obstruct the regular order of public business and the government of that order by the majority. I hope we shall come prepared to stay here to-morrow until we shall have accomplished that fact and illustrated to the country that this great body, the Senate of the United States, will no longer set the example of factious resistance to a majority.

I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BECK. I knew all day that the Senator wanted to go to the circus. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 5, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

DEATH OF THE CZAR OF RUSSIA.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 4, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the information of the Senate, a copy of the response of the Russian Government to the communication made to it, by the United States minister at St. Petersburg, of the Senate resolution of the 15th ultimo on the death of the late Emperor Alexander II.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES G. BLAINE.

Hon. CHESTER A. ARTHUR, &c., &c., &c.,
President of the Senate.

[Inclosure.]

Mr. De Giers to Mr. Foster.

ST. PETERSBURG, March 5, (o. s.,) 1881.
[March 17, 1881.]

[Translation.]

ST. PETERSBURG, March 5, 1881.

SIR: I have submitted to His Majesty the Emperor the letter you addressed to me in order to transmit to me the vote of the Senate of the United States of America on the occasion of the horrible crime under which has fallen the benefactor-sovereign whom all Russia weeps for to-day.

My august master has been profoundly touched by this mark of respect for his beloved father, and of sympathy with himself, coming from the high assembly of a country for which the deceased emperor always professed a sincere esteem and warm friendship. It is a legacy which he leaves to the Emperor Alexander III, and which his majesty, in accord with the Russian nation, accepts from the bottom of his heart.

Will you, sir, give this assurance to the Senate of the United States, while transmitting to it the thanks of my august master.

Receive at the same time, &c., &c.,

GIERS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the communication lie on the table and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, it was Ordered, That William C. Dodge be allowed to withdraw the papers in his claim from the files of the Senate.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday's session, being the resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] providing for the election of certain officers of the Senate, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone the resolution indefinitely, on which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The Chair is unable to decide as to the result.

Mr. ROLLINS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) On this subject I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. ROLLINS, (when Mr. CONKLING's name was called.) The Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] is paired with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES.]

Mr. FARLEY, (when Mr. FAIR's name was called.) The Senator from Nevada [Mr. FAIR] is paired with his colleague, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. MORRILL, (when Mr. GARLAND's name was called.) The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] is paired with my colleague, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. HARRIS, (when his name was called.) Yesterday I agreed to pair with the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] being confined to his home by indisposition, I have transferred the pair for the day to the Senator from Indiana. I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. COKE, (when Mr. MAXEY's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea." I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. FARLEY, (when Mr. MILLER's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. MILLER] has just sent word to me asking me to pair with him. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) The pair which has been existing between the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] and myself has been transferred for the present to the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE.] I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. BECK. I desire to say that that transfer is not made with the consent of my colleague. He referred to me all matters of transfers of that kind; and while the Senator from Nebraska has a right to vote if he likes, I protest against the transfer of that pair in that way.

Mr. ROLLINS. Does the Senator from Kentucky object? We transferred certainly one pair this morning for the accommodation of our friends on that side.

Mr. MAHONE entered the Chamber.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] is present, and there is no occasion for a transfer.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I withdraw my vote. I announce the withdrawal of the pair between the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] and will not vote, leaving my pair to stand with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 26, nays 30; as follows:

So the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. McPHERSON. I ask the privilege of presenting a petition of certain citizens of New Jersey and New York, which I should like to have read by the Secretary——

Mr. HOAR. I object.

Mr. McPHERSON. And referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOAR. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. McPHERSON. Do I understand the Senator to object to the presentation of a petition?

Mr. HOAR. What the Senator understands he knows himself. I object.

Mr. HARRIS. I suppose the propriety of receiving the petition depends altogether upon its character. If it be in respect to executive business, I should think it would be in order to receive it; if it be upon a legislative subject, it would not be in order.

Mr. HOAR. What is the pending question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone indefinitely the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. McPHERSON. I have not yet yielded the floor. This is the first time I have ever known the right of petition to be denied here.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey has the floor.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator from Massachusetts, I understand, objects to the presentation of a simple petition on the part of certain citizens of New Jersey and New York, calling attention to the fact that an American citizen is in confinement in a foreign country without process of law or right; and it is simply the desire of the petitioners to call the attention of the Congress of the United States to that question:

Whereas one Michael Boyton, a citizen of the United States, has been arrested and thrown into prison by the British Government on vague charges of inciting to crime and violence; and

Whereas the said Michael Boyton has been denied the right guaranteed even to British subjects, the right to a trial before a jury of his peers:

Resolved, That we, as American citizens, call upon our representatives in Congress to demand that the United States Government interfere for his protection.

That is the petition in the form of resolutions of the bodies sending it here. It is signed by members of certain land leagues, two or three in the State of New Jersey and two or three, I think, in the State of New York. Does the honorable Senator still object to the presentation and reference of the petition?

Mr. HOAR. I will say to the Senator that the Senate desires to elect an officer to record all the business, and has manifested its desire repeatedly to do so. As soon as that thing is disposed of, which can be done in five minutes, this petition can be received. The Senator is the person who by filibustering prevents the doing of this business.

Mr. McPHERSON. I should like to ask the honorable Senator from Massachusetts if there is not a recording officer already who can take cognizance of this fact? Is there any lack of officers of the Senate to record the business of the session?

Mr. HOAR. The difference between the Senator and me is this: I think that is a thing to be determined by the Senate; the Senator thinks that the thing is to be determined in violation of the Constitution of the United States by a minority of the Senate. The Senate has decided that question. If the Senator will submit to permit the Senate to proceed to its business, the petition can be reached in five minutes.

Mr. McPHERSON. I do not understand that my action is in violation of the Constitution of the United States. I believe the Constitution of the United States recognizes the rights of minorities and protects them. I believe the rules of the Senate were arranged, organized, and passed by the Senate for the purpose of protecting legislation.

Mr. President, under the rules I submit a petition signed by certain citizens of New Jersey and certain citizens of the State of New York calling attention to the fact that a citizen of the United States is held in a foreign prison contrary to law, contrary to justice; and the honorable Senator from Massachusetts refuses to have that petition considered. I asked the Senate to allow the petition to be read from the Secretary's desk in order that Senators might understand its true import and meaning. Then I asked that the matter of the petition might be referred to any appropriate committee of the Senate. The committees have been formed; we are all ready, so far as I know, to consider any subject-matter that may properly be brought before the attention of the Senate; and the honorable Senator from Massachusetts rises in his place and declares that even the case of this poor citizen who is held in prison in the British realm, as I said before, contrary to law and justice, shall not be considered until it pleases the majority upon that side of the Chamber to first disorganize this Senate and then proceed to reorganize it, that we may have somebody to record the fact that these land-leagues have petitioned the Congress of the United States for justice to one of their own number and an American citizen. This is the strangest proceeding that I have yet seen in these most singular of all proceedings that have been going on in this Chamber for the past two weeks.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, what is the question before the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that the petition cannot be received, objection being made, except by a vote of the Senate. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone the resolution before the Senate indefinitely, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. DAWES. I hope we shall take a vote on that question and proceed to the business before the Senate.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAWES. The Senate has decided that it will not do that, over and over again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. PENDLETON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. Pending that motion, as the Senator from Massachusetts says the Senate has refused to go into executive session, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. They have refused to adjourn, too.

Mr. COCKRELL. But I think you will all consent to that motion yet.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL,] that the Senate adjourn. [Putting the question.] The Chair is unable to decide as to the result.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS, (when his name was called.) I announce once for all, for the day, that the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] by a transfer. I vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 29, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Bayard,	Farley,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Slater,
Butler,	Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Vance,
Call,	Grover,	McPherson,	Vest,
Camden,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Walker.
Cockrell,	Harris,	Pendleton,
Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	Pugh,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jackson,	Ransom,

NAYS—32.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Kellogg,	Platt of Conn.,
Anthony,	Ferry,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Blair,	Frye,	McDill,	Plumb,
Burnside,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Rollins,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hawley,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Colorado,	Miller,	Sewell,
Conger,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Sherman,
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Morrill,	Van Wyck.

ABSENT—15.

Beck,	Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Teller,
Conkling,	Garland,	Lamar,	Voorhees,
Davis of Illinois,	George,	Maxey,	Williams.
Edmunds,	Hale,	Saunders,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TELLER, (when his name was called.) On this question and on all others of a similar character I am paired with the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY.] I make this announcement now, and will not repeat it during the day.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 28, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—28.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Georgia,	Pugh,
Brown,	Farley,	Jackson,	Ransom,
Butler,	Gorman,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,
Call,	Groome,	Jonas,	Slater,
Camden,	Grover,	Jones of Florida,	Vance,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Vest,
Coke,	Harris,	Pendleton,	Walker.

NAYS—32.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Kellogg,	Platt of Conn.,
Anthony,	Ferry,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Blair,	Frye,	McDill,	Plumb,
Burnside,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Rollins,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hawley,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Colorado,	Miller,	Sewell,
Conger,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Sherman,
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Morrill,	Van Wyck.

ABSENT—16.

Beck,	Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,
Conkling,	Garland,	Lamar,	Teller,
Davis of Illinois,	George,	McPherson,	Voorhees,
Edmunds,	Hale,	Maxey,	Williams.

So the motion was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone the pending resolution indefinitely, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. What was the ruling on the petition offered by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. McPHERSON?]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition was not received, the Chair deciding that there being objection it could not be received except by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. Then would not the question be whether the Senate shall vote on the petition being received?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No motion was made to receive the petition. The Chair understood that the Senator from New Jersey withdrew the request for its reception and reference.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator from New Jersey did not withdraw the request. The Senator understood the Chair to rule the petition to be out of order, objection having been made by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair decided that the petition could not be received except by a vote of the Senate, when the Senate should so order.

Mr. McPHERSON. That being the case, while I have no disposition to press the matter further to-day for reasons personal to myself, it seeming to be the desire of the Senate that this matter should be brought up for consideration and decision at the present time, I again offer the petition, and ask that it be received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DAWES. What is the business before the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone indefinitely the pending resolution, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. DAWES. That is the business before the Senate, is it?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is the business before the Senate.

Mr. DAWES. I call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey asks consent for the reception of the petition which has been read by him.

Mr. HOAR. Does he move to lay aside the regular order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition can only be received by laying aside the regular order.

Mr. McPHERSON. Then I move to lay aside the regular order for the purpose of presenting the petition submitted by me this morning.

Mr. INGALLS. That motion cannot be made under the rule. If the Chair will consult Rule 43 he will see what motions can be made while a question is pending.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair decides the point of order well taken.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that he move to lay aside the pending order.

Mr. INGALLS. That motion is not in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair decides that that motion is not in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. A motion to postpone would be in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone indefinitely the pending resolution.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I do not exactly understand the ruling of the Chair. Do I understand the Chair to rule that no motion is in order to lay aside or to postpone the pending resolution?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will have Rule 43 read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

When a question is pending no motion shall be received but—
To adjourn,
To adjourn to a day certain, or that, when the Senate adjourn, it shall be to a day certain,
To take a recess,
To proceed to the consideration of executive business,
To lay on the table,
To postpone indefinitely,
To postpone to a day certain,
To commit,
To amend;
which several motions shall have precedence in the order in which they stand arranged; and the motions relating to adjournment, to take a recess, to proceed to executive business, and to lay on the table, shall be decided without debate.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I now move that the pending resolution be postponed until to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

Mr. DAWES. Which motion has precedence? I call the attention of the Chair to the rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion to postpone indefinitely has precedence, and that is the pending question. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone the pending resolution indefinitely, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Pending that motion, I move to lay the whole matter upon the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey moves that the pending resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. MCPHERSON. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FARLEY, (when Mr. FAIR's name was called.) I am requested by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. FAIR] to announce that he is paired for the day with his colleague, [Mr. JONES.] I make the announcement now so that I shall not have to renew it.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 29, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Bayard,	Farley,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Slater,
Butler,	Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Vance,
Call,	Grover,	McPherson,	Vest,
Camden,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Walker.
Cockrell,	Harris,	Pendleton,
Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	Pugh,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jackson,	Ransom,

NAYS—32.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Kellogg,	Platt of Conn.,
Anthony,	Ferry,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Blair,	Frye,	McDill,	Plumb,
Burnside,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Rollins,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hawley,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Colorado,	Miller,	Sewell,
Conger,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Sherman,
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Morrill,	Van Wyck.

ABSENT—15.

Beck,	Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Teller,
Conkling,	Garland,	Lamar,	Voorhees,
Davis of Illinois,	George,	Maxey,	Williams.
Edmunds,	Hale,	Saunders,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I wish to give notice, sir, that to-morrow morning under the rules it is my intention to offer this petition in order that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts may be able to state to the country the reasons which actuate him in preventing justice to an Irish-American citizen held in durance vile in an English prison without warrant of law, unjustly, and interposes as a reason for it that the majority of the Senate desire that the Senate should be reorganized. In other words, this man must remain in prison until such time as Mr. Gorham and Mr. Riddleberger are elected as officers of the Senate. It is impossible to proceed with business, it is impossible for a committee of the Senate which has already been organized, is ready for business, to consider this poor man's claim until Mr. Gorham and Mr. Riddleberger have been elected to their respective stations in the Senate. I hope the honorable Senator will be prepared to state to the Senate and to the country exactly his position upon that question and justify it, if he can.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I give notice——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator will suspend to allow the Chair to receive a message from the President of the United States.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I give notice of a purpose to take up that petition a good deal earlier than the time fixed by the Senator from New Jersey. I am astonished that he should keep the American citizens waiting till to-morrow morning. I give notice that to-day, as soon as we have acted upon the pending resolution, which need not take five minutes, I will ask the Senate to take up this matter. This pretense that the delay till to-morrow is our doing is the merest and sheerest piece of humbug and demagogy.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I tell the Senator from Massachusetts that we shall not act on this resolution to-day, and he knows it.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If there was any ground whatever upon which the Senator from Massachusetts could stand, he might possibly have some excuse for such an argument, but there is not the least. The Senate is already organized; we have an efficient Secretary to record the action of the Senate; we have the Committee on Foreign Relations already organized and waiting for some matters to reach them through the channel of the Senate, and for the honorable Senator from Massachusetts to say that there is any necessity for further action before this man's claim can be considered is an absurd proposition.

Mr. HOAR. I understand, Mr. President, to be serious for a moment, that the Department of State has already taken this matter in hand, and that the action of the American Government will be made known long before the tardy and limping sympathy of the Senator from New Jersey gets around.

Mr. PENDLETON. I give notice that I want all these irrelevant matters now to stop; and therefore I move that we proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. HARRIS and others called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 29, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Bayard,	Farley,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Slater,
Butler,	Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Vance,
Call,	Grover,	McPherson,	Vest,
Camden,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Walker.
Cockrell,	Harris,	Pendleton,
Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	Pugh,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jackson,	Ransom,

NAYS—32.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Kellogg,	Platt of Conn.,
Anthony,	Ferry,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,

Beck,	Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Teller,
Conkling,	Garland,	Lamar,	Voorhees,

Edmunds,	Hale,	Saunders,

So the motion was not agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone the pending resolution indefinitely, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the people of the United States witness the unusual spectacle of a Senate evenly divided between the political parties. There is in this fact, considering that it is a political division, something that is very ominous to the future of this country. The fact is we shall not be able to disguise it from ourselves, that this contest is but the initial point in many of a similar character that must occur hereafter during this Congress unless the temper of the Senate on both sides shall be altered. Hitherto I have not participated in this debate, and I have scarcely made a motion now for a month having any reference to the question in hand. My purpose has been to give to this matter an impartial, fair, just, and cool consideration, for it has occurred to me that this matter being presented in this form for the first time, it becomes a matter of the utmost importance that it should be considered wisely and gravely by Senators on both sides of this Chamber.

I can very well understand how if the spirit that pervades the Senate to-day is to continue for another two years we may find ourselves in the presence of difficulties of the most serious character relating to all the different, varied, and important duties of the Senate of the United States; and I cannot understand by what power this difficulty is to be removed otherwise than by a just and honorable consideration of all questions as they may arise relating to the welfare of the country.

It is not an absolute certainty, considering the ways of Providence toward us, that the Senate of the United States will be in possession of the constitutional means of unlocking its difficulties for two years to come, and of having the casting vote given by the officer who now presides over it. In such an unfortunate event as his death, or in the unexpected event of his resignation, or in the probable event of his absence from the Senate, it may be from sickness or from the necessities of private business, the Senate of the United States would find itself thirty-eight Senators on one side and thirty-eight on another, arrayed according to the existing political conditions and without the power to elect a presiding officer.

What would be the condition of the people of the United States, to say nothing of the condition of this august body, if either of the events should occur to which I have alluded, and it should become impossible for the Senate to elect its presiding officer without the one party or the other abandoning some of the ground that has been taken for the past month? And in such an event the question would arise who will give way? Who will show the disposition to serve the country patriotically by giving up a mere question of party predominance in the Senate and assisting, as duty would require, in the execution of those high constitutional purposes and powers for which this body was ordained? Senators who look upon this matter lightly and regard it as a mere exploit for the purpose of gaining a temporary political advantage here or in one of the States of this Union undervalue the question and undervalue their responsibilities to the American people.

Until this morning I had not fully appreciated, or rather I had not fully realized the true measure of the situation. Until this morning I had not become thoroughly convinced that it was the intention of those gentlemen who claim to have a majority of this body to press the power of that majority in every emergency and under all conditions and in every event, so as to cut off not merely the balance of the Senate from discharging its constitutional duty for which it was assembled here, but also to cut off the privileges of the American people, it makes no difference how sacred they may be.

The point was presented this morning, Mr. President, that there is no guarantee in the Constitution of the United States in favor of the humblest and most down-trodden citizen of our country that is worthy of consideration against the power of a majority which, in its imperious demands, claims that it shall ride down all that opposes it. We have the stigma of treason put upon us because in days that are past during this debate we have not seen proper to become the assisting parties to what we conceive to be a gross and an unmanly fraud. Whether that be so in fact or not, time must prove; but we believe it, and having that impression indelibly fixed upon our minds we have been taunted with treason to the Government of the United States because we dared to undertake on this floor to prevent its being carried into effect through our assistance and consent.

I will take a question just like it, if you please, in executive session; I will suppose that the President of the United States may have been a party to a scheme like that which has been laid before the Senate of the United States, and I will suppose that in the execution of that purpose he has made a nomination to this body which he asks us to advise and consent to as a part of the appointing power of this Government, who is it that will charge us with treason if believing as we do that the nomination would be a reward for a corrupt undertaking we should refuse to advise and consent to the confirmation?

Suppose it goes further than that and gets into legislation; it finds its way into bills introduced into the House and into the Senate, and laws are to be enacted here for the purpose of carrying into effect other parts of such a combination, are we to be taunted with treason if we do not give our consent to the enactment of laws like that? And yet those who charge us with this sort of treason, who seem to take a delight in making imputations upon the motives of gentlemen as worthy as they are, or some of them arise on this floor and interpose an objection to the receiving of a petition when a Senator states that it is in behalf of a naturalized American citizen who now languishes in a foreign prison under an unjust accusation and without the authority of law. If that be stalwartism, or if that be republicanism, it is not that sort of action provided for by the Constitution of the United States.

The first article of the amendments of the Constitution of the United States, adopted within two years after the time of the adoption of the original body of the instrument, reads as follows:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

And yet it seems that Congress is required here to remove something out of the way before a citizen of the United States can have the right to petition this body for the redress of grievances, and those grievances inflicted upon him by a powerful foreign government. What are we to do to give the right of petition virtually to our adopted citizens in the United States? Elect George C. Gorham Secretary of the Senate, and Mr. Riddleberger Sergeant-at-Arms of this body, and another person Chief Clerk, and so on, before the right of petition guaranteed under the first article of the amendments to the Constitution can be exercised in favor of a citizen whom we have invited here and made a citizen upon the pledge of his allegiance to this country, and of our protection. We must remove officers who are now in place and elect some others in their stead; and gentlemen who rise on the floor of the Senate and declaim in favor of liberty and freedom and right and justice, in favor of the negro population of this country, until we would suppose their hearts were going to melt in their bosoms, refuse to halt for a moment until a petition can be presented from citizens of New York and New Jersey in behalf of a foreign man who has been transferred to a British prison and pines there to-day, it is stated, without redress and without hope.

And, sir, if we are to stay here until December that man must suffer the pains of unjust imprisonment until December, and the hearts that burn and glow with love to the negro, who they say is cheated at the South, will not throb with one generous and manly impulse in favor of an American citizen incarcerated in a foreign prison.

I did not believe, sir, that party zeal and party demands could be pressed to that unworthy degree. I have been now four years in the Senate of the United States, and before this morning I have never heard it intimated that there was a man in this body who would interpose in his place to shut off the right of petition because he did not intend anything else to be done in the Senate until something was done to gratify his party preferences, to say nothing of satisfying his party contracts and party arrangements.

Here stands the great tribunal of the people, charged with the duty of defending the rights of millions of citizens of the United States; and this is proposed to be done, not by hearing their complaints, but how? By the election of men to office in this Senate because they have expressed false and uncandid sympathy for one race while the Senate is informed that an American citizen is languishing in a foreign prison. They refuse to relax their demand for a moment, and charge that men are unpatriotic who desire to have the action of the Senate upon a petition of this character.

This right of petition is one that has been very tenderly nursed, especially in the American Senate, since the adoption of the first amendment to the Constitution. Indeed nothing has been allowed to prevent its operation; and I have never yet heard on the floor of the Senate an objection made to the introduction of a petition. There were objections made in former times to the introduction of petitions in reference to the abolition of slavery; but the settled doctrine of the United States of America approved and acquiesced in by all people now, in which a celebrated gentleman from Massachusetts in the House of Representatives led, is that the right of petition was sacred, and that whatever you did with the petition after it got here you were bound to receive it. In the ordination of rules for the government of this body, the very first business after the reading of the Journal in the morning hour is that the President of the Senate is required to consider the presentation of petitions. Here stands the rule that has prevailed in this Senate for a great many years without modification or alteration in any respect, requiring the presiding officer of this body to receive petitions and to have them referred to the proper committees.

Now, it is asserted that in this extraordinary session of the Senate a petition cannot be received except by a vote of the Senate. The right of petition ceases to be a constitutional right; the right of a Senator to get up here and present a petition, stating its contents for the information of the Senate, is one that it appears is now dependent not upon the Constitution and its direct guarantee, but it is dependent upon the will of the Senate as it may happen to express itself at the moment. Ah, how degenerate have become these days, or else how degenerate have become the rights of American citizens under the auspices and under the control of those who set themselves up as the peculiar guardians of the liberties of the people of this country!

It is not for me to characterize conduct like this, Mr. President. Let the country characterize it, and let posterity spurn and spit upon it, as it will. It cannot be hid beneath a bushel. This is a flagrant crime against justice and the Constitution which may be justified in the minds of Senators by their desire to press something else to a conclusion; but the crime consists in its absolute trampling under foot one of the plain guarantees which the Constitution of the United States makes in favor of the liberty and of the rights of the humblest individuals. If there be in that Constitution provisions that are more valuable than all the rest they are those provisions which relate to the personal rights of the citizen, which give to the American citizen that high plane upon which he may assert his constitutional right through his representative in either of these Houses in spite of opposition, and may command a respectful hearing on the part of either branch of the legislative body of this country.

Men may be willing to see the rights of States trampled out, the rights of great corporations even invaded, the rights of powerful political communities or combinations stricken down; but that man who plants himself upon the ground that he has the right to deny to an American citizen, a private man, a plainly guarranteed right set forth in the Constitution, is a man who uses his powers for the purpose of crushing out private rights and of putting the weak underfoot. It has been frequently asserted here of late, but never more emphatically than this morning, I believe, that the will of the majority was to prevail in this body; and for the purpose of getting before the Senate a clear definition of that doctrine and of the connection in which it has been stated, I will read from the remarks of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] delivered so facetiously yesterday evening at the moment of the adjournment of the Senate, when he was in such a happy frame of mind that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] imagined he must be preparing himself to go to the circus:

> The Senate has now decided by a majority that it will not lay aside the resolution pending before it for the transaction of other business.

I did not know that the Senate had made up its mind that it would shut the doors to the right of petition until his colleague arose this morning and made the objection against this Irish-American citizen sending his petition to this body and having it referred to a committee of this body, already organized, and organized also by democratic consent and by democratic assistance, for without our consent and assistance you could not have done it.

It has also decided upon a test vote that it will not reject the resolution.

That vote has not yet been taken; Senators have not yet been put upon their oaths before the country in casting votes "yea" or "nay" on the rejection of that resolution, and we do not know how far conscience may yet be awakened so as to enable the Senate of the United States to reject that resolution, for the resolution, allow me to say to the Senator without any imputation of his motives, is a fraud on its face, and there are reasons upon the face of it, as well as in the surrounding circumstances, that make it still more a fraud. There may be yet virtue enough in this body to rise to the truth of the occasion and to do right though the heavens might fall; and until the body has solemnly recorded its vote upon the very merits of the resolution itself, I shall be one of those who will continue to hope, if not to believe, that there will be virtue enough found in this Senate to refuse its passage.

It has also decided upon a test vote that it will not reject the resolution. Further resistance to it, therefore, becomes resistance to the will of the majority.

It may be obedience to the constitutional will of the minority; and when resistance to the will of the majority becomes obedience to constitutional duty by the minority, then the minority under the Constitution has the right to decide against and to protest against the action of the majority.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate and of those who are thus obstructing public business by resistance to the will of the majority, to the fact that it is the old struggle in which they have been engaged before, and in which they lost.

Was that the struggle, the old one, that occurred just at the close of the Forty-sixth Congress, when the democrats of this body spent a whole night here trying to force the republicans to go into executive session to consider over one hundred nominations laid before this body by a republican President? Is that the ancient occasion to which the honorable Senator refers? Or was it the occasion in the House of Representatives when, for the purpose of passing a resolution which the Senate had passed, not by a strict party vote, the members of the democratic party in that body in the last Congress were trying to have a rule adopted for the counting of the electoral vote for President and Vice-President, and when the minority by refusing to vote, not by voting and making motions under the Constitution, sat still in their seats and broke a quorum, destroyed the body so far as they could destroy it? Are these the ancient examples to which we are commended by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts? Let me say to that honorable Senator that there is a marked distinction between our voting "nay" or voting "yea" upon motions that we make to prevent you from doing something that we think is wrong, and our sitting here and destroying the Senate by refusing to comprise a part of a quorum.

But the republican Senators at the close of the last session of Congress, and in many instances before—the precedents are numerous and will not be forgotten—did not content themselves by representing a minority, and undertaking to vote against the majority, even by dilatory motions, but they sat in their seats as dumb as stocks and stones, refusing to exercise the power conferred upon them and made obligatory upon them by the Constitution when they took their oaths to support it. No, sir; there is a great difference between making motions to adjourn and motions to proceed to the consideration of the business legitimately before the Senate and that sort of obstinacy which will enable a man to sit in the presence of the President of this body, and within the precincts of this Chamber, and deaden himself in voice and sense as if he had never existed and as if he had no State to represent; for the man who sits here and refuses to vote refuses to allow his State to vote, takes upon himself to interpose himself between the Senate and the power of the State that sent him here and silence his State in the councils of the country for the sake of getting a temporary advantage, it may not be over his opponents or antagonists, but, as it was on that occasion, over his own President.

There was a time when Senators seceded from this body, giving notice that they would secede, seceding some of them under the instructions of their States and others without instructions. After they had made up their minds and delivered their farewell addresses they left this body and never more appeared. These Senators withdrew their States from the councils of this nation so far as they are uttered in the body of the Senate, and after they had gone their States were voiceless here. When a Senator finds himself in a condition not to withdraw from the Chamber, not even so much as to the cloak-room, but sits here and stifles the voice of his own State and refuses to vote, what else does he do but secede from this body for the moment? He may return or he may not; he considers it optional with himself; he considers that he has the privilege of doing that, and if he may exert that privilege for a half hour why may he not exert it for a half year or for a half century, if he lives so long and holds the position? That is the example which the Senators on the other side set to us in the close of the last Congress, which is the precise equivalent in effect and in principle of a secession from this body. You set the example of saying to us that your States shall not be heard in these councils, because if heard they will give to this body the requisite majority, so that its voice when expressed shall be the voice of the law.

And after this brilliant example in the olden times the sincere and frank Senator from Massachusetts whom we so thoroughly admire, the leader in this body of this great movement in favor of George Gorham and Mr. Riddleberger—that honorable Senator essays to get up here and taunt us with the idea that there are some old examples left—by which I infer he did not mean the examples which he himself had set, but perhaps the examples which had been set in the days of secession.

Sir, a more revolutionary spirit never possessed a body of men than that which gives to them the power to say to themselves, "We will sit in the Senate of the United States representing States and yet these States shall be voiceless." If the men who seceded from the American Union had sat here in that way, if they could have made up their minds that honor would have justified them under such circumstances in retaining that sort of relation to the Government of the United States, there might not have been war, and there might not have been that idea carried out which the Senators on that side of the Chamber now espouse so lovingly, the abolition of slavery; the man who claims his rights under the Constitution, under the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments which you advocate with so much zeal and eloquence, would to-day with your consent have been plowing and hoeing in the fields of the South; because there are not more than two or three gentlemen on that side who can rise here and declare in the presence of Almighty God that in 1860 they were abolitionists any more than I was. If we had concluded to sit here instead of seceding absolutely from the Government of the United States, there would have been difficulty in the situation which perhaps you may not have very deeply reflected upon; beware how you teach examples like this, beware how you lay down precedents which shall justify men carrying on what you call revolutionary proceedings in the name and in conformity also to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. These examples may return to plague you. I do not speak a threat; I speak a deprecation; I speak, sir, what I conceive to be a lesson that is now being brought forward in the twilight of the early dawn which when it is fully completed before this country will perhaps teach some gentlemen that the Government of the United States is a thing not to be trifled with by those who have sworn to sustain the Constitution, but it is something to be supported in a manly, firm, honest, and brave spirit.

Mr. President, I have been led to look over some of the minority powers in the Constitution of the United States, and I desire to call attention to them because I am persuaded that the minority powers conferred by the express language of the Constitution are of as much importance, if not of greater importance than the majority powers or the powers of majorities. At the time that this Government was formed—I speak of the present constitutional government—we had the articles of confederation, in which the minority powers were not so well defined as they are in the present instrument, and yet they were very well defined there. But after nine years of experience under that form of government, and after a still longer and a more painful experience of one hundred years in our colonial state, we discovered that those who comprised minorities in this country were the people to be taken care of, and not those who comprised majorities. The majority powers, especially in a government which is popular in all its essential parts, both in the States and in the federal sense, is a power that is almost absolute in its authority. In States communities yield their traditions to it; people yield up their prejudices to it. Honest men may be compelled oftentimes to yield their dearest rights to it. But it tramples under its feet whatever it chooses to go over. So when our fathers came to ordain the present Constitution of the United States, and especially the amendments thereto for the perfecting of that instrument, they found themselves compelled by considerations which history had forced severely upon their attention to look after the rights of minorities, and the Constitution of the United States in its most express form may be denominated a constitution for the protection of minorities.

Now, sir, I will turn to article 5 of the Constitution and read that. In respect to the amendment of the instrument itself, there was a purpose on the part of the framers of this Constitution to keep the instrument itself intact. They thought it was necessary to preserve the Constitution while they were preserving other things. They thought it was one of the highest duties they owed to posterity to preserve the Constitution from fraudulent and ill-considered attack and assault, and so they provided as follows:

Provided, That no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article; and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

There is the absolute veto of a State upon its being deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate. One State, by its mere objection and by withholding its consent in its own favor, preserves its equality with the most powerful State in the country. How about the amendments to the Constitution?

The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress.

Now, therefore, the minority power is protected by the requirement of a two-thirds majority to inaugurate an amendment, and a three-fourths majority for the purpose of its ratification; and whoever will look at that feature of the Constitution of the United States and rise in his place in the Senate and undertake to disparage minorities because they are minorities shows that he has no just appreciation of the value of this grand ordination. Why, sir, if in rising in the Senate I had to open my mouth the one way or the other upon a question of doubt and dispute between a majority and a minority, I would always start with the proposition that the minority should be protected because the majority always has the capacity of taking care of itself.

In section 2, article 2 of the Constitution of the United States, is found the power that, in the government from which we draw our traditions and a large part of our constitutional system belonged as one of the prerogatives of the Crown the power of making treaties. When our fathers came to ordain and distribute that power they did it in the following words:

He [the President] shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

There one-third or a little in excess of one-third of the Senate is given a veto upon the prerogative of the President to make treaties. The President can appoint embassadors, foreign ministers, and he can enter into negotiations; he can commit this country as far as the Queen of England can commit Great Britain to a treaty, until you come to the question of ratification, and then there is a peculiar body of men, not a legislative body merely, not a treaty-making power, but the Senate of the United States, in which you have to get the consent of two-thirds of that body before your treaty can be ratified. What does that mean except to give to the Senate of the United States the power of the minority, the great minority power, so that Senators in excess of one-third may prevent the President of the United States, representing the majesty of this country in all the foreign relations, from ratifying a treaty until our consent is obtained. Who would like to see that minority power removed or scandalized by a demand that the majority of this body had the right to rule? Grant you, sir, that they have the right to rule in many cases and in many circumstances, but they have not the right to rule in respect to the peculiar powers of the Senate. The Senate has its peculiar powers, just as distinct as can be from the Congress of the United States, because it can sit here after being convoked by the President of the United States and exercise those powers without the slightest relation to the other great legislative branch of the Government.

Suppose this that we are discussing in the form of the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, instead of being a treaty between members of different political organizations and men committed or supposed to be committed definitely by their avowals of principle and by the support given to them; also making between themselves, as is alleged and believed, an agreement or contract between each other—suppose it were a treaty with some foreign power by which in consideration of our receiving something we should be called upon to give up something; in consideration of our receiving a grant of land from Nicaraugua, it might be, we were called upon to make a treaty with that government to advance them $100,000,000 to pay for building a canal across the isthmus, and you brought your treaty not before the Congress of the United States, but before this body, the Senate, and you addressed it to the treaty-making power of this body, and the minority, a little more than one-third, should rise and say, as was said in respect of another treaty that was made by a President of the United States in reference to Santo Domingo, and as was said by the most remarkable and influential man that ever sat in the national councils from Massachusetts, "There is fraud in the bargain;" suppose we should arise and say it, then should we hear the honorable Senators from Massachusetts in this body demand imperiously as they do now that the majority must rule. Would it not be a question whether that be a free or a fair ballot, a priceless ballot, or a ballot paid for by some dirty contrivance?

In reference to another minority power I will read from the Constitution of the United States, section 7 of article 1:

Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it become a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such reconsideration two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall become a law. But in all cases the votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the persons voting for and against the bill shall be entered on the Journal of each House respectively.

There is another minority power given to whom? Exercised in the first instance by the President of the United States but only pro forma, not exercised absolutely. He cannot take a bill and put it in his pocket if the Congress lasts ten days, and say "I will hold it because I do not like it." He must return it. But what is the object of the veto power there? It is to strengthen the hands of the minority. A majority passes it in the House and a majority in the Senate. The President comes in with his veto and strengthens the power of the minority and the bill is reconsidered; it cannot be thrown aside; it cannot become a law; it must be reconsidered. Reconsidered by whom? By the Houses, commencing with the House in which it originated, and then the President's veto requires that in order to pass the bill a majority of two-thirds shall be given for it. Thus you see is given to the great executive head of this Government the power to increase the minority influence so that upon a reconsideration of a measure in due course of parliamentary proceeding it may be loaded with his objections that the measure ought not to be passed.

Since 1874 the democratic party of the United States has been in a majority among the people of this country; and if the President had yielded to the power of that majority as quietly as even the monarch of Great Britain yields to the popular voice in that great country, we should have had democratic measures in force through this land, and the people would have got that for which they voted. But there were forces that prevented it constitutionally. The late President of the United States interposed his veto, and he prevented that from taking place which the people had so often decreed at every popular election. He obstructed their will as expressed by their representatives on the floor of the House and of the Senate time and again. He prevented the people of the United States from restoring unto themselves a government which should stand for the protection of their personal liberties and rights. This was done by that power given to him through which he represented the will of the minority. We had naught to say to this except, "You have the power and have constitutionally exercised it." That was all we could say. We respected the will of the minority, represented by the veto of a minority President. That is our record.

I do not wonder at Senators on that side, some of them at least, claiming that the power of the majority is absolute and imperious. When we come to remember the great tribunal in which "eight to seven" prevailed; when we come to remember the fact that they snatched out of the hands of a great popular majority and out of the hands of a majority of the States and of the electors the presidential office, and appropriated it to themselves, by one vote, after three States, or two at least, had been virtually disfranchised, we ought not to wonder that they should stand on the floor of the Senate to-day and in an imperious way, after having enjoyed the spoils that they took to themselves as judges on the bench, demand further concessions and further contributions from the minority—the minority which they affect to despise. Because the American people submitted without strife and without struggle to that, the broadest, most comprehensive, and only immortal fraud of this age, they believe now that by getting up on the floor of the Senate and crying out in the same spirit to us "Submit to the majority" we shall do it merely because there falsely appears to be a majority.

No, sir, we will stand here, and will appeal to the minority powers. We will protect the guardianship that this Constitution gives to minorities, and in a constitutional way, until we are satisfied that the motives of Senators on that side are better than they were when they forced upon us that fraud of "eight to seven." "Cast out first the beam out of thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to pull out the mote that is in thy brother's eye." We are not a forgetful people, but we are a forbearing people, I must admit, when the same men with the same methods come back to us and undertake to charge us with treason because we stand by the minority provisions of the Constitution of the United States. They must remember that history is easy to make and very hard to forget, and that the people of this country have treasured up in their minds and hearts reflections which all the powers on that side of the Senate can never remove, which will stand by us and the generations that follow us and will encourage us hereafter, I hope to God, to stand by the Constitution of the United States in all its provisions, as well those that make for minorities as those that make for the protection of majorities.

Mr. President, what has become of that provision of the Constitution which authorizes one-fifth of this body to demand to have a vote recorded by yeas and nays on its Journal? That is all we have done. We have had various motions here, and all that we have done is that sixteen or more of us, the proper number, have required the yeas and nays to be recorded. The Constitution plainly provides for it. Why was it put there? Was it merely to make a record? Senators on the other side cannot assert that, for they have often refused to vote and refused to make a record. If the object of calling the yeas and nays is merely to get the names of Senators pro and con in the record, what have those Senators to say to the country who have refused to put their names on the record, and have therefore refused to obey the Constitution in that particular? I have no accusation to make upon that ground; but it seems to me to be an imperative duty to vote. But the power and privilege and the right goes far beyond that; it goes to the point that one-fifth may stand here and cause Senators to vote and to vote until they shall have ample time to hear from their own consciences and yet also have time to hear from the people.

What becomes of that provision of the Constitution for the protection of minorities, that no business can be transacted except in the presence of a majority of each House?

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business.

What is the use of that provision? Why do you require that a majority of all the sworn and qualified members of this Senate shall be necessary to constitute a quorum to do business? It is that there shall be a majority; and that is done for the protection of the minority rather than for the assistance of a bare majority.

Now, Mr. President, I come to another constitutional provision, the third section of the first article:

The Vice-President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote unless they be equally divided.

On some occasion or other, I do not now exactly remember when, I heard the remark fall from the lips of the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] that in his opinion the question as to the powers of the Vice-President of the United States had never been authentically settled by this body, for the reason that they had never been thoroughly discussed; judgments had been pronounced which were in a sense obiter dicta because of the fact that full discussion had not been had on both sides of the question. In my investigations into that subject I have come to the same conclusion with the Senator from Georgia. I believe that this question has not been considered in that sedate sense which the Senate of the United States owes to itself when we come to consider its various powers of jurisdiction.

When assembled in Congress the Senate has legislative powers; when assembled in extraordinary session it has power to participate in appointments. I do not call it an executive power, for really it is not an executive power, because the Constitution of the United States says that the executive power of the United States is lodged in the President. Therefore I cannot assent that the power of participating in appointments by the Senate of the United States is strictly an executive power. It has also the treaty-making power, in which it participates with the President to ratify or to disaffirm his treaty engagements with foreign governments.

Here are three very distinct powers; three very distinct jurisdictions. They are peculiar to the Senate, not merely as a Senate of the United States in the ordinary and broad acceptation of the word, but to the Senate of the United States exercising the particular functions ascribed to it and prescribed to it in the Constitution of the United States.

Whether or not the language "The Vice-President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote unless they be equally divided" applies to all these different functions I am perhaps at this time unprepared to state further than in argument, because the precedents are neither the one way nor the other conclusively and definitely settled; but I will say that this is a very lame government if the Vice-President can stop its operations by refusing to sit in this Chamber. If he retires to his room, not far distant from this spot, and sequester himself, who is to bring him back? Who is to compel him to preside, or when he presides, who is to compel him to vote? Who is to compel him to take the key of power and unlock the Senate when it gets into a tie? What power have you got over him? Sir, you can take me and by a two-thirds vote you can expel me from this body for cause sufficient in your own judgment, and thereby you can disfranchise the State of Alabama, because I am subject to your power; but all the power of the Senate cannot remove the Vice-President from his place. He is not a Senator; he therefore is not a constituent part of this body, but is a mere presiding officer, having powers conferred upon him by the Constitution of the United States.

When a man who is not a Senator, who cannot be controlled by the Senate, who cannot be expelled by the Senate, against whom the Senate cannot lock its doors and instruct its Sergeant-at-Arms to keep him out, comes to preside in this body, he does what? Upon the organization of committees, in case of a tie, he casts the vote; upon the question of the indefinite postponement of these resolutions he casts the vote; upon questions of legislation he casts the vote. He may vote and he may not.

In this body to-day, divided thirty-eight to thirty-eight, the whole power of the Senate of the United States is conferred on one man and he not a member of the body. He is, as my friend from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] remarks, the absolute arbiter, not of legislation merely, but all action in reference to the organization of the Senate, and to appointments and treaties. Point to me that feature of the Constitution of the United States which intrusts him with these vast powers. Show me how it was that when the people of the country voted for him for Vice-President of the United States they had an intelligent thought that they were voting for a man who had powers of the kind that I have mentioned rising above the powers of every Senator here.

Sir, it is a most desperate and dangerous deduction from very meager facts. It is a deduction which some of these days will give to this country more trouble than any other one thing that has ever risen to vex us. A Constitution absolutely silent in respect of all the powers which he may thus exercise, by a mere inference to be drawn from one of its provisions is made to confer upon one man the right to decide absolutely and without restriction all that belongs to the administration of the Government of the country. He can say to the President of the United States, "Your nominations shall not be considered." Suppose that he desired to drive the President out of his office so as to take it himself. Suppose he wanted to force the President of the United States to resign, as he would be obliged to do in self-respect if the Senate should support the Vice-President in the enterprise, and the Vice-President should say to him, "I am sustained by thirty-eight Senators here and by my casting vote. No law shall be passed, no appropriation bill shall be passed, the Army shall not be supplied, the judiciary shall not be sustained, no foreign minister shall be appointed or supplied with the means of subsisting in foreign countries; I will put a dead-lock upon all the administration of this Government, because I conceive that you are not the real choice of the people of the United States, and I intend to smoke you out of your office." How is this to be prevented? But some one will say, "We are too good for that; our men of this day and generation are too pure for that." We may be; but if we are, we are purer than the generations of men in the ages that have passed. We are not making provision for saints and angels to rule on earth, for the millennium has not yet come. We are making provision for vile and base men to rule, for they sometimes get into power.

Then I will ask, was it ever contemplated that the Vice-President of the United States should exercise powers like these, or that you should open the door of opportunity through which he might exercise such powers? Senators will find themselves I think constrained by a just sense of respect for their own high character and office, after mature consideration, not to arrive at a conclusion like that.

But there is another phase of this matter, Mr. President, a still more remarkable phase. The fifth article of the Constitution, which I read to the Senate just now, relates to the equality of the States in the Senate of the United States. No State shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate without its own consent. The Senate is composed of two Senators elected from each and every State by the Legislatures thereof. Let me take the case of a Vice-President who was elected by the republican party or by the democratic party, and let us consider how much power he adds to a State, and then draw from that some deductions which will be practical perhaps in a few days to come; for there is no use presenting questions or issues to the people of the United States in these days of practical enterprise unless they have got something practical in them.

Here is the great State of New York, which has thirty-three Representatives in the House, the body which has the power to originate money bills, which has the power to regulate the taxation of this country to a large degree. It has thirty-two times more power than its little neighbor, Rhode Island, in the House. The Vice-President of the United States happens also to come from New York State, that great State which has got within its bosom more of commercial power than many other States of the Union, more of political influence than half a dozen or a dozen that could be named. That power in the House is here supplemented with the power of three Senators, because the Vice-President of the United States does not hesitate, as he has shown in several votes which have been taken here, to cast his vote every time with his State.

Perhaps Senators representing smaller constituencies might get their consent to look through the glamour of party influence that surrounds them like a glory in this moment of their great success, and consider the condition which may result in the Senate from giving to the most powerful State of the American Union, the Empire State, not only the ascendency in the House, but three votes in the Senate of the United States. Do I say three? I mean more than that, because in the event of a controversy in the Senate about the confirmation of a man for some great office in that State the casting vote of the whole country is thrown in his favor or against him.

The Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] in comprising that majority about which he has spoken so frequently, counts the Vice-President as part of the constitutional majority. Why? Of course, because he was elected here as a republican; and it is supposed that while he will not be allowed to utter his voice on the floor of the Senate in any respect except to make decisions from the chair, and while he could not be welcomed into the caucus over which the Senator from Massachusetts now presides in such distinguished style, he feels himself as much bound by the caucus action as the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] seems to be, who detests all caucuses, according to his expression.

Here, then, we have the power of one man in this country, which is as near "the one-man power" as can be described, under the absolute control of a caucus which must be a minority of this body, because, as I have understood, the Senator from Virginia has always disclaimed the disgrace of having appeared in a republican caucus. I believe he has said that that is one thing that cannot attach to him.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me a moment? If the Senator thinks that the proposition I make represents a minority, what is the objection to trying the judgment of the Senate on it?

Mr. MORGAN. It represents the sort of majority which the Senator has been able to make up, if it represents a majority at all, through his very remarkable arts of persuasion and his tricks of trade. There is no man who excels the honorable Senator from Massachusetts in his manipulation of a little game. He is a saint to look at; but whoever undertakes to bet against him stakes his money against the "heathen Chinee." [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. I suppose it represents the sort of majority which the Senator dreads. If it is a minority he need not be afraid of it, any more than those recorded majorities over and over again here are afraid of the minority which he represents. Minorities are harmless except when they are revolutionary, and they never did accomplish anything as revolutionists; and sooner or later my dear friend from Alabama will wake up to a realizing sense of it.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, there are some majorities that I do dread. When a fire gets the majority of a man in his house and he cannot get water enough to put it out, there is no reason why he should put more fuel under it in order to consume the house the quicker. Sometimes disease gets the majority of a man's bones, muscles, and nerves; and there is no reason why he should abuse himself so as to let the disease get a stronger hold upon him. Sometimes fraud gets the upper hand of a man in his affairs; and there is no reason why he should sit down simperingly and put his fingers in his mouth and take what comes merely because the man who perpetrated the fraud happens to be a great or a splendid man. There is no reason why a man should lose his manhood when he understands that his rights are snatched from him, not by a legitimate majority but by one that has been manufactured. There is a reason why men on the floor of the Senate of the United States should try to set honest examples to the people of the United States and show that they are willing to make some little sacrifice for the cause of honor, truth, and justice, it makes no difference how able or splendid the advocate of the other side may appear to be.

I have looked at that honorable Senator for the last month with much admiration. Indeed in the four years that I have been here his character before this body was never thoroughly revealed to me. I find in him now a great Spartan leader; yes, sir, a Spartan in the highest sense of the word; a Spartan who trains his thews and his sinews by abstaining from food, if necessary, by long sessions and at times by overexercise, and who manages in the presence of all difficulties to keep up the most benign and cheerful face that the galleries ever smiled upon. Indeed when I have seen him lift his lofty brow imploringly to the cerulean blue that rests above us, I could oftentimes fancy what beautiful pictures he must see in heaven, especially when his vision raked the galleries as it came down to earth, and with a magnificent bow and laugh he again beamed before the Senate. It was a lovely picture. It reminded me of an incident in history which, if the Senator will pardon me, I will relate, of the Spartan youth, a Lacedemonian boy, you remember, described by Plutarch in the biography of Lycurgus. The boy, following out the requirements of his Spartan education to steal something whenever he got a chance, had stolen a fox. He had hid the little "varmint" under his single shirt of hair, and he paraded about among his playmates with it, keeping that beautiful and serene face upon him that the Senator from Massachusetts has been able to do for a month, while the little animal was gnawing upon his vitals, and finally the boy, still smiling, dropped dead in the presence of his comrades. I do not charge the Senator from Massachusetts with having stolen a fox or with having stolen anything else, but he in some way got a fox under his garment, or something equally annoying, and for twenty days or more that fox has been gnawing at his vitals, and yet he has sat smiling before the Senate of the United States with a beaming and serene expression of countenance which must commend him to the photographer if not to the historian.

The Senator will find more trouble in getting rid of his fox than he had in capturing him. He is harder to let loose than he was to capture. The Senator will be like my friend, Mr. Dougherty, of Alabama, who, one morning taking a bath in the Alabama River, found an alligator asleep. He fancied it was a sick one, and as it was not a large one he concluded that he would turn it over on its back and tie his pocket-handkerchief over its mouth until he got some assistance. He seized it and it commenced whipping him with its tail. He tried to let it go and could not do it. Finally, however, by the use of a chunk of wood which he found near, he beat its brains out and went back to make his report. He said that that was one of the beasts which it was very much easier to catch than to hold. The Senator will find after a while that he has got something under his jacket which it is much easier to catch than it is to hold. I commend him to cherish that beautiful serenity of mind which he has so magnificently displayed here for a month, it being the very last time that he will ever enjoy the opportunity of appearing in that character before these glaring, brilliant footlights, for the time will come when the Senator from Massachusetts will see that that which he supposes he has captured will be a Tartar that he cannot control.

The Senator from Massachusetts, the Senator from Pennsylvania, and the Senator from Virginia have disclosed the real purpose of this movement. I pass over the question of the contract, of the supposed bargain and sale, of the treaty between the treaty-making powers, for I do not know the circumstances. I can only say this: if I should happen here to be involved in such combinations of circumstantial evidence the grass would never grow under my feet until I demanded a court of inquiry to sit upon it and to inquire into it, for I could not sit upon the floor of the Senate and keep my countenance before the people of the United States after so many things had been said and so little demand for inquiry had been made. Gentlemen who have used themselves to the acquirement of political power, it makes no difference by what methods, may be able to justify the means by the result; but I confess that I could not wear the honorable character of a Senator of the United States and for one moment have it supposed by any man in the world who had a right to speak, newspaper or Senator, that I had been concerned in a villainous bargain about the offices of this body.

With the patronage of this immense Government in the hands of the President of the United States and of the Senate, it does seem to me to be the smallest and falsest of all feeble and false pretenses that the alleged majority of the Senate of the United States should find itself necessitated to proceed to distribute the little patronage of the body into the hands of its friends. This Government collects and expends a million dollars a day. It has the largest revenue and makes the largest disbursement of any government in the world to-day, unless it be the Empire of Russia. It throws out its bounties and its largesses into the hands of at least 105,000 paid officials. In the midst of this magnificent outflow of the treasure taxed out of the people of the United States, is it to be believed that this body can be kept in session for a month, and the public business continually obstructed, for the mere purpose of putting a few pennies into the pockets of some necessitous retainer of the republican party, whether he is an old-line republican or a new convert? No, sir; that pretense will not be received by the American people as having a feather's weight in it.

The honorable Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] the other day, with the eye of prescience, saw that which has been since confessed on the floor of the Senate. The whole purpose of this movement is to undertake to control the politics of Virginia in the coming fall election and in the next senatorial election, it being determined by some means or other to acquire the power of a majority in this body. This act on the part of the republican party in the Senate of the United States reveals more thoroughly than did ever an act before reveal the real animus and the real purpose of that party. It is not a party that designs to govern through the consent of the people, no matter how expressed. It is a party that has shown its willingness on various occasions to reverse the sentiment of the people, no matter how expressed. It is a party that intends to govern by eight to seven, by a majority of one; by any power that is enough to keep a minority in check. But in governing in that way remember that you must govern according to the Constitution. In those tribunals of the country where the Constitution prevails and where the minority has the power to enforce its protective principles, you must remember, gentlemen, that in governing us you must govern according to the Constitution. Our consciences point us to that instrument and to its protection and defense and the use of every means that it places in our power to prevent injustice, fraud, and wrong.

I said in the opening of my remarks that the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts was fraudulent on its face. I did not mean by that to convey the impression that the Senator was trying to put a fraud upon the Senate or upon the country, but I meant to convey this idea. As I remember the language it is about this:

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States will now proceed to elect certain officers—naming them. That may be in due form. It may be in a form that has received the sanction of authority heretofore and has become a precedent. I am not prepared to say whether it is or whether it is not; but how can the Senate of the United States proceed to elect its officers without proceeding to eject officers who are now in place? It has its officers, it has all that are required, and from the humblest man who sweeps the floors in the very cellar of this Capitol up to the highest official in the service of the Senate there has not been one word of complaint made that I remember as to inefficiency or incompetency or indisposition to do the whole duty of those officers. It has been a most remarkable success in the selection of officers. Here we have men who, as we all well understand, have so thoroughly taken care of the police of this end of the Capitol that it has at last become a respectable place. It was about as much as a man could say for it four years ago that it was a place where respectability could afford to be found. Now under the discipline of this corps of officers every obstruction has been removed to the comfortable, pleasant, regular, methodical, and proper exercise of our functions and powers in this body, and we are called upon now to do what? Says the Senator's resolution, "to proceed to the election of officers." What does that imply? Necessarily that we have no officers; necessarily that there are vacancies; that by the expiration of legal or constitutional tenure there are officers who have passed out whose places have to be supplied.

There is where I say the resolution is a falsehood. You proceed to do that which is unnecessary to be done, which is not required by the law or by the usages of the Senate to be done; you proceed to do that which on the other hand is a wrong to men who hold their offices in virtue of a tenure that you yourselves prescribe, and which you permitted them to accept. We have gentlemen engaged here as officers of the Senate who are capacitated to take care of themselves and to transact business in any of the avocations of life. They are men of ability, men of influence and character. What did you do? You persuaded these men, or at least you permitted them to come here and accept office upon the idea that they should remain during at least the period of time when they performed their duty according to law and with correctness, and until the period of time when the sessions of Congress should recur in which a majority opposed to them in politics should be found within this body. You take from these men that which you promised, and gave them, and you take it from them without a proper regard for their rights under the law and Constitution of the country. You commit toward these men an act of wrong, not for the purpose of organizing the Senate—(no matter how often that plea has been put forward it has never for a moment had the semblance of truth in it,) but you do it in order that you may have the ability to gratify somebody under some arrangement or agreement, who has either a past, a present, or a future benefit to confer upon you in consideration of that arrangement.

Under such circumstances, what is the country to infer as the real motive of this proceeding? Do you expect by distributing a dozen or more offices among the readjusters of Virginia that you will be able to hold the 31,000 people who voted with them last year in favor of Hancock and English, and that they will turn over to the republican party? In order to get what modicum you may be able to control of that party, do you propose to give up the 81,000 republicans who stood against the readjuster party and voted for the regular Garfield ticket? Gentlemen are calculating without their host, I think, when they expect to produce results like this. You are crying, "Give! give!" to these people; but the answer will be, "We have nothing to return." You are piping in the market-places to them; but you will find that there are no dancers to your music. The 31,000 men who stood in the readjuster party for Hancock and English during the last presidential campaign are not men to be sold. They are not led in the leashes by any man who lives. When it is expected that by the dispensation of offices to a few of them you are going to hold the rest of them together and, like cattle, drive them to the shambles, you will find that you have mistaken your men.

If the republican party in the Senate to-day expects to work a result of that sort and through such result to extend what I would call the contamination into other Southern States, they are very wide of the mark. Senators do not make a calculation upon a basis so narrow as that which involves such tremendous consequences to our country. Unless you can see a prize ahead of you more promising than that, allow me to say in good faith to you as a Senator, Do not allow yourselves to differ with us and become antagonized to us, as you seem to have become, in the expectation that you will have the power through this agency of returning from Virginia a readjuster to take a place in your ranks after the next Legislature shall have assembled there. That time is two years off. Half of Mr. Garfield's administration will have expired by the time that such a Senator could take his seat. What is to become of him and his administration in the mean time? To what feast do you invite us? What do you ask us to do? If we should accept that which you labor to force us to do, if we should do that to which you would not only invite us but endeavor to provoke us, your President of the United States would not turn a wheel in his administration in two years.

But, sir, I am not for a course like that. You have elected a President by a constitutional majority, and I am in favor of upholding his hands by all constitutional methods; and in order to uphold his hands now under the present circumstances the case is too plain for argument that one thing is left to us to do, and that is to proceed to the consideration of the nominations that he has sent to us. What message has he sent to us about the reorganization of the Senate? What advice has he given us? That after we have yielded the committees so that the business of the public may go on we should also yield to Mr. Riddleberger and Mr. George Gorham. Has Riddleberger been nominated by the President of the United States? I have heard no message of the kind; but if this matter goes on for a day or two longer, I mean to offer a resolution in the Senate to invite the President of the United States to meet us in executive session and see what he has to say about it. I want to hear from him.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The President has a right to come to an executive session.

Mr. MORGAN. As a matter of course; and it is his duty to come if invited. General Washington used to meet the Senate in executive session; so did Jefferson, and so did other Presidents; and if this matter goes on I intend for one to give the Senate an opportunity to understand whether or not the President of the United States wishes the Government left in a state of abeyance in order that the Senate may give out a little patronage to the hands of the Riddlebergers in Virginia to be distributed in the purchase of votes to help on the next election. If the President sends his nominees here upon that same ground there is no telling what might happen.

Now, Mr. President, the Senate of the United States will bear me witness that since I have been here I have not indulged in acrimonious political debate. Time and time again I have given my votes in this body in direct antagonism to Senators from my own section, believing that I was required to do it by either considerations of public policy or by the Constitution of the United States. I have abstained from mingling in this debate because it seemed to have taken a very decided political turn. I have desired that the Senate of the United States should rise to the occasion and should comprehend the great duty resting upon us now. Gentlemen, when you bring us a proposition in aid of the Government backed by a majority on that side which we believe is not founded on some corrupt bargain, we will go to its consideration with you to the sacrifice of our private judgment; but when you touch us with that proposition and command us to yield to you, when we believe that you are wrong in principle and in practice, and that your conduct is derogatory to the honor of this body, you may cry out against us and charge treason, if you please, upon us until doomsday, and still you will find us on the floor resisting such a movement. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] that the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] be indefinitely postponed, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, if no Senator desires to occupy the floor I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. Of course I will withdraw the motion if any Senator desires to be heard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business. The question is upon that motion. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. COCKRELL and Mr. HARRIS called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.]

Mr. MILLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. FARLEY.]

Mr. PLATT, of Connecticut, (when his name was called.) I am paired for the day with the Senator from West Virgina, [Mr. CAMDEN.] It will be unnecessary to repeat the announcement.

Mr. WALKER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. HILL.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 25, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Beck,	Gorman,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Brown,	Groome,	Lamar,	Vance,
Butler,	Grover,	McPherson,	Vest.
Call,	Hampton,	Morgan,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Pendleton,
Coke,	Jackson,	Pugh,

NAYS—28.

Allison,	Dawes,	Ingalls,	Morrill,
Anthony,	Edgerton,	Kellogg,	Platt of N. Y.,
Blair,	Ferry,	Logan,	Plumb,
Burnside,	Hale,	McDill,	Rollins,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Mahone,	Sewell,
Conger,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Sherman.

ABSENT—23.

Camden,	Frye,	Jones of Nevada,	Teller,
Conkling,	Garland,	Maxey,	Van Wyck,
Davis of Illinois,	George,	Miller,	Voorhees,
Edmunds,	Hill of Colorado,	Platt of Conn.,	Walker,
Fair,	Hill of Georgia,	Saulsbury,	Williams.
Farley,	Johnston,	Saunders,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, after that vote I should think the Senators would be satisfied and willing to proceed to a vote upon the resolution itself.

Mr. COCKRELL. We are perfectly satisfied, and therefore I move to lay the resolution on the table, and call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. DAWES. I wish the Senator would indicate what judgment of the Senate against him would satisfy him.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, this is not a debatable motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not. The Senator from Missouri moves that the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts and now pending be laid upon the table, and upon that motion asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GROOME, (at two o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) As there does not seem to be any probability that we can make any progress to-day, I move that the Senate do now adjourn, and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland moves that the Senate adjourn and asks for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] on this vote.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.]

Mr. MILLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. FARLEY.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] is paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.]

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—23.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jackson,	Ransom,
Beck,	Gorman,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,
Butler,	Groome,	McPherson,	Slater,
Call,	Grover,	Morgan,	Vance,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Pendleton,	Vest.
Coke,	Harris,	Pugh,

NAYS—27.

Anthony,	Cameron of Pa.,	Dawes,	Hale,
Blair,	Cameron of Wis.,	Edgerton,	Harrison,
Burnside,	Conger,	Ferry,	Hawley,

Hoar,	McDill,	Morrill,	Sawyer,
Ingalls,	McMillan,	Platt of N. Y.,	Sewell,
Kellogg,	Mahone,	Plumb,	Sherman.
Logan,	Mitchell,	Rollins,

ABSENT—26.

Allison,	Farley,	Jonas,	Teller,
Brown,	Frye,	Jones of Nevada,	Van Wyck,
Camden,	Garland,	Lamar,	Voorhees,
Conkling,	George,	Maxey,	Walker,
Davis of Illinois,	Hill of Colorado,	Miller,	Williams.
Edmunds,	Hill of Georgia,	Platt of Conn.,
Fair,	Johnston,	Saunders,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is upon the motion of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL,] that the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] lie on the table, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Pending that, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I think that business is more pressing than any other.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, Mr. COCKRELL, and others called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.]

Mr. MILLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. FARLEY.]

Mr. VEST, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. DAWES, (after having voted in the negative.) Has the Senator from Louisiana on the left [Mr. JONAS] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. DAWES. I wish, then, to withdraw my vote. I would like to inquire also whether he voted on the last vote or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk informs the Chair that he did not.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent, then, to withdraw my vote on that vote, and I withdraw it on this, for I have paired with him. I see the Senator has just come in, and I leave my vote on this call, but I trust the Senate will give me unanimous consent to withdraw my vote on the last call. I ask it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. LOGAN. I was paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE,] and on the last vote I forgot the fact that I had agreed to pair with him and voted. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my vote on the last vote. I had forgotten entirely the fact that I had agreed this morning to pair with the Senator from Mississippi.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator has leave to withdraw his vote on this motion and the preceding one.

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Beck,	Gorman,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Groome,	Lamar,	Slater,
Butler,	Grover,	McPherson,	Vance.
Call,	Hampton,	Morgan,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Pendleton,
Coke,	Jackson,	Pugh,

NAYS—26.

Allison,	Dawes,	Ingalls,	Platt of N. Y.,
Anthony,	Edgerton,	Kellogg,	Rollins,
Blair,	Ferry,	McDill,	Sawyer,
Burnside,	Hale,	McMillan,	Sewell,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harrison,	Mahone,	Sherman.
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Mitchell,
Conger,	Hoar,	Morrill,

ABSENT—25.

Camden,	Garland,	Maxey,	Vest,
Conkling,	George,	Miller,	Voorhees,
Davis of Illinois,	Hill of Colorado,	Platt of Conn.,	Walker,
Edmunds,	Hill of Georgia,	Plumb,	Williams.
Fair,	Johnston,	Saunders,
Farley,	Jones of Nevada,	Teller,
Frye,	Logan,	Van Wyck,

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL,] that the pending resolution do lie upon the table.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, it is very plain that the other side of the Chamber do not intend to do any business this session, but I will give them a chance to vote and see whether they intend to do anything between this and December. I move that the Senate now adjourn until the first Monday in December, upon which I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Oh, yes.

Mr. DAWES. What will become of the public business if we adjourn till the first Monday in December?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. What does the Senator say?

Mr. DAWES. What will become of the public business that has distressed the Senator so much for weeks that he could not submit to the majority?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Why, Mr. President, this side of the Chamber has been for a month endeavoring to do the public business and has been obstructed by the leadership of the Senator from Massachusetts. We were called here for a purpose, and that purpose was——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable, and the debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If the Senator will agree to adjourn, I will not speak.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, by unanimous consent I desire to suggest to the Senator that I am so anxious for the public business to proceed at once that I am willing to submit to any vote the majority of the Senate shall indicate.

Mr. GROOME. Then, Mr. President, I move that we proceed to the consideration of executive business, if my friend from West Virginia will withdraw his motion.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. No, Mr. President, I prefer my first motion, and I believe that has preference. I will say to my friend from Maryland that I will vote for his motion as soon as this is voted on; our friends ought to have a chance to record themselves on this vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia moves that the Senate do now adjourn to the first Monday in December next.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the day of the regular meeting of Congress; it is unnecessary to make that motion.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask for the yeas and nays on my motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.]

Mr. LOGAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE.]

Mr. MILLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. FARLEY.]

Mr. HAWLEY, (when the name of Mr. PLATT, of Connecticut, was called.) My colleague [Mr. PLATT] desired that his pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] be again announced.

Mr. VEST, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.]

Mr. WALKER, (when his name was called.) My colleague [Mr. GARLAND] is paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] I am paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. HILL.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 18, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Beck,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Butler,	Grover,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Call,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Vance.
Cockrell,	Harris,	McPherson,
Coke,	Jackson,	Pendleton,

NAYS—30.

Allison,	Conger,	Hoar,	Morrill,
Anthony,	Dawes,	Ingalls,	Platt of N. Y.,
Bayard,	Edgerton,	Kellogg,	Rollins,
Blair,	Ferry,	McDill,	Sawyer,
Brown,	Groome,	McMillan,	Sewell,
Burnside,	Hale,	Mahone,	Sherman.
Cameron of Pa.,	Harrison,	Mitchell,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Morgan,

ABSENT—28.

Camden,	Garland,	Logan,	Saunders,
Conkling,	George,	Maxey,	Teller,
Davis of Illinois,	Gorman,	Miller,	Van Wyck,
Edmunds,	Hill of Colorado,	Platt of Conn.,	Vest,
Fair,	Hill of Georgia,	Plumb,	Voorhees,
Farley,	Johnston,	Pugh,	Walker,
Frye,	Jones of Nevada,	Saulsbury,	Williams.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. GROOME. I voted "nay" upon the motion of the Senator from West Virginia for the reason that I have not yet abandoned all hope that sooner or later the majority of this Senate will realize that it is their duty to proceed to the consideration of the business for which this session was called.

Mr. HAWLEY. On which side is that majority?

Mr. GROOME. The majority made up of all those Senators, whether democrats or republicans, who feel like sustaining the President of the United States by transacting the business for which this session was convened. In order to test——

Mr. DAWES. I voted the same way for the same reason.

Mr. HAWLEY. So did I.

Mr. GROOME. I believe I have the floor. In order to test whether a majority of the Senate has yet come to that view of the case, I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAWES. It would be a great deal better that we should proceed with the pending business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. GROOME. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator has a queer way of getting at business.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. VEST, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB,] and I announce the pair now for the entire day.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 24, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jackson,	Pendleton,
Brown,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Butler,	Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,
Call,	Grover,	Lamar,	Saulsbury,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	McPherson,	Slater,
Coke,	Harris,	Morgan,	Vance.

NAYS—25.

Allison,	Dawes,	Kellogg,	Rollins,
Anthony,	Edgerton,	McDill,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Ferry,	McMillan,	Sewell,
Burnside,	Harrison,	Mahone,	Sherman.
Cameron of Pa.,	Hawley,	Mitchell,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hoar,	Morrill,
Conger,	Ingalls,	Platt of N. Y.,

ABSENT—27.

Beck,	Frye,	Jones of Nevada,	Teller.
Camden,	Garland,	Logan,	Van Wyck,
Conkling,	George,	Maxey,	Vest,
Davis of Illinois,	Hale,	Miller,	Voorhees,
Edmunds,	Hill of Colorado,	Platt of Conn.,	Walker,
Fair,	Hill of Georgia,	Plumb,	Williams.
Farley,	Johnston,	Saunders,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, I have not thirsted for this fight and I have never felt like going for the scalps of the present officers of the Senate. I felt, very impressively, the mistake made by the majority of the Senate two years ago when they made a clean sweep of the elective officers of this body and I resisted it as long as I thought it right and proper to resist, and then I not only gave in myself, but I counseled others to give in, because I felt that the majority should rule, and they became responsible for the results. I do not claim that the majority then inflicted any great wrong upon us or upon the public service. They gave us officers who have performed their duties honestly and intelligently. These officers have kept many of the republican employés in the service of the Senate whose appointment or retention depended on them. I think they were wise in pursuing this course. But it is a fact that the democratic majority removed every elective officer of this body. I have felt no disposition to dismiss those officers. But, Mr. President, a precedent was established then which I shall observe as long as I am in the Senate, unless by common consent it shall be reversed. It was decided then that the majority had a right to change the chairmen of committees and the officers of the Senate whenever they desired to. To that precedent I shall bow, as long as I am a member of the Senate, until some other course of action is taken by general consent of the two parties. When it shall be agreed that all efficient officers shall remain in our service during good behavior, I will hail the decision with great delight.

Mr. President, when the committees were turned over to the republicans, they received them from the hands of the democrats and with their acquiescence. If we secured the committees by fraud, the democrats are guilty of fraud, because they were participants, they were accessories to the fraudulent act by which we obtained possession. They have no right to shield themselves in the position they are in now and say they are not guilty of fraud. If we obtained these committees by fraud they are guilty of fraud, because they could have kept us from getting them just as they are now preventing the election of officers by the majority. There is no getting behind that.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me a moment——

Mr. BURNSIDE. I am willing to be interrupted. I am only trying to get at what is right and proper——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator says there is no getting behind the fact that if we allowed the other side to get the committees of the Senate we were parties to the fraud if there was fraud. The Senator will remember that we submitted to the appointment of committees because that was an indispensable act to the transaction of the business of the Senate. We considered that an indispensable act to the transaction of the business of the Senate for which it was convened in special session, and therefore we thought it our duty to discharge the business for which this body was convened. The appointment of officers is not necessary for that purpose; and if we do in our opinion yield now to the appointment of officers we should become what the Senator says, a party to whatever bargain exists, and without any excuse or reason for it.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, I would sit here for the remainder of my term without transacting one single particle of public business before I would consent to fraud in any way whatever. Fraud vitiates everything, and the man who consents to it for a single moment becomes accessory to it.

Mr. President, as I have before said, I have not thirsted for this fight, but we are in it, and I want to say now that the other side of this Chamber took a step in the direction of removing officers, and are now trying to occupy the opposite position.

One of the Senators, on whom they relied to strengthen their side and give them the majority, the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS,] has said to the Senate in plain terms that, having granted to us the committees, the other side should grant to us the organization of the Senate, and that it has been decided that we have a constitutional majority. He has gone to his home unpaired, and we now have a majority without reference to the Vice-President. The Senator referred to was recently a member of the supreme bench of the United States, and his opinion is worth something. No matter what we may think of him and his independent position in politics, we all know him to be a man of high integrity and of great mental capacity and undoubted patriotism, and we must give great weight to his opinion. He has told you and he has told the country that we, having gained the committees, are entitled to the organization, and the country will understand it. While some of our constituents and newspapers, notably the New York Times, are getting a little impatient and criticising us, it will be but a few days before the country will know from one end of it to the other who is obstructing business here. I say for myself that I will stay here to the end of my term before I will consent to be governed by a minority, and I believe as much as I believe there is a God in heaven that we are fairly in the majority.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. BURNSIDE. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. I see by the morning papers that the people of Cincinnati did not see it so yesterday. They have elected a democratic mayor by about 1,500 majority. The Senator says the people of the country will see that his side is right.

Mr. BURNSIDE. But that was on a question between whisky and anti-whisky, beer and anti-beer, and even if that was the case, the people are not always right. A new administration as a rule always has a hard row to hoe.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator from Rhode Island permit me to say a word in response to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BURNSIDE. With pleasure.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend from Kentucky knows as well as I do that some of the leading men of Cincinnati, including the editor of one of the principal republican papers of that city, supported the democratic candidate for mayor because they were not satisfied with the enforcement of the Sunday laws, not so much the liquor laws as the Sunday laws of the city of Cincinnati. I can assure him that there is no division of opinion among the republicans of Ohio, so far as I know, on the question that we cannot allow the minority, although it may be but a minority of one, to dictate the course of business in the Senate.

Mr. DAWES. Do you mean that the democracy of Ohio are Sabbath-breakers?

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator allow me to suggest another fact, that in the Legislature of Pennsylvania yesterday an endeavor was made to secure an indorsement for the combination you have just made; and they were glad to lay it on the table.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. How does the gentleman know they were glad to lay it on the table? My own impression is that the body is sorry for its action to-day, and that before long it will indorse every act of both its Senators in this body.

Mr. BECK. It did not do so yesterday.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. They will do it in the future.

Mr. BECK. After you get there you may make them do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. No.

Mr. BECK. They will not do it without.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, I have been silent during this debate, but when I noticed in the papers of this morning a statement that I was one of the conservatives who rather advocated in the republican caucus yesterday that we should back down, I thought I would take occasion to say that I have no right to tell what I did say in caucus, but I have a right to tell what I did not say, and I now tell you, Mr. President, that I have no disposition to back any on the present issue, nor have I ever had any. As long as I live I will never by any act of mine consent to the adoption of any act or rule which recognizes the theory that the majority does not rule in this country. The principle that the majority must rule lies at the very foundation of the theory of our government.

The duty which we are trying to do now is a constitutional duty. The Constitution of the United States says we shall elect our officers. I would have been glad had the present officers been left in their places. I would be glad, indeed, if the other side would admit the right of the majority to rule, to yield them the chairmanship of my committee. Mr. President, I would not hold the chairmanship of my committee if I felt that I held it in an improper way.

Mr. BECK. One other suggestion. Does the Senator remember how persistently he sat with his arms folded the three last nights of the recent session of the last Congress rather than allow an executive session?

Mr. BURNSIDE. Yes; I remember it.

Mr. BECK. Have you repented since then? [Laughter.]

Mr. BURNSIDE. Yes. [Laughter.] There are many members on your side of the Chamber and on this side to whom I have said that I would never do such a thing again as long as I held a seat in the Senate. I was very much ashamed of it.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I wish to ask the Senator from Rhode Island a question, because there is no man in this country, republican or democrat, for whom I have more respect. The Senator says that he will adhere to the rule that majorities must always govern. Now, I will not deny the correctness of that proposition. I think this is a constitutional government and not a majority government; but concede it to be true as a general proposition that majorities ought to govern, I put this question to the Senator: If he honestly believed in his conscience that this side of the Chamber had obtained one majority by illegitimate means would he then consent to the government of that majority?

Mr. BURNSIDE. I would not have consented to the formation of committees; I would have contested the question to the end of my term if I thought there was fraud.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Suppose the Senator should come to the conclusion that as the Senate was called together for the transaction of certain executive business, and that executive business could not be transacted without the appointment of committees, and he should yield whatever feeling he might have on the question of the morality of the thing in deference to the public interest and the public business, would that obligate him to consent to the consummation of what he believed—not what I will say is—to be a bargain in the appointment of the officers of the Senate to interfere with a State election? Would he yield to it?

Mr. BURNSIDE. I will answer the Senator from Georgia. His question is a long one; but I will say that if I sat on that side of the Chamber as he does, and believed there was fraud on this side, and I had consented to this side of the Chamber doing what has been done, I would have felt myself a participant in that fraud. Now I want to ask the Senator a question. Does he believe there is a single Senator on this side of the Chamber who would accept the chairmanship of a committee that had been assigned to him by fraud or would engage in any fraudulent transaction of that kind? Now, sir, I want to know that, and if there is such a one, I want to know who he is.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Well, Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from Rhode Island ought to ask me whether I believe——

Mr. BURNSIDE. That is a plain question, and had it been asked by the Senator from Georgia as to his side of the Chamber I would have said no, not one Senator on that side of the Chamber, do I think, would be guilty of a fraud in order to obtain a committee chairmanship, or in order to obtain an office in the Senate. Now the Senator can answer me as he pleases.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator will allow me to answer, if he pleases.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Certainly.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will say to him that he can with perfect propriety answer a question which I would not ask him, if he chooses to do so. I would not ask the honorable Senator——

Mr. BURNSIDE. I think the question ought to be answered.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Let me get through answering, if you please.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Of course.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I would not ask that Senator whether he in his conscience believes that there is any Senator on this side of the floor who would be a party to a bargain or would accept the profits of a bargain. I would not ask that question, because it would be an improper question to ask and an improper question to answer. I therefore will not give an improper answer to an improper question; but I will say this to the Senator: I do in my conscience believe that the majority on that side has been procured by illegitimate means.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, now I will answer the Senator from Georgia in this way: he has no right to ask me the question I asked him, because I have never made a charge of fraud against Senators, but the Senator has made the charge——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have made no charge.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Why, sir, you made it this moment, this very moment. Now, I have a right to ask you whether you believe there is a Senator on this side of the Chamber who would be guilty of fraud? No man can ask me such a question as that, because I have made no such charge.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. There is no foundation for you to make such a charge.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Your side of the Chamber is immaculate. I say there is no foundation for me to make such a charge. I accept just what the Senator says, and I say there is no foundation for him to make such a charge.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Well, I say this to the Senator: if he will contrive to get an honest jury of twelve men in this country together so that the issue can be tried, I am willing to go before a jury upon the question. I have not the slightest doubt we shall get a verdict of guilty.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Senator's great powers before a jury are well known to the whole country, and I am not disposed in the least degree to depreciate them. I will venture to say that he can get a verdict of a jury that I cannot get. He possesses great skill and power before a jury and he has had experience in pleading causes. I am not arguing on that basis. I am not a lawyer. I am arguing as a plain citizen of the United States and as a Senator, and I say that I would make no such charge in reference to that side of the Chamber unless I felt that I could prove it. It is a grave charge, and if true we on this side are in the position of felons, occupying chairmanships of committees which do not belong to us.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. If the Senator honestly believed that there was an illegitimate bargain, he would not say he did not believe it.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I would not say I did not believe it if I did believe it, and I would not hold the chairmanship of my committee a moment if I did believe it.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I say to the honorable Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. BURNSIDE] that I recognize in him a fair and honorable opponent; I do not think that he at any time desires to place those who differ from him in a false position; and therefore it is that I always listen to that which he has to say with respect and to respond to it in a worthy spirit. I would like, Mr. President, but not this afternoon, to place this question, in regard to which the two sides of the Chamber confront each other in equal numbers, in the strongest light of fact, of reason, of justice, and of law and walk with you my brother Senators on the other side, to the bar of public opinion to be there tried by such canons as we all can respect, whether or not we are justified in the attitude and action we have adopted or whether you are to be sustained in the attitude and action which you have adopted. The question is grave; it is one of importance as all questions are of importance that touch the public business of the American people. There is nothing trivial in such interests. The time that we spend here and the topics that we discuss are all of worth and all of importance, or they should be. I would have wished this altercation of votes to have ceased. In my judgment you on the other side of the Chamber should have brought a cessation. If I had not thought our action was right and defensible and grounded upon sound consideration of public interest, I should not have embarked in it, nor should I have remained in it. I believe that it is in my power, feeble though that is, to show to a disinterested and fair tribunal that we are justified in every way, justified in all lights in which we have a right to consider public business, in standing where we have stood for the past week and insisting upon the reconsideration of the matters that we have asked to have reconsidered.

I will not detain the Senate now. I will speak when I do speak, not to the prejudices of either side of the Chamber. I shall try to meet this case as though it might be mine, standing where the republican members of the Senate now stand in regard to it; and if I cannot stand in my mind upon that ground I shall be content to give it up. Until my views change upon that point I shall stand where I have stood for the last week. I will open the argument; I will submit nothing but reason; I shall not seek to arouse prejudice or passion upon either side; because this is public business; and private ambitions, personal arrangements, and party advantage ought to fade away before the demands of the American people that their representatives should deal with public questions in a spirit worthy of the circumstances.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] for whose opinions I have learned to entertain a sincere respect, as it seems to me for the first time recognizes the importance of the question in which we are engaged. As to whether the gentlemen who now occupy their seats as clerks and perform the duties of Sergeant-at-Arms should continue to hold those offices, that is a matter of very little moment. The American people would look upon a contest which involved nothing but the possession of these few offices with a great deal of indifference, and would think that this "grave and reverend" body, the most important political body in the world, was indulging in a very weak and foolish work if it were engaged simply in dividing these offices.

But, Mr. President, I recognize that there is something back of all this. There is a principle which lies at the foundation of republican institutions, a principle that is recognized in the House of Commons and in every deliberative body in the world, and that is, that a majority of any body must decide every question that comes before it. While minorities have certain rights, those rights are defined by precept and by example. Here a majority—it may be but of one—is in favor of a change of the officers of this body; they have so said over and over again by repeated votes. If that was but a majority dependent upon the casting vote of the Vice-President, it would be a constitutional majority; but it is more than such a constitutional majority. It is a majority of Senators without respect to the vote of the Vice-President. Counting every vote, there is a majority of one or two in favor of acting upon the pending resolution, and that has been expressed in every vote. That Nestor of the law, if not a Nestor in politics, who has distinguished the Supreme Court by his learning and ability, has stated to you, his associates on some of these questions, that this matter was settled by the action upon the organization of the committees of the body.

Now, how do we stand? A majority say that they think it is their right and their duty to change the officers of this body. Does anybody question the right of the majority to elect the officers as they choose? No; because the Constitution plainly writes out the broadest authority to the Senate to elect its own officers in its own way, in its own time, and in its own manner. A majority has repeatedly expressed the wish that that duty should be performed; and the minority say "No, you shall not do that, but you shall do something else." Perhaps they are wise; perhaps they are right. It is a matter of indifference to my present purpose whether they are right or wrong, the question is, Who shall determine the order of business in this deliberative body?

I say to the Senator from Delaware that when he comes to debate this question at length I can show him precedents without number where the House of Commons upon a tie vote, or with a majority of one, have changed and upset a government. A majority of one is as good as a majority of fifty. We know that in popular elections, sometimes in great States, the majority has turned upon a single vote. In my own State governors have been elected and legislatures have been organized upon a popular majority of less than 1 in 400. A presidential election has turned upon such a majority. Any majority is a majority; you cannot stop to argue the amount of the majority. That is the foundation rock upon which all republican institutions rest. It is because the republics south of us on the American continent have disregarded this law that they have never been able to establish a stable government in any of those southern republics. It is because in England that is regarded as the foundation of their political fabric that governments have been so changed that a single vote in the House of Commons has turned an administration out and put a new one in.

I say that majority has here been announced in repeated votes. What right has the minority, then? It has important rights. The rights of the minority ought to be protected and subserved. Therefore ordinary motions of delay have been allowed to be interposed time out of mind. I have sat here during many a long, weary night session to allow the minority to speak until they were exhausted, because the right of debate and of free discussion is another kindred and great right of every republic. Every man in the Senate has refused to impose any limit on debate, and therefore we have sat out the debate, and staid here for twenty-four hours at a time to hear the minority speak and to place upon record their opinion. But when the minority members are all through and the debate is ended, the vote must come, whatever the majority may be. So with other questions; the minority have the right to procrastinate; they would even have a right to make delay, as I think we were justified in causing some delay when, owing to the accidental absence of members of the Senate, the Senate was not full in the earlier portion of this session; but when the Senate is full, and when debate is exhausted, there is the end to all the powers of the minority; then the majority must speak and say what shall be done, and the voice of the majority is the voice of God so far as this body can express the voice of the Deity.

The Senator may look through all the records of English precedents, through all the records of our own precedents, he may bring his powerful mind to bear upon the question and he cannot throw any light upon it because it is as clear as day now. Fair opportunity may be given to the minority to express itself in debate, to speak its voice, to delay until the Senate is full; after that the majority must speak. It will not do for the minority to say "now you had better go into executive session and transact other business that is important;" it is for the majority to decide; and when the attempt of the majority to do what they wish is resisted by parliamentary proceedings the minority abuse those parliamentary proceedings. Those proceedings and rules were intended to guard the minority in the right to debate, in the right to a fair discussion, in the right to a fair vote; but when these are gained, that is the end of their rights properly considered.

I was glad to hear my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. BURNSIDE] say one thing, and I underwrite every word of it. I do not believe that any Senator who is sitting here in his seat has a right to withhold his vote in order to reduce the body to less than a quorum. I think it is a violation of the plain rules of the Senate, and I would not do it under any circumstances. That has been tried by both political parties. There was one occasion in 1858, when I was a member of the other House, when some of the republican Senators, on account of their bitter opposition to what was called the Lecompton bill, refused to vote on that bill and left the Senate without a quorum. What was done? My old colleague, Mr. Wade, declined to vote, as did other leading Senators, and the consequence was that the Senate was left without a quorum. What was the result? The roll was called. It was found that Senators were present and not voting. The President of the Senate announced that there were Senators in the Hall who had failed to vote, and he directed the names of those Senators to be called. They were called by name, and the minority of the Senate, then republican, voted and made a quorum, and the business proceeded. Suppose they had refused to vote and thus had defeated action upon an important measure and stopped the wheels of Government, everybody would have said they had done wrong.

So, again, in another case, that is perfectly familiar to my friend from Delaware, when a motion was made in 1870 or 1871, I think, (I may not get the dates correctly, but it was some time ago,) to take up a force bill, or some bill that the minority was very much opposed to, and the minority refused to vote, and left the majority without a quorum on account of the absence of Senators.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator do the minority of that day the justice to say——

Mr. SHERMAN. I will do that in a moment. Then the same proceedings were had, and then the Senator from Delaware properly and rightly responded to his name; and he and some of his associates made a quorum, and the business proceeded. Am I correct in that?

Those were the only times in American history where this unnatural, unconstitutional, and improper interference with the rights of the majority ever occurred in this body, I think, except at the close of the last Congress. As I was not a member of that body then, I have nothing to say about that. The object was to gain time, I am told, but I am not here to defend it. I only say that while I am a member of the Senate, whether of the majority or minority, I shall cast my vote, giving it, if I am allowed to do so, at the time when it is called for.

Mr. President, the minority have certain rights to gain time to get a fair vote. They have no right to use their powers as a minority so as to disorganize the body, to refuse to vote and leave it without a quorum. The rules plainly allow them to gain time, but the minority have no right to use our rules, intended to protect them in securing a fair debate and a fair vote, so as to stop the wheels of Government or to prevent the majority from the orderly exercise of their constitutional power to govern the body while they have the majority.

Here is the whole law of the case. I might, if I chose to do it, enter into an argument to show that this majority was fairly obtained. I am glad to co-operate with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE,] and glad to have him co-operate with me. I believe that this movement of his will be the dawning of a better day for the South, when that "solid South" now represented on the other side almost as a hostile section shall be broken, and when American politics shall cease to be sectional and become national, when parties will be divided on broad issues which will not endanger the peace and safety of the country. It will be better for the South, and I welcome him as an avant courier, if you please, of many more who I hope will follow to break down the sectionalism of American politics, and to secure equal rights and equal civil and political privileges to all men.

There are rights of the minority, and no man would respect them more than I; but there are rights and duties of the majority. The only reason why I have any feeling about this matter is because the majority have made a decision that they will transact a little business; which need not take over five minutes to pass upon, and that is resisted in the manner we have witnessed. Whether the gentlemen who are the incumbents should hold their offices now or should give them up in December ceases to be significant at all. The issue is whether the majority here, no matter whether one or more, shall order the course of business, shall say what questions shall be presented, what questions shall be decided, and what the Senate will do. If the minority can say that the majority shall not do this but they must do something else, the minority may say that they will block the wheels of Government, stay here until December until the majority give up their idea of what is their duty; and in that I submit the minority are in the wrong.

I would not give the snap of my finger as to whether these gentlemen should hold their seats until December or not. They have all been spoken of kindly. I am glad to hear a universal expression of good will in regard to these gentlemen. We should all be very willing to give them their salary from now until December, do anything that is fair and right, generous and liberal to them; but when it is asked of us that we must surrender the right that we have here as a majority to dictate the course of proceedings, I feel that we are justified in standing where we are and in not yielding to a minority; that it would be of evil example for them to gain their point in this respect; it would be of evil example in the future and would come back perhaps some time to "plague the inventors." I would say to the minority, "exercise your right, speak fully and freely, denounce what we are doing as much as you choose, make public opinion, if you can; take as much time as is necessary for that purpose; but when that opposition is exhausted, then let the majority decide and act, and abuse them afterward as much as you choose."

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I wish to express my gratification that at last one voice has been heard from the other side of the Chamber in reprobation of that which I conscientiously believe to be not only a gross breach of the rules of this body but in its very nature revolutionary; I mean the practice of preventing by silence the decision of a measure which had been proposed, debated, and remained only to be decided. I am glad that one republican voice has at last been heard in this Chamber denouncing such a practice, which was almost universal at the last session of Congress on that side of the Chamber. It was time, sir, for that denunciation to come. Those who felt the pinch of the shoe have at last proclaimed it. I would that it had come earlier. Why did it not come at the last session of Congress? We witnessed here the refusal, deliberate, repeated hour after hour, almost night after night, of an admitted minority to obey the rules of the Senate or to allow the public business of the Senate to be transacted according to its rules. When the appeal was made and when the rule was read, there was not one man who rose in his seat on that side of the Chamber to say, "This is wrong and we cannot follow it." I am glad it has come now. I welcome ever the decision of any question upon a principle that shall bind and be enduring, and, gentlemen on that side, I will meet and discuss with you this present issue that divides us, on the ground of principle, and reason, and parliamentary law, and constitutional right, which lies at the basis of it all.

When this session opened and we found that there was a constitutional majority of this body assembled, I then said that a duty devolved upon them that they could not shirk or abandon. On the other side it was said, "Not so, you must wait for more than a constitutional majority; you must wait for a roll-call that shall be answered to the last man." I said, "Not so; it is neither in your rule, nor is it the law, nor is it the Constitution; whenever more than a majority of this Chamber shall assemble and answer a roll-call, under the Constitution they are authorized to proceed, and it is their duty to proceed to the execution of public business." But you said, "Not so," and under the rules you interposed the same motions of a dilatory character which the rules of the body allowed you and which the Government of the country justified you in proposing. It became a question of sound public discretion whether the interposition of dilatory motions is or is not within the spirit of the law. Who shall judge of that? At what bar shall you try the question whether you are justified in insisting upon the rules of debate or not? Constitutions were made for minorities. They may be inconvenient to the strides of power but they were meant to check them. The question is whether they shall be interposed justifiably or unjustifiably, and there you touch the conscience of legislators; you submit that to the public conscience; and on that we propose to stand.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] cannot intend to state the responsibility and the rights of a majority more strongly than I urged them or sought to urge them three or four weeks ago in this Chamber, but unavailingly. I say to-day this is a government of majorities, and you may not measure the rights of a majority by its weight of numbers. I agree that for all the purposes of lawful legislation and controlling responsibility a majority of one is as good as of twenty. I speak now of the theory, the principle, of our Government. Nay, I will go further and say that where the numbers of the Senate stand equal and the Constitution has given to the Vice-President the right of casting the vote that shall decide between them, I hold that a law passed by his casting vote is as binding as a law that is passed by a majority of two-thirds, if you please.

That is not the question. I am not denying the question of your responsibility as to government. I am questioning what our duty is and what our rights are as a minority to put checks upon the action of the majority as authorized by law, and by reason, and by justice, and, gentlemen, by honor.

I think as a question of fact the honorable Senator from Ohio is in error when he says that there is a majority—I speak now of a numerical majority—on that side of the Chamber in opposition to the Senate proceeding to the consideration and transaction of the only business for which we were convened. If I mistake not, the vote of the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS,] not now in his seat, has been steadily cast in his presence here in favor of preferring the business for which we were called to that which (I do not speak it disrespectfully) has been dictated by the action of a party caucus. I say here that the honorable Senator from Illinois has voted with me and those with whom I vote over and over again in favor of proceeding to the consideration of executive business; so that there stands in this Chamber a precisely balanced number of votes, granting to the other side from that on which I stand the assistance constantly and steadily of the Senator from Virginia last sworn in. There stands a precisely even number of votes, and I grant that that division can be decided lawfully, properly, by the vote of the Vice-President, which we have had proven to us will not be wanting on the occasion and on all occasions.

But I do not want now to pass into the consideration of the facts which are the basis and I think the justification of the acts of the thirty-eight Senators who sit on this side and vote steadily to proceed to the consideration of executive business. There are facts which are public facts, which are facts of which we shall take what is termed in the courts "judicial notice," which are facts of which we must take actual notice as affecting our duty, our rights, in dealing with the gentlemen who assist us in a subordinate capacity to conduct the public business in this Chamber. I do not propose this afternoon to go into these matters; but I do not know but that now as I have the floor and the time is given me it may be well to make the point to you, my brother Senators on the other side, as well as at any other time.

In the first place, do not forget that in last November thirty-nine of the members of this body voted for Hancock and English. No matter where was your Vice-President then or who he was, whether Mr. English or the present occupant of that high office, thirty-nine men who took the oath at that desk and stand here under it had openly and publicly proclaimed themselves in favor of the election of the candidates of that party with whom these four elective officers of the Senate are, and are justly supposed to be, in sympathy and accord. I say thirty-nine voted for the candidates of that party. There is no doubt about that. The positions are well known of those two gentlemen in this Chamber whose votes have by accident of numbers been peculiarly and importantly conspicuous. It is known that both of them wrote and spoke and declared themselves in all manner of earnest and unmistakable ways in favor of the election of the democratic candidates for President and Vice-President. Is not that so? No one can deny it.

You have come into a session called for the purpose of the transaction of executive business only, to ratify certain treaties which have been sent to the Government of the United States, to pass upon the nominations of the incoming administration. I say to you that except for cause specially declared, for well understood reasons, the unwritten history of this body, or rather the written history and the unwritten law of this body, has never undertaken to remove your officers at such a time and when the Senate is called for such a purpose. If you show me a case, I will show you that it is an exception which proves the rule. I have stated the fact that never in the history of the dealings of the Senate of the United States with those gentlemen who assist it in the transaction of their public duties have they been removed at an executive session except for cause; and no cause is suggested in the present case. No cause will be suggested beyond the caprice, if I may call it so, the mere absolute, arbitrary will of those who propose now for the first time in our history to reverse the current of the Senate's action. Therefore all precedent is with us in saying it ought not to be done at this special session.

May I not say one word to each of my associates in this Chamber as men, worthy men, kind-hearted men, fair men dealing with individuals in the spirit that self-respect and justice dictate—may I not say one word against the proposition, suddenly and unexpectedly, to dislodge faithful and competent men from places of duty which they are filling satisfactorily and admitted by you to be so filling? Is it not fair, gentlemen, that he who has worked in the noon-tide and sun should enjoy the shades of evening and a little repose? Is it fair, or just, or kind for you, unexpectedly and without a notice to quit, to turn out men on the eve of the vacation and the repose they have fairly earned, and bring in those who are to reap the harvest for which they have neither plowed nor sown?

Not one of the persons who is to be affected is there in answer to my demand; I mean my personal demand; nor any demand for that matter; because very early, I proclaimed to the Senate two years ago that I was not disposed to ask the politics of any employé of the Senate whom I found here if he had served long and faithfully in his office; and the record stands there to sustain what I then said. Is it well? I know that I speak right to men who individually would not do this thing by their private employés; nor ought we to do it with many of these gentleman, distant from their homes, surprised by the unexpected turn of events; for who could tell or who would have foretold that public men who openly had avowed the support of the party that has placed these gentlemen in office would instantly have disclosed a transfer of their political allegiance in the Senate of the United States, and that to follow instantly by the ejection from office of those who had been guilty of the same crime with themselves, voting, I take it according to their consciences, for the nominees of one or the other of the great political parties? Oh, gentlemen, suspend your action!

I do not know that we differ upon the principle of the right and duty of majorities. I am ready and willing to bow to the decision of the majority, subject to those qualifications which belong of right to every minority, the grounds of which I do not propose this evening to embark upon, for I look upon the question as one of very grave public interest and of very grave importance; but I wish simply to put it to you upon what I may call that humane ground of fair dealing, of common courtesy, and, not meaning the word unpleasantly, of decent behavior by those who have been associated with us in carrying on the public business. Is it right at the end of a session where they have worked as we did, when they as we expected to be released, to have some little season for attention to our own affairs and repose from the strain and anxiety which public affairs cast upon the mind of every man, or ought to cast upon the mind of every man who finds a seat in this Chamber—is it right and just to say to them, "the holiday which you have earned shall be enjoyed by a new set of men?" Do you think it right? Is it fair? Is it kind? Oh, no, gentlemen; it is none of the three; and permit me to say, I trust that you will so feel it.

If there was a vacancy I should bow to the deciding vote of the Vice-President, although I believe an argument could be made against his power to organize the Senate. Still, I should be obliged to bow to that vote as though a large majority were on that side and made his vote unnecessary. But no such thing exists. There is no vacancy, and none is needed. I do not say there is not the power to put an end to the term of any man here, with or without cause; but I do hold up to you an unbroken course of precedents of the body and say to you that you ought not to do this thing even if you could.

That phase of this subject is all I mean to show to you. It is not its most important one, but I say to Senators it is very important to a number of estimable and excellent men who have offended no one, who have pleased every one, who have done their duty; and I simply ask that if the inexorable ax of party shall fall upon their heads, suspend that weapon until at least the usual time for decapitation shall come.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that the objection of the Senator to immediate action upon the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts is that certain worthy employés of the Senate will be deprived of the pecuniary compensation which they may draw during the vacation according to existing law. I wish to ask the Senator this question: If it may be provided, as it would be by the unanimous consent of every republican Senator present, that these gentlemen shall be properly compensated for their time, liberally compensated for their time, as he must have heard the proposition already suggested from this side of the Chamber, will opposition then be withdrawn to the passage of the resolution?

Mr. BAYARD. I thought that I had stated with great clearness (I certainly intended to do so) that I was discussing that phase of the question only, and I consider it the minor phase.

Mr. BLAIR. I did not understand that the Senator was discussing any other question.

Mr. BAYARD. But I simply say to the Senator that the idea of buying the consent of the thirty-eight Senators who have been voting against this proposition with the pay of these half dozen or score of employés, to my mind would never be considered for an instant.

Mr. BLAIR. But does not the Senator offer that as the reason for his opposition? Does he not suggest the proposition——

Mr. BAYARD. I was looking at the case from the side of the employés but I could not disconnect it from something——

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator present any other aspect of the question?

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator pardon me? I cannot disconnect it from another proposition far graver, far deeper, far more important, which I think does attach itself to this subject. I will say that much as I might feel personal sympathy with the inconvenience or loss of some of these employés who are distant from their homes and who are suddenly and without notice to be ejected and evicted from places which they have so acceptably held, as far as that goes, while I might be distressed, while I might feel that I ought to draw upon my own pecuniary resources to make good to them a hardship, I would not have felt justified by that in the amount of opposition that I have already exhibited by my votes here to the control of the Senate's officers. That would not be it. I do not propose, therefore, and cannot disconnect this subject. I will agree, I think there is enough in what I have said to make you pause, gentlemen, upon your sudden ejection of these employés, simply considering the case from their own point of view; but there is much more than that, and I must discuss that at another time. It is grave; I propose to discuss it gravely, not passionately, but in a manner that I mean to be satisfactory to myself; not to-day. There is a great deal more in this subject. There is a very grave question of high discretion how far the events before this body contained in your resolutions, contained in the open declarations of gentlemen on that side of the Chamber, contained in the historic facts of the last election, are to justify us in saying the proposition you have made to control the election in Virginia next fall by the patronage of the United States Senate is something that we cannot and that we ought not to hesitate in preventing. That is the question. I do not wish to discuss that, because I do not propose an unjust or an uncivil impugnment of motive anywhere.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BAYARD. Pardon me a moment; directly. But I wish to arrange these facts, and to arrange these propositions satisfactorily to my mind, and I hope, my friends on the other side, with some effect upon your minds, to know whether or not we are justified in interposing the delays and the checks upon your majority, no matter how small or great or how composed, but upon your majority. That is the question. It is a high question of conscience. It is a question of grave responsibility, because I have been taught to believe, and I have tried all my life to subordinate my action to the doctrine, that the man who violates a principle is in great danger, for he never may tell when the chalice may be returned to his own lips. That is what I wish to avoid, and that is what I wish to see my way clear to avoid; and it is by that light and on that principle that I propose to put my vote in this matter of difference between the two sides of the Chamber. Now my friend from Illinois may ask me the question he rose to ask.

Mr. LOGAN. It is this: The Senator spoke about the arrangement by which the politics of Virginia were to be changed by the patronage of the Senate. I know of no arrangement of that kind. Will the Senator state before the Senate that the mere fact of electing a Sergeant-at-Arms who lives in the State of Virginia alarms him about a change of the politics of Virginia?

Mr. BAYARD. That is not it.

Mr. LOGAN. I understood the Senator to say that it would have an effect upon the politics of Virginia, and therefore they should resist it. I so understood the Senator.

Mr. BAYARD. No; it is not that.

Mr. LOGAN. What is it, then?

Mr. BAYARD. It is not the amount of goods that is stolen; it is whether they have been dishonestly taken. That is the question.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BAYARD. Understand me; I am answering one Senator. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me to answer that Senator; and then I shall answer him with great pleasure.

Mr. BLAIR. I supposed the Senator's answer was made.

Mr. BAYARD. I will give way in one moment.

Mr. BLAIR. I merely observed that I supposed the answer had been made.

Mr. BAYARD. I cannot answer both questions at once.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will excuse me for explaining that I am not asking him a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware declines to yield.

Mr. BLAIR. I am merely explaining the reason why I proposed to ask a question, that I supposed the Senator from Illinois had been already answered. I meant no discourtesy to the Senator from Delaware whatever.

Mr. BAYARD. I beg the Senator's pardon; I was listening to the Senator from Illinois and I did not hear precisely what the Senator from New Hampshire said.

Mr. BLAIR. Then, with the leave of the Senator, I will state once more that I understood the question of the Senator from Illinois to be fully answered, and I desired leave to ask another, not to interrupt the Senator in his answer to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. BAYARD. No, I do not know that the Senator from Illinois was fully answered, because there was more that I thought of. He asked me, as I understood him, whether I thought the appointment of a Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate would affect the election in the State of Virginia. Am I right in that?

Mr. LOGAN. That is substantially correct. I said the politics of the State of Virginia instead of the election in Virginia.

Mr. BAYARD. I will say that it is not the amount of the offense, it is the principle of the offense; it is whether a man will connect himself with an offense either by non-action or by failure to oppose it. That is the place where I think I and my associates in this Chamber stand. But I say this to the Senator with all frankness: if in the providence of Almighty God the State of Virginia, that has been sanctified by the name of Washington, and Jefferson, and Madison, and Monroe, has so lost its conscience as to be impelled one way or the other by a handful of beggarly patronage, may God have mercy upon its people. I do not for one moment believe it; but that is not the question. We stand here to make our examples before the country by our votes, our declarations, and our acts; and if I supposed there has been that which the American people can believe and must logically believe to have been a tergiversation in politics for personal ends, which breaks up the simple good faith among the people, I would feel myself delinquent if I did not stand here, always permitted by the rules of the Chamber, to denounce and oppose it; that is, my share of it, and that is all. It cannot pass sub silentio without my——

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to indicate what I meant? I thought the Senator intended to convey the idea that our action would have some effect upon the politics of Virginia. I could not see myself what sort of effect it would have upon the politics of Virginia or the politics of any other State, so far as the mere election of an officer of the Senate was concerned, and if that was the point I could not understand it. If the Senator agrees that the mere election of a man as Sergeant-at-Arms cannot affect either Virginia or any other State, as he says, I ask him what principle there is now in contesting this question that would not be involved in the same contest in December next? If the principle is so near to the hearts of the democratic party that it is a principle upon which they fight, and not merely a struggle for the spoils, would not the same principle exist next December that exists now in opposing this election?

Mr. BAYARD. It is a question of principle, and I am not at all disposed to say that there would not and might not be the same objection to an individual nominee if he was the incarnation of a dangerous principle, or was the result of any arrangement which of itself was deleterious in politics, next December as now.

Mr. LOGAN. Do you say there would not be?

Mr. BAYARD. I did not say there would not be, but this question should be by that time sufficiently emphasized whether or not the discretion and the duty and the responsibility which rests upon what you are pleased to call the minority in this body, which means your equal half in numbers, had been discharged. We might then think that we had pressed the matter far enough to throw upon you the responsibility and upon us the right to make the objection, which becomes a matter of sound discretion as they say at law. I do not mean to say that, for I only speak for the present.

I rather regret that I have entered upon the discussion, even upon the threshold of the discussion which I have foreshadowed. I wish in speaking of this case to do so fairly, justly, and delicately; therefore I should like to do it with the papers before me; I mean the speeches before me; I mean the RECORD before me. I do not wish to speak lightly or irresponsibly about matters so grave as these. I think, and believe my friend comprehends that there is a great deal here to engage the interest and attention of the men who love the American Government and believe that its chief safety is in the respect and honor that the American people feel for it in their hearts.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me—I do not wish to interfere with the thread of his remarks at all—I desire to call his attention to two propositions: First, as I understood the line of his argument, the objection of the democrats to the election now is, taking a charitable side of it, that it would throw these gentlemen, against whom nothing has been said, out of employment for the time being.

Mr. BAYARD. It is a kindly view.

Mr. LOGAN. That is what I say. That is one point I understood the Senator to make. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that on the second or third day of this debate I read in the hearing of the Senate, and said then my reason for reading it was to call attention to the action of the Senate in 1853, when at an executive session the Senate proceeded to re-elect its officers except one. For that one they provided by resolution that for the rest of the term he should be paid. I called the attention of the Senate to that so that Senators could draw such inferences as they saw proper from that reading. If the first objection the Senator makes is merely for the salary, that is certainly not a question that the Senate should be held here upon week after week. That objection might be disposed of. The second objection of the Senator, as I understood him, is that the election of certain officers (I will not say officers, but of one officer) might involve a great principle for which or against which, either one, the democracy would contend. My question to the Senator was this: The first proposition having been answered by a mere suggestion, the second proposition that a principle was involved dear and near to the democracy of this country in their judgment in reference to the manner in which this Government should be ruled and controlled—if that principle is dear to them now what could transpire between now and December to make that principle less dear to them then? That is the proposition.

Mr. BAYARD. It becomes a question of time.

Mr. LOGAN. It is not a question of time in my judgment, I will say to the Senator. He will permit me to say that if there is nothing which could change the principle between now and then, the necessity would be just as plain for the action of the democracy in the same line they are pursuing now that it is to-day.

Mr. McPHERSON. When that question comes we will consider it.

Mr. LOGAN. What question?

Mr. McPHERSON. The question of electing the officers of the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. My dear sir, if you propose to keep this up until December the question will then be on you just as it is now, will it not?

Mr. McPHERSON. Then we will consider it.

Mr. LOGAN. Consider what?

Mr. McPHERSON. The question.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir, that is not it; it is the principle that is involved that is dear to you now that causes you to do what you are doing. Will that principle change between now and the 1st of December? That is what I desire to ask, and that is what I meant by the interrogatory to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BAYARD. May I state one fact, if the Senator will allow me? It is a very important proposition. I remember the honorable Senator from Illinois did read the precedent of 1853. I believe the historical treatment of the question is that prior to 1849 and up to that date it had been the rule of the Senate to elect their officers every two years, although as a matter of fact they had wisely gone on and re-elected those who had proved themselves to be fit and worthy. In 1849, upon the motion of Mr. Benton, that principle was put an end to, and they proceeded to repeal that rule and that practice and to order what you may call a continuing tenure of office; but it is the fact that in 1853 and in all those cases in which at extra sessions officers were deposed, it was in every case because they were under charges. I would not wish to say now anything that might wound the feelings of any one who had been an officer, but the Senator will find as a matter of fact that where there was no objection to the officer and no cause for removal there was no disturbance. That is the fact.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I will not attempt to answer the mythical and mysterious argument that my friend from Delaware promises to give us upon some grave question affecting conscience and morals. I wish to call his attention now again to the points already made.

When the Senator from Delaware concurred with me that a Senator cannot rightfully and properly withhold his vote if present he yielded the whole argument. Why? Why shall not a Senator refuse to vote? Simply because if that is done to any considerable extent it stops the wheels of Government; it prevents a quorum; it prevents the transaction of business. And he complains of certain action of that sort at the last Congress that it was revolutionary in its character; that it was unconstitutional; that it was everything that was bad. Why was it bad? Simply because it prevented the majority of the Senate at the last session from doing what they wanted to do; that is all. But the interposition of dilatory motions——

Mr. BAYARD. May I say to my friend there, as we desire to get at the truth——

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BAYARD. It was not only because it was wrong in itself and resulted in what he says, but another objection to it was because it was against the rules of the body. It is the difference between acting against the rules and acting in accordance with the rules. There are delays which are justifiable and provided for by the rules; but this was a delay or an obstruction which was not provided for by the rules, which was expressly forbidden by the rules, and which gave to a small number of men an absolute veto by sitting in their seats and refusing to vote, and the result of which would be under the present arrangement of parties in this Chamber, that, gentlemen, you never could pass a law, because you never in reason are likely to have even the number of votes necessary to do it. That is the difference.

Mr. SHERMAN. I intended to state that same thing. I say that this interposition of dilatory motions not for the purpose of bringing about an adjournment, not with any expectation of going into executive session, not with any desire of postponing the session until the 1st of December—this interposition of dilatory motions operates precisely like and is to the same extent dangerous, unconstitutional, and revolutionary, as the mere withholding of a vote. By two motions under our rules, without violating the rules, except the spirit of the rules, you might continue this session as long as our terms last. On the other hand, these dilatory motions are more dangerous, more revolutionary, more unconstitutional when carried to excess than the withholding of a vote. Forty men must withhold their votes to break up a quorum, but fifteen men in an ordinary vote, one-fifth of a quorum, can continue us here in perpetual session unless the majority will yield to the minority its right to regulate the proceedings of this body. So, then, Mr. President, when my friend from Delaware joins with me in condemning this habit of sitting in your seats and not voting, he condemns the whole process in which he has participated, because he has been pursuing that course now for nearly one month——

Mr. BAYARD. Oh, no.

Mr. SHERMAN. For three weeks, then.

Mr. BAYARD. Not for one-half the time in which the Senator's party continued the same thing.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was not here, but I am told that that continued during three days; but here it has been over two weeks; and not only that——

Mr. RANSOM. May I ask the Senator from Ohio a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly; only I did not intend to occupy time.

Mr. RANSOM. I simply desire to ask the Senator from Ohio if he did not indulge in the early part of this session in these same dilatory motions that he says this side of the Chamber has done?

Mr. SHERMAN. Undoubtedly; and there is one of the cases that I think is fairly covered by the rules.

Mr. RANSOM. Did the Senator block the wheels of Government then?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer my friend from North Carolina if he will wait a moment. During that period three Senators had been taken from this body either by death or by the action of the President and our action in confirming them. Until those seats were filled we had a right fairly to say that the committees ought not to be organized. If my colleague had not proposed to organize the committees, had allowed the matter to run on until those seats had been filled, there would have been no dilatory motions. All we did was to make dilatory motions so as to secure a full Senate; and there is one of the cases provided for by the rules. If members desire to debate a question, they have a right to make dilatory motions in order to prevent a vote before full debate has been had; or if some of their colleagues were absent, they may make dilatory motions until the Senators return, or as in our case, where three men had been taken suddenly from this body and their seats could not be filled for ten days, we had fairly a right to say to the other side, "Do not take any important action affecting the organization of the body until these seats are full."

Now, Mr. President, every seat is full; every Senator is elected; there is no contest; and a majority of one or two on every test vote has been in favor of acting on the resolution, which will take but a single vote, and that will open the way to the business of the session. Now, it seems to me that when my friend from Delaware concurred with me as to my opinion in regard to withholding a vote, he gave away the whole argument.

What else is said? What do you gain by it? What right have you to say that we shall not change the officers of the body? You say it is an unimportant matter; you appeal to our sympathies. Well, sir, I am glad to hear the Senator from Delaware appealing to our sympathies. Let him do that, and he will find that we shall respond to the fullest extent of our power. As long as this is confined to argument, to remonstrance, to beseeching, if you please, to appeals to our feelings, to our manliness, to our sensibility, as a matter of course we will not only hear them but we will heed them and do whatever is thought to be right. It is when gentlemen interpose these dilatory motions which are revolutionary, unconstitutional, according to his own idea, that——

Mr. VANCE. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to ask a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; only I would rather the Senator would not interrupt me in the midst of a sentence which I was trying to utter. Still I will hear my friend from North Carolina with pleasure.

Mr. VANCE. I want to ask the Senator if a motion to go into executive session to act upon nominations made by the President is revolutionary?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, Mr. President; that motion is like a good many other innocent motions; a motion to adjourn——

Mr. VANCE. Will the Senator allow me further?

Mr. SHERMAN. One question at a time. Let me answer that. A motion to adjourn is a very innocent motion; a motion to go into executive session is a very innocent motion, but when those motions are made with a view to defeat the will of the majority and prevent them from going on with the business of the Senate according to its order, then it becomes dangerous, unconstitutional, and revolutionary. The simplest motions, these two alone repeated one after the other, like a parrot's cry, might compel the majority to yield to the minority as to the mode and manner of doing business, and Senators, let me say that if you establish as a precedent in this body that these dilatory motions can be used for any other purposes than those I have named, that is to get fair play, to get full debate, to get a full vote, you set an example more dangerous than was set at the last session of Congress by my political associates; more dangerous, because one-fifth of a quorum may interpose these dilatory motions, and one-fifth of a quorum may compel the Senate to forego its deliberate judgment and conclusion.

Mr. President, my friend from Delaware also misunderstood, or I did, the position taken by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.] If I heard his remarks correctly—and I think I listened to every word he said—he stated distinctly that the organization of the committees of the Senate carried with it the whole organization of the body, and he therefore said that so far as he was concerned he would vote for the first resolution to proceed to the organization of the body.

Mr. HAMPTON. May I remind the Senator of that gentleman's language?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HAMPTON. I simply desire to read the language of Judge DAVIS on the occasion to which the Senator from Ohio refers.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall be very glad to hear it.

Mr. HAMPTON. He said:

No principle was involved, but merely the control of committees and of officers. I have voted steadily against change, and I shall continue in that way until the end is reached, being answerable only to my conscience and to my constituents for this act.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senator from South Carolina mistakes the speech. The second speech of the Senator from Illinois is the one to which I refer, and not the first speech. The Senator from South Carolina reads from the first speech, as I understand, at the opening of the session; but in the second speech the Senator from Illinois said that the Senate having now adopted a resolution to change its committees, he thought the right to change the whole organization followed as a matter of course.

Mr. HAMPTON. This is the second speech, that of March 24.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have it all read, but the impression I have is the impression of all those around me, and the Senator from Illinois voted accordingly.

Mr BUTLER. No.

Mr. SHERMAN. The vote of the Vice-President since the organization of the committees has been cast in but a single case, I am sure.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. May I remind my friend from Ohio that the Senator from Illinois in every instance that he has voted here has voted to go into executive session; in not one single instance has he voted otherwise.

Mr. TELLER. But always against adjournments.

Mr. SHERMAN. He voted against adjournments and against all dilatory motions. He may, no doubt, have preferred to go into executive session; but he gave no countenance by his advice or by his action to these dilatory motions. Here is his language; I will read it——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. But he has always said, "I am ready to proceed to executive business."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is on the floor. If any other Senator desires it, he must get it through the Chair.

Mr. SHERMAN. Here is the language of the Senator from Illinois in his remarks of the 24th of March, as handed to me by a friend:

What my friend, the distinguished Senator from New York, properly calls "a constitutional majority" was disclosed when the Vice-President, not a member of this body, gave the casting voice for the committees. However fleeting or fractional that majority may be, we are commanded to accept it and to obey it.

The majority that chose the committees is fairly entitled to choose the officers of the Senate. One naturally goes with the other in order to perfect the organization. This conclusion will neither be delayed nor obstructed by any vote of mine, and it cannot be reached too soon for the public interest.

That is all that it is necessary for me to read. So you have not only the monition, the advice, but the example of this gentleman whom you commend so highly; and, sir, from the day that the Senator from Illinois made this speech, this side of the House has had a clear majority without respect to the action of the Vice-President. I say, therefore, to continue these dilatory motions is more dangerous, more unconstitutional, more revolutionary in every sense of the word, than the mere withholding by a Senator of a vote, because there must be almost a majority to withhold their votes to break a quorum, while in this case this dangerous play may go on by the action of fifteen Senators on that side of the House, or eight when we get down to the presence of a mere quorum.

Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware said that thirty-nine of the Senators on this floor had voted for Hancock at the last election. What has that to do with it? What right has he to say that because a man voted for Hancock he must follow the democratic party in all its sins of omission and commission? What right has he to dictate to a Senator? It seems to me that was an argument which rather fell beneath the weight and power of the Senator from Delaware. No, sir, when Senators come here they come here to represent States, and are responsible to States; and I have no doubt that in the future history of this country the brave example set by the Senator from Virginia will be extolled as we extol the great deeds of the famous heroes of that old Commonwealth. Sir, whoever leads in the advance of breaking up parties on sectional lines will do as much for his country as he who wins a battle or gains a victory.

But the last objection to which I will refer is the one that this is an extra session called for executive business. Well, sir, the President may call the Senate together; but when the Senate convenes it is the Senate with full power. Then the Senator quotes the example two years ago, when at an extra session his party overturned the officers who had been in office then for years. Two years ago that was done at an extra session of Congress, called only to pass a law for the support of the Army which the previous Congress had failed to pass. If the Senator's argument is good for anything, it shows that that Congress should have confined itself only to the passage of that bill, only to the making of provisions for the Army; but did my democratic friends think of that doctrine at that time? Were they bound by the call of the President or by his message to confine their action to the subjects-matter recommended in his message? Not at all. They came here as a Senate and postponed for a long time the passage of the Army bill, took a long time before they got through with that essential measure; but they soon proceeded to change the officers of this body. That party did it the moment it came in power, within six days I am told—I thought there was a longer interval—but within a brief time after it came into power, against the protest, against the votes of the members on this side of the House, but without any motions to adjourn, without any dilatory proceedings, it changed the officers of this body.

Sir, I had no purpose at all to engage in this debate. I believe the spectacle we have presented during this last month will not be satisfactory to our constituents on either side. The people of the United States believe that this Senate ought to organize and proceed to business. They think we ought to go into executive session; but they think we ought to go into executive session at the will of a majority, and not of the will of a minority. They know that the republican party here is responsible for action in this body as I hope it will be in the other House. Therefore it is but meet and proper according to parliamentary law, according to the usages of our fathers, that the majority should dictate the order of proceedings and the business; and for the minority to say that they will let us act upon disputed nominations or upon various nominations, and not act upon the ordinary business of electing our officers, is to assume an indefensible position which they cannot justify before the American people.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I desire to say a word on this subject before we adjourn. It seems to me that the distinction between action at an executive session and a legislative session is not only obvious, but it is one that has always been recognized. So thoroughly has it been recognized that in 1861, when the Senator from Ohio first became a member of the Senate, and a motion was made to proceed to the election of officers, then, even in revolutionary times, the republican party refused to do it because it was against all the precedents of the country, and the officers of the Senate who were holding on after the 4th of March, 1861, were allowed to hold until the legislative session of July was called, and the Senator from Ohio, as well as the other Senators, all agreed that it would be upsetting all precedent to proceed to elect them at an executive session of the Senate. Never, except in 1853, when it was desirable to get rid of a Sergeant-at-Arms against whom there were charges, in as easy a way as possible, was it done. And let it be remembered that when this executive session was called for the purposes which have been so well set forth over and over again by reading what the President called us together for, all the pretense that was ever made on the other side of the Chamber for delay was that committees should be appointed, so that the business could be conducted in a proper and orderly way. We consented to that, and after they were appointed and business could proceed in an orderly way, then the republican half of the Senate refused to proceed in that decent and orderly way that they had induced us to believe they intended to proceed as soon as committees were appointed, and at once undertook to turn out, without pretense of cause and against all the precedents, the officers of the Senate and elect others in their stead. Why? Not because of inefficiency, but for a reason which we have a right to take time to look into.

The Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] who had carried on what we call filibustering for two weeks in order to get the committees, rose in his place and read—it was no casual, careless announcement—the reason why they desired this to be done. He said:

There is something higher than and above all this, something the great importance of which has not escaped the attention of our opponents here. It is the coming political contest in Virginia. The Senator from Virginia who sits nearest me has terrified the old democratic régime of his State by his courageous bearing on this floor.

And that Senator, the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE,] in his place told us what all this means. He said:

Mr. President, I must beg the indulgence of the Senate for a few minutes longer, to do justice by one for the introduction of whose name here I am responsible.

Not the thirty-seven other Senators, although it came from the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] as the organ of the republican caucus; but "I," said Mr. MAHONE, "am responsible for the introduction of the name of Mr. Riddleberger here." What more did he say?

It is reported generally that some Senators of the democratic party are ready and willing to abandon opposition to the further organization of this Senate if the name of Mr. Riddleberger shall be withdrawn. If that be true, I ask Senators to confess the fact and let it go to the country, that they are ready and willing to yield the organization of the Senate if only their revenge can be satisfied in the defeat of one of Virginia's own honorable and honored sons, in the person of Captain Riddleberger. They can yield a complete republican organization, but cannot accept this Virginia readjuster. I note with astonishment the reasons assigned, but discern very clearly the real and underlying ones. Say they, he is of the repudiating party. If so, Mr. President, I, too, am of that party.

And again that Senator said:

Mr. President, it is the coming contest in Virginia which makes this opposition to Mr. Riddleberger. His enemies and those of his party know his power, his influence, and his courage.

And when the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] asked what all this means, I answer that the election in Virginia in November next is for a governor, a lieutenant-governor, State officers, and members of the Legislature, and that Legislature is to elect a supreme court, and that supreme court to be organized as readjusters at the bidding of this party; and the republican party are, in violation of all the precedents of the Senate, to put in power the adherents of this man and to give them the patronage of the Senate in order to bring about that condition of things in Virginia, if that is the bargain. Whether it is or not the country will understand. The fact is stated by Mr. MAHONE that he is responsible, he alone, for the name of Mr. Riddleberger being here. "If Mr. Riddleberger is a repudiationist, so am I," says Mr. MAHONE It is the contest in Virginia that is now to be settled. "If I can get Federal power and patronage and the backing of the republican party with me, and my men are in authority here and the places filled in Virginia, I can seduce enough men who are willing to follow me to carry that State against the debt-paying men of Virginia, against the democracy; I can elect a supreme court to decide the way I want it, that the Riddleberger bill is right. If Riddleberger is a repudiationist, so am I." And the republican party say that they will refuse to obey all the orders of the President, they will refuse to go into executive session, they will refuse to confirm their own nominations, they will refuse to look in the face of issues that are made before them—for what? In order to get the vote of Mr. MAHONE that he may name the highest officer of the Senate or the one who has the most patronage, in fact that he shall have all the power and support that they can give him; that the present efficient officers shall be turned out at a session when officers of the Senate were never turned out before except for cause; that all the precedents of the country shall be overthrown in order to hold on to him, and to turn over the old Commonwealth of Virginia to Mr. Riddleberger, who is to be elected perhaps as his colleague in this Senate by the repudiating Legislature they seek to elect next November. And we are called revolutionists because we say you shall not do that thing, and we tell you now you shall not do it, whether you have made a bargain or not; you may call us revolutionists, call us what you like, you shall not overthrow all the traditions of the country; you shall not carry out any such arrangement as that, whether you made it honestly or dishonestly. You may do it when you are in legislative session, as both parties have always done, but we will in every parliamentary way prevent the country from having such a Legislature imposed upon the State of Virginia, such a supreme court imposed upon that State, and such a colleague to Mr. MAHONE sent to the Senate as you desire shall be brought here. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I have but a few words to say——

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator will yield a moment until I can have the galleries cleared. ["No!" "No!"] I have insisted and I now shall insist that if there is one particle of applause in the galleries here they shall be cleared of every occupant. This has not become a bear-garden, I hope. I trust proper instructions will be given to the officers.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, there need not be any embarrassment on the democratic side of the Chamber in ascertaining the precise and entire direction and purpose of our efforts. Gentlemen need not beat about the bush and cross-question us. My own purpose is entirely clear to my own mind, and I have no shadow of disguise to place over it.

In the first place we have a constitutional purpose and a constitutional resolution before the Senate. The appeal ad misericordiam I give all due weight to. If there be any pity or sympathy called for in behalf of the gentlemen who are to be discharged, I am willing to hear that; if there be any appeal that precedent would make as to whether we ought or ought not to act at a special session upon this question, I am willing to hear it, and I am willing that a minority of the Senate shall filibuster for one day or ten days if we decline to hear proper argument; but at the end of that time I demand in behalf of the constitutional majority a right to vote.

I mean, then, to say that we have a constitutional purpose and a constitutional resolution, and that this constitutional majority shall rule. That I mean to say for one, whether it be now or next December; and I mean to say that the purpose goes far beyond these petty offices, as every man in this Chamber knows, on this side and on that. We are talking here half in fun, half making a farce of it from hour to hour, when every man knows that there is a great, a deeper, a resolute meaning on our side, and that a great and general effect is intended to go through Virginia and beyond Virginia, and all over the South, and to embrace a partial reconstruction of all the great parties of this country. That is what this resolution to make George C. Gorham Secretary of the Senate means. That is a part, a homeopathic dose of what it means. The practical declaration of the entire democratic party of the South to-day is that universal suffrage is a failure. They say that the great mass of freedmen are unfit to vote and cannot have their votes counted arithmetically; they shall not have the weight that the arithmetical count of those votes entitles them to. They say those men are not intelligent, they are led away by corrupt men, and all that. Yes, sir, I admit whatever of truth there may be in that; I admit there is weight; I admit that the South is involved in great and painful difficulties upon that question; but I claim that the difficulties are not all on one side in this country. I assert that in many of our large cities we are confronted by some of the most painful problems of civil government. But when you have made all your arguments about the embarrassments concerning it, I come back to a great fact which you, sir, and I, and every man in this land must accept, and may as well make up his mind this hour to accept now and hereafter, that universal suffrage is the law of the world of late, and is the irreversible law of this Republic to-day. We have——

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President——

Mr. HAWLEY. Wait a few minutes, if you please, and when I am through I shall be glad to be cross-questioned if it shall be deemed worth while. I admit all the difficulties concerning it; but I assert that when it is once made the law, the eternal law of the Republic, as it is, it is the business of every intelligent, and educated, and honorable, not to say Christian man, to accept as a great and heaven-imposed trust the care over the weaker, the inferior, if you choose, also the corrupt elements of this population, and to govern and control and lead them on the better side; and I affirm that the intelligence and morality of this country is perfectly capable of dealing with the whole great question of impartial suffrage. I tell you, sir, what the whole country knows and what the evidence proves, that the declaration of the democratic party, especially of the South, known as "the solid South," is that universal suffrage is a failure, and therefore they are determined that a minority there, as in this Chamber, shall take upon itself the absolute government of that section and govern it as a solid section.

There is no use in beating about the bush or attempting to disguise it. That is the clear purpose of the former confederate and slave-holding element. I am not saying that I should differ with it if I was brought up among them; I am not saying that they have not their excuses and their apologies; but I warn those men that it will not stand, that the American public meant it when they said we must have universal suffrage; they meant the fifteenth amendment, every word of it, and their hearts are in it. The South, "the solid South," declares that the fifteenth amendment is a failure; that it cannot be executed in letter and spirit. Upon that the great free mass of people in this land—I venture to say the conscientious democrats and the republicans also—the mass of people in this land join issue with them and declare that the fifteenth amendment is not a failure, and it shall in letter and purpose be executed.

These gentlemen told us in the late campaign, they announced vauntingly at the beginning of it that they had a solid South. I remember that a distinguished Senator began his speeches in the South by informing the South as to what had been done at Cincinnati, in substantially these words: "We said to our northern brethren, we come to you with 138 votes"—and yet this was four or five months before the election. Who guaranteed to him the 138 solid votes? Even the platforms of the parties were not well known; we had not the four months of discussion; but he offered to guarantee to them the vote of the South. Indeed at the hour of which he spoke their candidates had not been nominated even, nor the resolutions drawn; and yet he said he declared to them the South declared to them, "We bring you 138 votes, and we ask you to name us a man who can bring us 47 more." That short paragraph went from hamlet to hamlet and from Maine to California; it was rung nightly traveling with the curfew bell from Maine to California, and its full meaning was comprehended.

The Senator who said that knew whereof he spoke, and it was by the general consent of all the democracy of the South a declaration that by no possible means, through no argument or public consideration, by no means whatever should a single republican electoral vote be cast there.

Now, sir, against all this there is a great, a broad, a resolute purpose, and even the little resolution electing George C. Gorham has much to do with it. That solid South, made solid for this purpose, is to be broken, and your action here shows well that you know we are taking a great step toward it. It cannot be broken by the action of one unaided man here and there, no matter how brave or gallant he may be, who comes out from the southern democracy and stands alone; but when we behold not one gallant soldier of the confederacy alone, but a detachment of men, a body, a compact, earnest, energetic body of men there whose chief purpose I venture to say, and whose chief use to the Republic, no matter what they think to-day, is that they are to break down the Bourbon democracy—when we see them our hearts go out toward them, for this is the day and these are the men for whom we have been waiting. These are the men.

I abhor repudiation in every fiber of my being, whether it be of national or State debt. My State knows nothing of it. I would that no State might know it. I do not say how much or how little there is of it in the Virginia campaign. I do remember, however, that the republican constitution of West Virginia, established in 1862, promised to assume an equitable share of the whole Virginia debt; I do know that republican legislation in West Virginia provided a commission to go to Richmond and see what should be assumed as West Virginia's portion of that debt; and I do know that when the democratic party got control of West Virginia, in 1872, it made a new constitution and wiped out that paragraph, and the democracy of West Virginia has never to my knowledge undertaken to carry out the pledges made by the republicans of West Virginia to take an honorable share of the debt.

But, sir, I do not care to enter into the details of an argument concerning the greater or less merits of the several plans for paying the debt of Virginia. It seems to an outsider, casually glancing at it, that the Senator from Virginia who sits on this side [Mr. MAHONE] now desires actually to pay a large portion of it and the others are willing to owe the whole and pay none. That is the general view of it to a stranger.

This movement, I say, is not for Virginia, but for the whole South; and no man in the land shall be ahead of me in embracing cordially, politically the man who stands here like the Senator from Virginia defying the Bourbon democracy and declaring that there shall be a free vote, an unpurchased vote, and a fairly-counted vote. You tell me that that has been in your platform! So it has after a fashion; but, my dear friends of the South, you and I know perfectly well that there is one way of saying it and there is another way of saying it; and when one man says it, it is all quite right, and you are at peace with him, and when another man says it and when for an instant he dares to doubt the majesty of that mysterious divinity called "the South" he is a dead man politically, socially, and sometimes physically.

Now you and I know that. You know that when Martin Van Buren made a whisper, a very sigh of a doubt of you upon the Texan question, he was gone; he stood no more chance of being President of the United States again than my venerated grandmother. And when Stephen A. Douglas faltered for an instant upon your demand that we should open the Territories to slavery, and he, with the instincts of a freeman in him, begged that you would leave the question to the people of the Territories, Stephen A. Douglas for that doubt was a dead man, and the oath was registered that he never should be President of the United States. I comprehend all this; so do you, men of the South, better than some of those on this side do. I do not say it to reproach you.

I say it comes down to you from that inevitable compactness of organization and will and despotic power that the great slave system imposed upon you; and the mistake you make now is in applying to a day of universal freedom the tactics, the compactness of organization, the despotism of discipline which your party needed in old times, and which the great pecuniary and social interests and prejudices of slavery made necessary. The day has gone by for that too; and all over your South are young men and middle-aged men, confederates and non-confederates who are waiting for the good time to break down this social and political ostracism, and open the South to a generosity and a fraternity of treatment of all political and public questions to which you have been a stranger.

God bless every man that comes to do that; and, whether I agree with him upon his State tactics or not, when he comes of his own free accord, without promise, without pledge of any description, and takes his seat upon this side and tells you that he does not care for your caucus, that what you do in there is a matter of total indifference to him, I shake hands with him, MAHONE or anybody else, and the more of them the more welcome.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. COCKRELL. I want to know whether cheering in the galleries is to be kept up or not. Have we any rules at all?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I think they are behaving very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We have a rule on that subject. The Chair did not hear any cheering after the Senator from Connecticut took his seat. The Chair has recognized the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] appears to talk in a very earnest way, and I do not know but that I may say as much of a good many Senators on that side of the Chamber. However, I shall have the privilege of thinking as I think without saying anything as to the motive of his remarks. He made use of one remark which I should like to have explained more minutely. Speaking of Mr. George C. Gorham, who he said was to be the Secretary of the Senate, he declared that that gentleman's election would be the inauguration of a new era; that parties were to be revolutionized, that this was to happen and that was to happen. Now, I wish to ask that honorable Senator if he has become so dissatisfied with the workings and the action of his own party that he is willing to reward men who bolt from its organization. Is that to become the theory and the practice of the republican party?

Then in the same connection perhaps that Senator will inform me who is Mr. Gorham and who is responsible for Mr. Gorham's appearance in the Senate Chamber. If report be true—and I have no reason to doubt it—it is not that honorable Senator or any of his co-laborers upon his side of the Chamber; not one single republican member that holds a seat on that side of the Chamber is responsible in any sense or form for the appearance of Mr. Gorham's name here as a candidate for Secretary of the Senate. It was announced in the republican papers and in the democratic papers, all over this country, that Mr. MAHONE, the honorable Senator from Virginia, when he took his seat upon the floor of the Senate was to insist upon it that George C. Gorham should be made Secretary of the Senate, and we find thirty-seven republican Senators here simply recording the will of the honorable Senator from Virginia.

It is said—with how much truth I do not know; perhaps the honorable Senator from Illinois will inform me—that that same Senator occupied a room in close proximity to the republican caucus and that messages were passing backward and forward between that caucus and the Senator from Virginia. Then, lo and behold, the prediction that had gone forth to the people of this country until it had become a fact was simply recorded at the dictation of the Senator from Virginia!

We were further told that the gentleman who has filled the position in this Chamber for the past two years of executive clerk, having given expression to something during the canvass in Virginia that was not at all pleasing to the Senator from Virginia with regard to his undertaking to pay the public debt of that State with the lowest possible amount of money, must forfeit his place. Why, Mr. President——

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will allow me——

Mr. McPHERSON. One moment. What was then done? Instead of our executive clerk being continued in office a gentleman was placed in nomination who was supposed to be more in accord with the sentiments of the Senator from Virginia. What further was done? The Senator from Virginia dictates to a republican caucus the name of Mr. Riddleberger, from Virginia, as the Sergeant-at-Arms of this body. Now, will the honorable Senator from Virginia or any other Senator on that side of the Chamber tell me that if they had instituted a search over the whole United States of America with a search-warrant and a lantern, they would have resurrected Mr. Riddleberger, of Virginia? I wish to know whether it is the readjuster or the republican party that is running this Government? For my part, I have a great deal of admiration for the power of that Senator from Virginia, if I have not much respect for his party.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator now allow me?

Mr. McPHERSON. In one moment I will listen to the Senator and answer his question.

Mr. LOGAN. No, I do not desire to ask a question, but to answer yours.

Mr. McPHERSON. For the last ten years I, for one, in my humble way, have been earnestly contending against the power of a party that I believed were doing all they could to subvert our form of government and to bring the Government into discredit and disrepute; against a party whose policy and principles I believed not to be conducive to the best interests of this country; but my efforts have been without avail; election after election the republican party have been successful. Now, however, we find here that one man, humble though he may have been in the past, comes into the Senate of the United States and dictates the policy of even the republican party!

Four and a half million voters have been unable to put down, or control, or curtail the power of this party, and yet now it is put down simply by the power of one man. I wish to know whether the readjuster tail wags the whole republican dog or not. If that be so, then I certainly have a great respect for the power of that man, and I hope that he will do what the democratic party have been unable to do, regenerate and reconstruct the whole party. The honorable Senator from Ohio, who for a long terms of years has been trying to maintain the credit of this Government, stands to-day in perfect accord with, gives the right hand of fellowship to, a man who has been undertaking, and has partially succeeded, not to maintain the credit of his State, but to destroy it.

Mr. President, it does seem to me as though this is a concentration of agencies that will not work very long together in harmonious accord. If we are to understand that the republican party in the future is to be controlled by the readjuster element in Virginia, then we shall know exactly what we have to fight.

Now I yield to the Senator from Illinois, who wished to interrupt me.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and thirty-eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, April 6, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. McPHERSON. I call the attention of the Chair to Rule 8 and ask most respectfully why it is that the Chair omits to call for that kind of business which is provided for in the rule. I ask the Secretary to read Rule 8.

Mr. DAWES. I should think a sufficient answer to the Senator is that no business has been presented except the unfinished business.

Mr. McPHERSON. Very well. Then it is the duty of the presiding officer, according to Rule 8, to call for business in the following order:

1. The presentation of petitions and memorials.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair decides that during a called executive session of the Senate there is no morning hour. That has been repeatedly decided by the Senate.

Mr. McPHERSON. Then I wish to know, sir, why we are not in executive session. This is an open session of the Senate; it has been so considered by the Senate; and business of all kinds has been conducted by the Senate. Resolutions of different characters have been presented here, have been received by the Senate, and are now lying upon the Secretary's table; petitions have been sent here and are now before the Senate for its action. This is an open session of the Senate; and the Chair, I respectfully submit, cannot avoid the necessity of complying with the rules of the Senate; and until the Senate revokes its own action by a resolution of the Senate changing its rules, the Chair is compelled in duty to call for the presentation of petitions and memorials. The Chair is further compelled to call for "reports of the standing and select committees" of the Senate, to call for "the introduction of bills and joint resolutions;" to call for "concurrent and other resolutions;" and until the expiration of the morning hour the unfinished business cannot come up, which is not until one o'clock, in accordance with the same rule which states, and clearly states, this proposition:

The first hour of daily sessions shall be designated as the morning hour, during which the order of business shall be as follows.

The Chair having already confessed that there is no business upon the table as required by the first clause of Rule 8, which is, "Messages from the President, reports and communications from the heads of Departments, and other communications addressed to the Senate," then the second clause of Rule 8 comes in order, and I submit it is the duty of the Chair to call for "the presentation of petitions and memorials," as required by that rule of the Senate.

Mr. FERRY. I have only to remind the Senator of the practice in executive session, which I am not at liberty to divulge, in order to answer fully the Senator from New Jersey, and demonstrate that he is taking a strange and unprecedented position. The Senate is now called in executive session, not in legislative session. The Chair has properly stated that there is no morning hour. The rules cited apply to legislative sessions of the Senate when both Houses of Congress are assembled. The other branch of Congress is not now in session. The rules apply to the executive sessions so far as they are applicable to the business of an executive session. There being no morning hour, as there is no legislative business, the Chair would not outstep his duty in presiding over this body by calling business up that would apply to a legislative session. Therefore the Chair has ruled that all the matters of business to which the Senator has referred are not applicable to an executive session.

Mr. McPHERSON. I ask the honorable Senator from Michigan then to reconcile the action of the majority, or what is claimed to be a majority, of this Chamber in respect to the resolution submitted by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. Three or four resolutions have been introduced by that Senator, first for the disorganization and then for the reorganization of the Senate. A resolution was submitted a few days ago by which the attention of the Senate was called to the death of the Emperor of all the Russias. That resolution was submitted to the Secretary of State, and we had upon the desk of the Vice-President yesterday morning a report from the Secretary of State respecting that matter. A resolution was submitted by the honorable Senator from Indiana calling the attention of the country, and quite right, too, to the action of the national banks in preventing the passage of the refunding bill. That resolution was permitted without objection to find its way to the Vice-President's table. I should like to have the honorable Senator reconcile, if he can, the action of the majority in respect to those matters.

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator will remember, I objected myself to the introduction of the resolution of the Senator from Indiana. That answers that point.

Mr. McPHERSON. I do not understand the answer of the Senator.

Mr. FERRY. I said that the Senator from Michigan objected to the introduction and discussion of that question by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MORRILL. I rise to a question of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont will state his point of order.

Mr. McPHERSON. If what is claimed to be a majority on that side of the Chamber had objected as it now objects to the introduction of the petition which I had the honor to offer, that resolution never would have found its way to the table of the Secretary of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey will suspend. The Senator from Vermont will state his point of order.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to know whether debate is in order. Is there any question pending before the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Debate is not in order. The question pending before the Senate is on the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. FERRY. I think debate cannot be limited on that. The Senator from New Jersey has raised a point in the discussion of that resolution.

MICHAEL BOYTON.

Mr. McPHERSON. I rise in my place to offer, as is my right under the rules of the Senate, a petition from certain residents and citizens of the States of New Jersey and New York respecting the case of one Michael Boyton, who is alleged to be confined in an English dungeon without right, arbitrarily and unjustly. I claim that I have the right under the rules of the Senate to present the petition for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. FERRY. I make no objection to the introduction of the petition, but I desire to reply to what has fallen from the Senator's lips.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator will have abundant opportunity to reply when the matter comes properly before the Senate. I now ask for the reading of the petition for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair decides that this debate is out of order. The point of order made by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] is well taken. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to lay the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] on the table.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Does the Chair decide that the petition cannot be received?

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Senators will allow the Chair to state the attitude of the business before the Senate.

Mr. DAWES. I beg the pardon of the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey now presents a petition, and in that he is in order, if no objection is made, and the petition will be received.

Mr. DAWES. I hope there will be no objection to the reception of the petition.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair rules that the petition cannot be received at this time except by unanimous consent, as the rule in reference to the morning hour does not apply to an executive session of the Senate. The Chair understands that no objection is made to the reception of the petition. The Chair hears no objection, and the petition will be received.

Mr. HOAR. Is the proposition to receive the petition and refer it to the Committee on Foreign Relations?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey has not moved that the petition be referred; he has simply presented the petition.

Mr. McPHERSON. I ask that the petition be received by the Senate and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOAR. I hope there will be no objection to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the petition will be received and so referred.

Mr. McPHERSON. Let the petition be read.

Mr. FERRY. What is the pending question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to lay the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts on the table.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from New Jersey asks that the petition be read.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that the petition has been received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The rule forbids the reading of petitions, but requires that the Senator presenting a petition shall make a brief statement of its contents, which the Senator from New Jersey has done. If the Senator, however, desires that the rule shall be waived and the petition read, I make no objection. Let it be understood, however, that it is done on his request and not of right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey request that the petition be read?

Mr. McPHERSON. I was about to remark, if the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. HOAR. I object to the Senator's debating; he is out of order. The pending motion is to lay on the table the resolution of my colleague. I object to debate, as I have a right to object.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey has the floor. Does he yield?

Mr. McPHERSON. I am not conscious that I have yielded the floor at any time since I took it. I am not conscious of having surrendered the floor to permit any other Senator to make a motion.

Mr. HOAR. Then I rise to a question of order, on which I pray the ruling of the Chair, that the pending motion to lay on the table the resolution of my colleague is not debatable, and the Senator from New Jersey is out of order when he attempts to hold the floor for debate.

Mr. McPHERSON. I say with all due respect, not having yielded the floor, that no motion of such a character could have been made. I rose in my place and asked that I might be permitted to present a petition.

Mr. HOAR. That has been done.

Mr. McPHERSON. It is a petition of citizens of New Jersey respecting the case of one Michael Boyton. I ask that the petition be read.

Mr. HOAR. Nobody has objected to the reading.

Mr. McPHERSON. I ask that it be read for the information of the Senate, and then that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FERRY. That was done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the petition being read. The Secretary will read it.

Mr. McPHERSON. Pending which the Senator from Massachusetts rose in his place and says that the Senator from New Jersey may only state the purport and object of the petition——

Mr. HOAR. I object to further debate.

Mr. McPHERSON. If Senators are desirous of having me state the contents, I will do so. If not, then let the petition be read.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be reported.

Mr. HOAR. Let the petition be read. My objection is to the speech, not to the reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Whereas one Michael Boyton, a citizen of the United States, has been arrested and thrown into prison by the British Government on vague charges of inciting to crime and violence; and

Whereas the said Michael Boyton has been denied the right guaranteed even to British subjects, the right to a trial before a jury of his peers:

Resolved, That we, as American citizens, call upon our representatives in Congress to demand that the United States Government interfere for his protection.

MICHAEL DOWNEY,
President of the Garfield Association.

JOHN MCCARTHY, Secretary, &c.

Mr. McPHERSON. I suppose my original motion that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations——

Mr. HOAR. That has been done already by unanimous consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the petition is so referred.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state the question before the Senate. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to lay the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] on the table.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. That is not a debatable motion.

Mr. VANCE. I ask the Senator from Missouri to withdraw his motion for a moment.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from North Carolina to let the vote be taken on that motion. I believe the yeas and nays have been ordered upon it, and it can only be withdrawn by unanimous consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered upon the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the vote be taken, and then the Senator from North Carolina can proceed.

Mr. DAWES. I wish the President of the Senate would state the question. We have been across the sea since it was stated, and I think we had better know what we are to vote on.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending resolution is that of the Senator from Massachusetts providing for the appointment of certain officers of the Senate. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL,] that the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts be laid on the table, and upon that motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PENDLETON. In order that we may avoid the waste of time necessary to call the yeas and nays on that motion, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt as to the result.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HAMPTON, (when Mr. BUTLER's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. BUTLER] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] who is absent from the city because of ill health. I state once for all for to-day that I am paired with him during the day.

Mr. HARRIS, (when his name was called.) I agreed with the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] to pair with him during his absence. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] being confined to his home by indisposition, I have transferred the pair to the Senator from from Indiana. I vote "yea."

Mr. COKE, (when Mr. MAXEY's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.] I make the announcement for the day. If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GROOME. I am paired temporarily with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. KELLOGG.] Were that Senator in the Chamber, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. FAIR. I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. JONES, of Nevada.]

Mr. BECK. My colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] is still absent, and is paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.] I make that announcement for the day.

Mr. TELLER. On this question and all questions of this character I am paired with the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—30.

Bayard,	Farley,	Johnston,	Ransom,
Beck,	George,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Gorman,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Call,	Grover,	Lamar,	Vance,
Camden,	Hampton,	McPherson,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Morgan,	Walker.
Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	Pendleton,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jackson,	Pugh,

NAYS—31.

Allison,	Ferry,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Anthony,	Frye,	McDill,	Plumb,
Blair,	Hale,	McMillan,	Rollins,
Burnside,	Harrison,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Miller,	Sewell,
Conger,	Hill of Colorado,	Mitchell,	Sherman,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Morrill,	Van Wyck.
Edgerton,	Ingalls,	Platt of Conn.,

ABSENT—15.

Butler,	Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Teller,
Cameron of Pa.,	Fair,	Kellogg,	Voorhees,
Conkling,	Garland,	Maxey,	Williams.
Davis of Illinois,	Groome,	Saunders,

So the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL,] that the pending resolution be laid on the table, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. I know that motion is not debatable, and I ask the Senator who made it to withdraw it for the time being.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will withdraw it if it can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. BAYARD. I will renew the motion, or I will give the floor to the Senator to renew it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I withdraw the motion if there is unanimous consent. The yeas and nays have been ordered upon the motion and it can only be withdrawn by unanimous consent.

Mr. ROLLINS. There will be no objection to the Senator from Delaware proceeding.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there is no objection the motion of the Senator from Missouri is withdrawn. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone the pending resolution indefinitely, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, yesterday when I entered unexpectedly and for the first time into what may be called the debates not upon the pending question but upon the present condition of public business before the Senate, and urged thereto by my personal respect for the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURNSIDE,] whose obviously candid and manly tone in dealing with this subject invited me to join with him to endeavor to continue it upon the same plane, I then said that I believed there was a justification for the thirty-eight democratic Senators, of whom I am one, on this floor in maintaining the attitude before the country which we have held for about ten days. I said I should like to try the tenability and justice of that position by the light of law and of reason, so that when I and others shall be called to that court of last appeal, the bar of public opinion of the American people, we shall be willing to submit to them the case we are making up now.

Let me as as a preliminary state the facts as to which I do not intend there should be dispute, if submission to the record can secure agreement between the two sides of this Chamber. We were brought into this session of the Senate by the extraordinary proclamation of the ex-President, Mr. Hayes, dated on the 28th of February last, in the words following:

Whereas objects of interest to the United States require that the Senate should be convened at twelve o'clock on the 4th of March next, to receive and act upon such communications as may be made to it on the part of the Executive.

I have read all of that paper which describes the purpose and objects and the business for which we were convened. The present point of difference between the thirty-eight Senators on that side of the Chamber and the thirty-eight on this side of the Chamber is as to what this proclamation means, and how far it restricts or controls our action during this session when with the aid of the casting vote of the Vice-President the republicans may claim to have the constitutional majority. I do not feel that is the exact phrase; but under the casting vote of the Vice-President a tie vote on an affirmative question is permitted to prevail with the aid of his vote under the Constitution which is not a majority of the votes of the Senate. It is best to be accurate on this subject. A law can be passed constitutionally by one-half of the Senate aided by the casting vote of the Vice-President, but that is not called the vote of the majority, it is the casting vote to prevent a dead-lock and a tie.

Therefore I recognize, (at least I did not dispute, nor do I know how it well can be prevented, although it may be denied,) the right upon the organization of this body in matters not legislative, but where the Senate is equally divided, of the Vice-President by his vote to decide in favor of one equal side against the other equal side under the Constitution.

The Senate, when we met, found itself numerically under the admitted control of a democratic majority. Three members of the Senate had been displaced by their acceptance of places in the Cabinet of the incoming Executive, and one had been removed by the hand of God. The majority claimed that it was our duty not to delay but go on and organize as we then stood; having a constitutional quorum present that that quorum should be governed by a constitutional majority and that business should be attended to, for which we gave every earnest in our power by acting with promptness, courtesy, and justice upon the nominations that were sent to us to start the new Administration fairly on its way; and without a question or objection on this side of the Chamber or from the majority, the chosen councilors of the President were confirmed and placed in office.

We considered it then, I consider it now essential for the orderly prosecution of business that the committees of the Senate should be organized, that we could not consider measures or nominations without their previous reference to appropriate committees. Therefore those committees must be reorganized. They had fallen with the end of the last session. We proposed to renew them, if only temporarily. We were met by objections by the minority and the RECORD discloses the fact that for more than two weeks we were for this reason able to do nothing. The resolution was regularly brought forward by my honorable friend from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] as the representative of the majority, to form the committees and proceed in the usual and orderly manner to organize the committees for the transaction of business, a democratic majority of the Senate promptly and efficiently proposing to assist a republican Executive in the confirmation of men of his own party to high and important offices, but by the action of the minority we were obstructed. The rules of this body permitted dilatory motions, the calling of the yeas and nays, on the motion to go into executive session, on the postponement of resolutions to a day certain or indefinitely. All those dilatory motions, well-known, admitted, accepted, of ancient origin and long practice, were resorted to by our friends on the other side; and when their motive was disclosed that they deliberately intended to prevent the consideration of a resolution which was an essential preliminary to the avowed objects for which the session was called—when that was made known, in good temper and obedience to the rules, without impeachment of motive, without useless and tedious struggles, the majority yielded to the obstruction and consented daily to early adjournments. That is the history of the proceeding, and the RECORD bears me out in all that I have said.

But after the loss of two weeks' time, within which all the public business for which this session was expressly convened could have been transacted, and would have been transacted satisfactorily I believe—at the end of the two weeks the vacancies in the Senate were filled and the numbers then stood, and as I said yesterday upon the public records of the country, accepted by all previous and public declaration, there were still here thirty-nine supporters open and public, professed and avowed supporters of the democratic standard-bearers and of the party which those standard-bearers represented—thirty-nine, a majority of two in this Chamber. The real status of those votes did not declare itself finally until the thirty-seven recognized and avowed republican Senators who had openly supported the candidates of the republican party brought forward a resolution assuming that they held a majority in this body.

A great amount of mystery had been suffered to envelop the vote of one Senator in this Chamber—I care not by whom or for what purpose created—but a mystery which he could have dispelled at pleasure, but he did not see fit to do so. He finally did dispel the mystery as to whether he would vote in accordance with his avowals up to and after the election of November last, or whether he would vote in favor of that party to whom he had publicly avowed his opposition, and he decided it for himself, and the mystery was solved, but it remained uncertain and it remained a mystery until he had, by voting with those whom heretofore he had professedly opposed, thrown the organization of the committees of this Senate under the control of the casting vote of the Vice-President of the United States, ex officio the presiding officer of this body, but not a member of it.

What else does the record disclose? That when the democrats of this body discovered, by this surprise, by this studiously concealed intention, change of heart, or whatever you may choose to call it, the power of the casting vote of the Vice-President was to control the organization of the committees of this body—I appeal to the record—was there one moment of delay in accepting the situation? Was there one motion made to adjourn? Was there one motion for an executive session? Was there a suggestion that, surprising as was the result, narrow and fractional as was the majority—was there, I ask you, the slightest delay in accepting and in bowing to the will of the majority without asking how it was obtained, or questioning its very slight numerical weight?

Appealing to the record, I state here that which no man can rise and deny, that when the essential organization of the Senate, which we had besought you for two weeks to accomplish for public business, was by that casting vote decided to be in the hands of thirty-seven old and one remarkably new republican, we asked not the date of his party birth nor the period or nature of his party service, but we submitted at once, and with a good grace handed over to you the control of the thirty-nine committees of this body. These are the facts. No question then about our ready recognition of the principle that now has become so sacred and unqualified in your eyes, but which, permit me to say, you seem to have discovered the inviolability of only when it passed into your own hands, and to which you paid such scant respect when we held it.

And now what is the question? It is simply this, whether that majority which we recognize and which we obey as giving you the control of all the committees of the Senate, which hands over to your discretion entirely what is properly the organization of the Senate, binds us to-day in the face of all the facts which surround us as promptly, as unquestioningly, as unqualifiedly to submit to your present motion? What is that? To proceed not to the business essential for the public, not to the business which, to use the language of the President, is among the "objects of interest to the United States," and "to receive and act upon such communications as may be made to it on the part of the Executive;" because I say to-day that you are and for ten days have been evading those objects, you are intentionally and willfully disregarding the true objects for which this session was convened; you are proposing to do that which the public business does not require; you are not seeking to perform an essential duty, but you are doing something for which you find your only justification in the doctrine that it is your will. Sic volo, sic jubeo, stat pro ratione voluntas; that is the answer we get when we appeal to you to go into executive session and transact the only business for which we were convened.

Now I feel as strongly to-day the principle of majority rule and its necessary recognition as when I stood to urge it in this Chamber unavailingly four weeks ago. I will agree to that; but majority rule is not unqualified or unregulated. The Constitution contains provisions and is so framed that he who would carry it into execution justly must give construction and force to all its parts in order to bring all its objects into harmony, and make it that which it was intended to be, a homogeneous system of government designed to secure liberty and establish justice.

The principle of majority rule lies inherently at the basis of all councils; it is the rule and it is the underlying rule of our form; but not an unchecked and unbridled majority. The very word "government" means restraint and restraint upon whom? Upon the strong. It is upon power that checks are needed; and therefore it is that checks and balances upon power, framed in the very spirit and essence of liberty, run all through and are interwoven with every grant of power in the charter that we have all sworn to obey, the fundamental and highest law of this land.

The separation of this Government into departments, the segregation of powers to each which none of the rest may invade or infringe—such instances fill this charter and help to make and keep it free; and in regard to our rules and the control of the business of this body we have constitutional provisions, as well as rules and regulations adopted and revocable by the body itself. The first article, section 3 of the Constitution provides:

> The Senate shall choose their other officers—

Having before prescribed who should be their presiding officer. And section 5 provides that—

> Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings.

That is another constitutional right and duty which no other house and no other department of the Government may invade or infringe. The same section further provides:

> And the yeas and nays of the members of either House on any question shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the Journal.

Such are a few of the constitutional provisions fundamental to the Government, in subordination to which this Senate has framed the rules of its proceedings. One of those rules following out the right secured to one-fifth of the Senators present that on any question the yeas and nays shall be ordered, is found in Rule 16:

> When the yeas and nays shall be called for by one-fifth of the Senators present, each Senator, when his name is called, shall, unless for special reasons he be excused by the Senate, declare openly and without debate his assent or dissent to the question; and in taking the yeas and nays upon any question, the names of the Senators shall be called alphabetically.

And Rule 17 was intended to provide a means of enforcing Rule 16. That was a rule founded on the Constitution in its letter. Rule 43, which is an ancient rule, declares:

> When a question is pending—
> Any question—
> no motion shall be received but—
> To adjourn,
> To adjourn to a day certain, or that, when the Senate adjourn, it shall be to a day certain,
> To take a recess,
> To proceed to the consideration of executive business.

And after that are motions deferred in their order of precedence.

Now, what I mean to say is this: I will agree that these rules were made for the orderly prosecution and ultimate decision of questions and of business; but they were not made for the instant, unquestioned, instantaneous control of questions by a majority. They were made to give time; they were made to compel a majority to pause before a final decision was reached which bound all, the willing and the unwilling, alike. They are emblements of freedom, because they are checks and were intended to be checks upon the onward and unquestioning strides of power. And in proceeding under these rules which are privileges to the minority, birthrights of freedom to the minority, what is the measure of their employment? It is the check of conscience; it is the check of a sense of duty; it is the check of honest judgment and a high sense of public responsibility whether or no the proposed action of the majority justifies in the conscience of a Senator a resort to the delaying power upon final decision which these rules have unquestionably given him, and were intended to give him.

I do not think it fair in any argument to state extreme cases; and yet instances have occurred since I have been a member of this Senate when I felt it was my duty, and would be my duty if life was left in my frame, to delay and prevent the decision of questions and issues raised in the heat of party and in the frenzy of political excitement which I believed were fatal to the welfare of my country that I felt it would have been my duty to interpose every bulwark that the Constitution and the rules made in accordance with it supplied in order that the question might stand over for "the sober second thought" of another Congress.

Senators, no man dreads and abhors more than I the pernicious doctrine of that which has been announced as a "law higher than the Constitution." I know no law higher than the Constitution to bind my action as a citizen and legislator. I must find my warrant under it or I cannot act. But there is, and you will perceive that there is, a necessary and a conscientious discretion as to how far these very checks upon an aggressive majority shall be enforced by those who have their duties as much to protect the rights of a minority as have the majority the duty to insist upon their responsibilities and powers. And then should this issue ever be raised, should we by reason and argument and justice in our own minds be unable to settle it, we must send it back to those who are our masters and whose opinion duly expressed at the polls becomes, after all, our law, for public opinion does mold the action of Congress and Executives.

But I say that on these questions of delay, of invoking the aid of rules that were made to check the otherwise impetuous and unrelenting progress of the power of a majority, there must be a justification, the circumstances of the case must justify, they must be such that a man can fairly turn to those whom he claims to represent and say "I interposed this delay and I did obstruct the passage of this resolution because I felt there was an interest at stake greater and infinitely more important than possibly could be accomplished from allowing the majority to have their own way unimpeded. Now judge you between us. It is in that spirit, and tried by the rule which I have endeavored to lay down, that I propose to test the question as to whether we ought not to continue, under the long and well-established rules of this Senate in strict accordance with the constitutional right, as I consider it, the spirit and the letter of those rules, to prevent you from postponing or defeating the objects, and the only objects for which the Senate was convened, and doing that which has in it, as I believe, consequences fatal to the principles of morality and right upon which this Government was founded.

Now, first as to precedents. It has been cited to us that two years ago, coming into a majority in this Chamber, the democrats did at that session elect a new set of officers. The answer is that our coming into power was long known in advance, and, in justice to those officers who were here, there was ample notice given of the change, for it is known, Senators, that the most conspicuous of the gentlemen removed had, in accordance with his own sense of right, embarked as an active and aggressive partisan in the political canvass, had been the chief officer of one of the organizations of your party, and having risked his office upon the ebb and flow of party success, he naturally drifted out with the tide that carried out that which had been a majority in this Chamber. But I wish to show you that the session of 1879, beginning March 18, was no such session, and for no such objects, and restricted to no such propositions, as that which we are now called upon to perform. The proclamation of March 4, 1879, convening that session, said:

By the President of the United States of America.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas the final adjournment of the Forty-fifth Congress without making the usual and necessary appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and without making the usual and necessary appropriations for the support of the Army for the same fiscal year, presents an extraordinary occasion, requiring the President to exercise the power vested in him by the Constitution to convene the Houses of Congress in anticipation of the day fixed by law for their next meeting:

Now, therefore, I, Rutherford B. Hayes, President of the United States, do, by virtue of the power to this end in me vested by the Constitution, convene both Houses of Congress to assemble at their respective Chambers at twelve o'clock noon on Tuesday, the 18th day of March instant, then and there to consider and determine—

Not "objects of interest to the United States" and "such communications as may be made to it on the part of the Executive," but to consider and determine such measures as, in their wisdom, their duty and the welfare of the people may seem to demand.

So that we were met for this purpose; notice in advance was given, and an unconfined field of action was open to the Senate, and all men expected when they came here, and all men agreed and acted when they came here, on the theory that it was a session for the transaction of all public business, and the sequel proves that they acted on that idea.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Delaware a question?

Mr. BAYARD. Will my friend ask it when I get through?

Mr. HOAR. It was with reference to his opinion on the precise point he is now making. If it is disagreeable, I will not put it; but I will put the question and if the Senator finds he would rather not answer it, I will withdraw it at once.

Mr. BAYARD. I will say to the Senator that it will embarrass me a little to stop to answer a question now, but I will answer it when I get through, if he will allow me to answer it in my own time. I feel that I am occupying the time of the Senate longer than I desire and at some inconvenience to myself, for I am not in very good condition. ["Go on!" "Go on!"] Now considering these facts, I hope the honorable Senator will not think it is any discourtesy on my part, for I should be very glad to continue the debate and answer the question if able.

Mr. HOAR. I will not certainly press the question against the intimation of the honorable Senator. My belief is that after hearing the question he would prefer to answer it now rather than later; but I will not put it unless he wishes.

Mr. BAYARD. I will hear it.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to ask the Senator's opinion upon this question, and if he will permit me to put two questions in succession instead of one it will save a request to put another. I desire to ask the Senator if he thinks that when Congress is called together it is in the least limited by the President's description of the occasion which led him to call it; whether it has not all its constitutional powers as a Congress; and if he answers that in the affirmative, as possibly he may, I then desire to ask him whether he conceives that the Senate, when it is called by the President to sit alone, is limited or restrained by the call from doing anything whatever which it sees fit which does not require the concurrence of the other House? I will not ask the Senator to turn aside from the argument to answer that now unless he should prefer to answer it as he is upon the point.

Mr. BAYARD. That would necessarily lead to a debate upon a very interesting subject that was raised here at the commencement of this session by proposing to consider a question, which to have any practicability would have to become a legislative question in relation to the national finances, and which was I think very sensibly objected to on the other side; not but what the Senate had the power to consider it, but because it was inappropriate, I will not say unlawful, I will not say unconstitutional, but I say inappropriate at a session called for a special purpose, to embark upon other and variant subjects that could not result practically; that is to say in the absence of the other House of Congress, no such thing as practical legislation can be begun here, because it cannot be considered by the House of Representatives at the same session of the same Congress. That is all I can say.

I read the proclamation convening us and restricting our action, or notifying us that we were to consider only certain things, and the proclamation of two years ago which shows that the doors were thrown open to the discretion of both Houses of Congress at a general legislative session to do that which they saw fit under the Constitution, to show that there was a difference between suddenly displacing the essential officers of this body for the purpose of replacing them with others. And now on that point let me ask does any man say that the displacement of the present officers and their replacement by others constitutes anything that is essentially of interest to the Government of the United States? I heard the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] yesterday speak of the displacement and reappointment of these officers as essential to the organization of the Senate. Why surely the honorable Senator was mistaken in that. The organization of committees to consider nominations referred to them was essential for the transaction of the business of the Senate and did become part of its essential organization; but so far as the clerical force of the Senate is concerned, it is to-day perfectly organized. You would have to disorganize it in order to accomplish the result of your resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Delaware is mistaken in saying that I said the election of these officers was essential to the organization; indeed I have read my remarks within a short time this morning and what I said was this——

Mr. BAYARD. I had the impression from hearing what the Senator from Ohio said and from reading to-day in a very cursory manner his remarks in the RECORD, that he spoke of the fact of its being the duty and the responsibility of the majority to organize the Senate, and a part of that duty was the appointment of these officers, and therefore that they were proceeding to the execution of what he considered an essential duty by turning out four men and putting in four others.

Mr. SHERMAN. I said this: that it was the clear right of the Senate in its own way, at its own time, and in its own manner, to elect its officers. That is all. I do not consider it essential to the organization of the Senate, but it is for the majority to say when it will do it.

Mr. BAYARD. Of course the Senator knows best what he said, and anything that he says he said I accept; but I had the impression that he spoke of this resolution as being in the line of the proper organization of the Senate. I merely mean to say the Senate is organized as to its officers to-day efficiently and well, and when we handed over to you by virtue of the casting vote of the presiding officer, without the slightest demur, the control of the committees, then the organization of the Senate became complete and we were ready from that instant to attend to business under the control of the thirty-eight—I so speak of them now—republican Senators and the Vice-President.

But, Mr. President, I said in view of our duty we must weigh the facts that surround us, treat this question as one of great public interest before the American people, whether there are circumstances to justify us in insisting upon that privileged motion provided for by the rules which has precedence over other motions of going into executive session, or whether we should stop and allow this displacement and then replacement of officers in our official corps. Weighed fairly in the scales of a sound discretion and the public exigency, which action ought to prevail, which is the weightiest in its interest to the United States, the displacement of four confessedly accurate and faithful clerks and officials, or the public business that we are told cannot and shall not be considered at all, and shall stand arrested and paralyzed until the majority have proved and vindicated their abstract power in the minor instance referred to? Weigh them in the scales of common sense; weigh them in the interests of our country in every branch of the public service, and which shall kick the beam, the action of the thirty-eight republican or the action of the thirty-eight democratic Senators?

It is publicly known that two treaties have been sent to the Government of the United States, and transmitted by the Executive for the consideration and action of this body. One of those is the treaty with China. It is no secret of executive session. It was a matter of grave and open and deeply interesting public debate two years ago, whether we should abrogate an existing treaty with China by passing a statute, or whether we should wait the more tortuous and formal and dilatory action of the diplomatic agents of the Government. On this floor and in public records the settlement of that Chinese question was brought before the Senate. I speak not now of this treaty; I speak not now of the consideration of its provisions; I violate none of the confidences of executive session; I speak of the great public facts, the great facts of history detailed here and found spread upon your public records of debate by Senators from the Pacific coast, in which they begged and besought then that action should be taken to define and establish the relations between the subjects of China and the citizens of the United States. Senators well remember the pictures drawn to us by the Senator from Nevada not now in his seat, [Mr. JONES,] by other Senators representing California and the Pacific slope on this floor. I remember the horror with which they held up to this approaching cloud of Mongolian invasion, and how they felt that Christian civilization upon the Pacific coast was in danger of being overwhelmed by the tide of pagan population from the Chinese Empire. That treaty is in our hands and ought to be promptly considered; but what are the million of our fellow-citizens that line the Pacific coast, their interests and their feelings, compared to the mighty question, whether the Secretary of the Senate, accomplished, trustworthy, and excellent, shall give way instantly to another man, or that the able and efficient Sergeant-at-Arms shall be ejected in order that another person may take his place, draw his pay, and exercise his powers of appointment over the great body of twenty or thirty subordinate officers? How can the comparison be made? Can Senators stand for one moment to doubt that it is our duty without delay to attend to this great international question, so deeply interesting to the whole country and especially to those citizens who inhabit the States of the Pacific slope?

But that is but one feature. What say you to the Supreme Court of the United States? To-day it is broken as to its quorum; crippled in its numbers; the business brought before it of the gravest importance both to private suitors and to the public standing still until what? Until the Senate of the United States shall displace four competent officials and place four others in their stead. The circuit courts of the United States, the district courts of the United States, with their thousands of suitors and millions of property standing waiting judicial decision, all demand consideration of the nominations to fill their vacancies, and all is postponed because the sheer and mere will of the majority declares that four clerks shall go out and that four others shall come in, before stagnation in busines and ruin to litigants shall be removed by prompt, regular, decorous action. District attorneys are needed to represent the justice of the United States in prosecutions, marshals of the United States, postmasters by the score in more or less important cities, collectors of revenue, and among them the great port of collection, the chief port of entry of the commerce of the Union, the great port of New York, where more than two-thirds of all the merchandise that the Amercan people pay taxes on, all over the country by way of impost duties is entered,—a great office, demanding great qualities national in importance, second in influence and importance to the Secretaryship of the Treasury itself,—that office is postponed as to its incumbency, its functions embarrassed in order that four subordinates of the Senate may be taken out and four others put in.

No, Mr. President, when you stand and look at the facts, what I may call the business facts, those which the President of the United States appropriately termed "objects of interest to the United States," I say to you they are all on one side of the question; they are all in one scale of this balance. You cannot gravely—and may I say it without disrespect—you cannot conscientiously speak in the same breath of the performance of these two duties. It is Mount Olympus to a wart to talk of passing by these great and essential objects of public interest and stooping down into the recesses of this Senate to displace four acceptable officials in order that you may show your power by replacing them with four others.

But, Mr. President, I think there is enough in that to give pause to the other side, whether they will, in the face of these facts which must be admitted and cannot be denied, still insist by virtue of mere nominal majority power in so conducting the public business of this country that objects of public interest shall be neglected and postponed for such objects as these.

And what are the real objects? I want to speak by the record; I want to speak of the facts. I do not pretend to read men's motives; I do not intend to impugn them; but I do intend to state facts to which my eyes and the eyes of the American people cannot and ought not be closed. If the facts are innocent and honorable, they can bear recital and examination; and if they be not, then an examination and recital are more essential in order that their proper public judgment may be awarded to them.

In this country we have many unwritten political laws. There is the law of party and party avowals perfectly well understood, created by no statute and found upon no constitution. Let me cite one. The Constitution of the United States intended that the electoral college should be composed of a body of independent men, and that they in each State without combination with the electors in other States should themselves choose the President of the United States. He was not intended to be an officer of popular choice, but to be the independent choice of a college of electors; yet what has public action and the unwritten law of this country brought to pass? That there is no such thing as freedom of choice and independence of action in an elector; but that if he having been nominated, unbound by oath, unpledged by promise, but simply by silent acceptance of the nomination had allowed his name to be held forth as an elector favorable to one set of candidates and then should vote for the other or fail to vote for those for whom he was nominated, I ask you would not the unwritten law of this land ring from one end to the other and blast him with popular execration? The foundation of that feeling and of that admitted law is in political morality generated in the minds of honest and honorable men, undefined by statute, but essential for the very existence of a government of laws.

Senators, as I said yesterday, thirty-nine members of this body each and all proclaimed their advocacy of the election of Hancock and English at the last election, all wrote of it, spoke of it according to their various habits of thought and modes of expression. That is undoubted and undeniable. When we came here it was rumored that one of those votes would be withdrawn from the party whose candidates he had publicly supported and would be cast with the party of his opponents. Well, that fact was finally, after a long delay and much mystery, created by whom I know not, but which could have been dispelled by one word from the individual who was the subject of so much accidental and unusual interest. He finally declared himself in a vote in this body voting with the republicans to postpone the consideration of the resolution which was offered on this side of the Chamber to organize the committees of this body. Following that fact the caucus of the republican Senators was held, a series of resolutions was adopted unseating certain officers or rather seating others in their stead, vacating offices by the same resolution and refilling them.

Mr. RANSOM. The committees first.

Mr. BAYARD. I have already referred to them. The committees were first formed. Then, after the formation of committees and the organization of the Senate by the aid of the vice-presidential vote, came the proposal to unship these four elective officers, and we find that among those chosen by the republicans to take the place of Sergeant-at-Arms the name of a gentleman from the State of Virginia who was a candidate for the post of elector for Hancock and English. That is another fact. Well, I have not construed a motive as to his change, because it was with his consent that this was done, but we are not left in doubt as to the moving cause of his appointment. In the first place we see the fact that the Senator from Virginia who of his own will and acting upon his own responsibility allied himself with that party whose candidates he had opposed at the last election, was, according to his statement, the originator and the cause of the nomination of Mr. Riddleberger, of Virginia, by the republicans. Let me read his language:

> Mr. President, I must beg the indulgence of the Senate for a few minutes longer, to do justice by one for the introduction of whose name here I am responsible.

And further on:

> It is reported generally that some Senators of the democratic party are ready and willing to abandon opposition to the further organization of this Senate if the name of Mr. Riddleberger shall be withdrawn. If that be true, I ask Senators to confess the fact and let it go to the country, that they are ready and willing to yield the organization of the Senate if only their revenge can be satisfied in the defeat of one of Virginia's own honorable and honored sons, in the person of Captain Riddleberger. They can yield a complete republican organization, but cannot accept this Virginia readjuster. I note with astonishment the reasons assigned, but discern very clearly the real and underlying ones. Say they, he is of the repudiating party. If so, Mr. President, I, too, am of that party.

Here, then, follows the fact that the Senator whose opinion was changed and who has now allied himself with the republican party was the originator and is the responsible person for placing a professed democrat, an avowed supporter of and an elector on the Hancock and English ticket, before a republican caucus for their nomination as Sergeant-at-Arms of the United States Senate, and recognizing him by his description of alleged repudiation he declares himself in complete affiliation with him.

Now let us take another fact. When the committees of this body were changed they were, according to the list I have in my hand, thirty-nine in number,—thirty-three standing committees and six special committees. I find the name of the Senator from Virginia as the chairman of one, the Committee on Agriculture, and as occupying high place upon three other important committees. I am making no objection to this; I am stating the facts, because from these facts there will be deductions and upon these facts there are and there ought to be the exercise of individual and public judgment.

By the precedents of both political parties of this body, chairmanships and influence in place upon committees are the awards to seniority and length of service; and I find as a fact that, whereas there are thirty-seven republican Senators who always were republicans, who were before the last election and are to-day republicans, four of those gentlemen are excluded from chairmanships of committees and fail to occupy those positions which seniority in party service would certainly have given them, according to all the precedents of party action, over the new-comer, whose political position or intentions were not assigned by him until two weeks ago.

All these facts combine to form the basis of an independent and intelligent judgment. There they are. Civility, the rules of this Senate which are founded upon decorum, personal courtesy, that charity which we all need in the construction of our motives, may prevent Senators and ought to prevent them from hasty or extreme expressions of opinion upon a case like this; but, gentlemen, judgment will be formed and judgment ought to be formed, and its expression is a question perhaps of taste, or of a sense of justice, or a sense of public duty; but the facts are there, and from those facts the ordinary deductions of mankind, founded upon their usual appreciation of human motive, must and will be formed and they cannot hope to be escaped. They are heard to-day all over the country—and will not be soon forgotten.

So, then, having gone over the weight of public business demanding action and the perfectly trivial character of the pretext for its postponement on the other side, I now put in the scale with that, which justifies me to vote for the consideration of the public business, the addition that in the face of such facts as these my views of political morality and duty tell me to lend my opposition to the consummation of a reward to Mr. Riddleberger, or to the Senator who nominated him, on the state of facts which stand before us and the motives for which I have not assumed to state, however clear they may seem to my apprehension.

But, Mr. President, there is something more. As to the object of the nomination of the proposed Sergeant-at-Arms we are not left in doubt. With a conspicuous candor and in perfectly intelligible phrase, the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] astute, and active, and influential, as we know him to be, in the conduct of party affairs; he, the spokesman of the present so-called majority; he, who led your phalanx of filibusters against the organization of the Senate committees four weeks ago; he, whose eloquence was wasted, no not wasted, but successfully exerted in motions alternately to adjourn and to attend to executive business, but always to defeat the regular business before the body; he, who is by common consent and by his own assumption fully cognizant of the motive and the object and the details of all this arrangement; he has spoken, and I venture to read to the Senate his language. He claims that which I concede the right of the majority having the responsibility to exercise the power of control of the ordinary business of the Senate, and then adds:

> The contest, however, in which we are engaged—

Says the Senator from Pennsylvania on the 1st of April—I do not know that the day is ominous—

> The contest, however, in which we are engaged is not simply to secure the officers and employés to party friends, as the Senators on the other side pretend, nor is it solely a struggle of the majority to maintain its right to control the organization of the body.

Those are the mere incidents, the unimportant parts!

> There is something higher than and above all this, something the great importance of which has not escaped the attention of our opponents here. It is the coming political contest in Virginia. The Senator from Virginia who sits nearest me has terrified the old democratic régime of his State by his courageous bearing on this floor.

And he is sustained by the remarks of the honorable Senator from Virginia whose speech some weeks ago was so very interesting in this Chamber but which has ceased now to be so. Now, Senators, consider what this means and what is the claim of power. There is to be next fall an election in the State of Virginia for what? It is to be for a governor for that State, for a Legislature for that State, for the judges of the court of appeals of that State. There is not a single Federal officer chosen. There cannot be under any law of the United States or pretext of authority a single Federal officer, even in supervision, to control any of these elections. The Supreme Court have told us the United States have no voters of their own but that they have a right to prevent a discrimination on the grounds of race or color by the laws of a State, and they have assumed that control by act of Congress where members of Congress are concerned.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. BAYARD. I want to state only my proposition.

Mr. BLAIR. It was in regard to the citation from the Supreme Court that I wanted to ask him about.

Mr. BAYARD. I mean to say this: the State election in Virginia is to be held by State officers, determined by State officers for an election of State officers, and the Government of the United States has no legal control, nor is there any law of Congress nor any feature of the Constitution that gives the Congress of the United States the right to interfere with and control the election of State officers.

Now, what is proposed? It cannot be said that Congress has the right to interfere. Legal control we cannot exert; interference we cannot legally exert. What is proposed? The dangerous step of renewed centralization, not by act of Congress regularly passed and approved which is capable of being tested in the Supreme Court as to its constitutionality, but by the separate action of the Senate, not a legislative body for this purpose, part of the executive council in its present capacity, undertaking avowedly certain action that shall interfere with and control the election in the State of Virginia. Mr. President, I say that of itself cannot be defended. I say it is a usurpation and an invasion. I say it is in the strongest sense of the word a revolutionary attempt by unlawful and illegitimate methods to control the free election of a State in regard to matters solely submitted to its own laws and people. And how control it? I deny the power, even if you attempted to exert it under the forms of law regularly enacted; but this is to do by indirection, without law to do that which even with law it is not competent for you to attempt. And then pause for one moment to consider not only do you exercise a power denied to you by your frame of government and by the Constitution you have sworn to support, but you add to usurpation the terrible danger of corruption, because if this man is to be chosen an officer of the Senate in order that he may influence elections in Virginia, how can he do it in the line of his public duty? Is it the money that is to be paid him for his services here that he is to expend there? Is it his power of appointment over subordinates to be chosen there that is to enable him to exercise this power?

Why, gentlemen, it will not be admitted, it will not be confessed because it would not be justifiable in any way to attempt so to misuse the official powers and salaries and emoluments of officers of the Government of the United States. One hundred and fifty years ago a statute of Great Britain, standing to-day unrepealed and cited by Blackstone in his Commentaries, tells you that for any man holding a public office to attempt to solicit or influence a vote subjected him to a fine of £100, because as Blackstone says to attempt to use the offices of a country to control the elections of a country is "to out up government by the roots." And yet in this case the United States Senate goes out of its sphere, which is strictly federal, to interfere with the free elections of a State by means of appointing its officers, and all public business is to be arrested until that shall have been accomplished. Put that in the scale and let it weigh—the fact that important and responsible offices of the United States Senate are merchandise in the political market to control the election of State officers.

And, now, Senators, there is another feature of this transaction independent of the great calls of public duty to fill these important places for which the President has sent us nominations; other questions than the morality or immorality of suddenly rewarding with public office those who as suddenly and as unexpectedly shall change their political protestations, something stronger than the fact even that the offices of the Senate, one great branch of Federal power, shall be used to interfere with a matter confessedly within State jurisdiction; and that is this: What is the main issue in the contest in Virginia which you expect to decide, and upon which you take sides and lend your influence by appointing the partisans of that faction which you embrace? So far as I can state the issue,—and I wish to state it restrainedly and fairly, and shall cite the language of the Senator from Virginia in order to describe it—it is this: The dominant party in Virginia was prior to the year 1879 what is known as the democratic party of that State. A difference arose, a split took place in regard to matters of their local interests. Virginia had been the theater of war, the camping-ground and the battle-field of all those armed hosts who met in combat for four long years. There never was a day during those four years that the soil of that State was not in the occupation of armed forces, and the results followed too sad to be pictured by me, only useful by way of warning and of that wisdom we may gain from sad retrospection. The result was desolation and impoverishment, and at the end of the struggle the Commonwealth emerged with her old debt standing but her resources shorn, disordered and broken. What was to be done? Social difficulties, political revolutions, an upturning of society from its very base, threw upon the people of Virginia difficulties which few communities in the history of mankind have been able to survive. But thanks to the seed of American manhood which though buried yet will grow, and which though broken will still survive, she has emerged and is day by day progressing rapidly and hopefully into the outer air of prosperity and the ability to settle fully and fairly with those to whom she is indebted. Yet there was a great public debt honestly incurred, for which public improvements had been purchased valuable to her people, and the question was simply to make arrangements financially to meet it.

What is the difference between the two parties, or the divisions, those who are called the debt-paying portion and those who call themselves the readjusters of the State debt? It is simply this: the debt of Virginia as it stands upon her statute-books, as attested by the bonds issued under her seal, is every cent of it admitted by the debt-paying or the funder party of Virginia, but they call upon those who are creditors to consider their condition and make with them a voluntary arrangement or compromise just and honorable to both, and which they can with care and honesty carry out; in other words, the debt-paying and funding portion of Virginia will do nothing with their public obligations except that to which the creditor consents. Volenti non fit injuria. They propose to enforce nothing except their own obligation, and if concession is made in the spirit of compromise it shall be such as their creditors consent to. That is their position. It is to be a voluntary arrangement acceptable to the creditor or accepted by the creditor without any compulsion on the part of the debtor, and upon that they propose to adjust and settle their obligations in full.

On the other hand is another party, the "readjusters," as they call themselves. They say, "We do not ask the consent of the creditor; it is not what we owe; it is not what he asks; it is what we see fit to pay him; we will make a new contract with him; we will fix our own terms;" and to use a fine phrase and euphuism which I find in the speech of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] at page 92 of the RECORD, we will "eliminate" such portions of the public debt as we do not choose to pay. That means thirteen solid millions of principal and the entire interest since 1861. Lest I may do injustice, let me read the language:

> In fixing the principal debt of Virginia at $19,665,176 it is obvious that about $13,600,000 of the principal which the McCulloch bill—> sought to fasten upon us has been eliminated.

That was the debt-payer's bill—

There is much in a phrase. Said Pistol:

> "Convey," the wise it call. "Steal!" foh! a fico for the phrase.

Repudiate? No, eliminate. Further, the Senator from Virginia says:

> How, then, is that enormous amount (greater than the whole debt of undivided Virginia) made up? By capitalizing simple and compound interest which accrued during the period of war and reconstruction. We not only object to this usurious and oppressive mode of accumulation against us, but we peremptorily reject the whole claim for any interest at all for the period indicated.

By whose consent? The consent of the debtor; and what does the creditor say? He is answered that his claim is peremptorily rejected, or it is eliminated; or if you use plain English, it is insolently repudiated.

Mr. President, that is the issue which we are told by the speech of the same Senator is to control the election in Virginia in the coming autumn. It is that issue incarnated in Mr. Riddleberger, whose bill bearing his name (passed by the re adjusting legislature and vetoed by the democratic governor, Holliday) proposing to carry these projects into effect is to be the Mahone-Riddleberger platform next fall in Virginia, and it is in that issue and upon that side of that issue that the republican party in the Senate of the United States propose to identify themselves by choosing this man to be their representative, to be one of their own confidential and important officers. It is with him, it is with his doctrines, it is to such results that the majority stand committed. The Grecian fable tells us of the man who slew the dragon and sowed his teeth and the crop was armed men who saturated the land with blood. It seems to me that if you shall insist, Senators, in sowing the seeds of public repudiation of admitted and honorable obligations, you are sowing a crop worse than that of Cadmus, and which will bear infinitely more dangerous fruit to us and to our posterity.

What is credit? It is the honest poor man's capital. It is because he is trusted for his honesty that he can borrow means to enable him to outlive his period of distress and await the time of the fruition of his labors. If Virginia be poor, and I know she is poor, I beg of you do not take that which is more necessary to her to-day than it was in her times of opulence and plenty. Leave to her people the right to be believed and trusted. Leave them that sense of self-respect and honest manhood that an unbroken word gives to any man however humble.

I read the other day, as I have often read, never without reverence and instruction, the words of Daniel Webster, who whenever the question was asked of his great brain and sound heart, what were duty and wisdom in regard to the government of his country, never failed to give back a patriotic and a true response. In 1839 when he was in London the house of Baring Brothers & Co. wrote to him asking whether the Legislature of one of the States had legal and constitutional power to contract loans at home and abroad. He proceeded to give his reasons in his usual luminous and logical manner to show the existence unquestioned of that power. Having stated to his inquirers the existence of that power in the State, he then proceeded to consider what their remedies were to enforce such contracts for loans as had been made by them. Said he:

> The security for State loans is the plighted faith of the State, as a political community. It rests on the same basis as other contracts with established governments, the same basis, for example, as loans made by the United States, under the authority of Congress; that is to say, the good faith of the Government making the loan, and its ability to fulfill its engagements. The State loans, it is known, have been contracted principally for the purpose of making railroads and canals; and in some cases, although I know not how generally, the income or revenue expected to be derived from these works is directly and specifically pledged, and in others very valuable tracts of land. It cannot be doubted that the general result of these works of internal improvement has been and will be to enhance the wealth and the ability of the States.
> It has been said that the States cannot be sued on these bonds. But neither could the United States be sued, nor, as I suppose, the Crown of England, in a like case. Nor would the power of suing give to the creditors, probably, any substantial additional security. The solemn obligation of a government, arising on its own acknowledged bond, would not be enhanced by judgment rendered on such bond. If it either could not or would not make provision for paying the bond, it is not probable that it could or would make provision for satisfying the judgment.
> The States cannot rid themselves of their obligations otherwise than by the honest payment of the debt. They can pass no law impairing the obligation of their own contracts. They can make nothing a tender, in discharge of such contracts, but gold and silver. They possess all adequate power of providing for the case, by taxes and internal means of revenue. They cannot get round their duty, nor evade its force. Any failure to fulfil its undertakings would be an open violation of public faith, to be followed by the penalty of dishonor and disgrace; a penalty, it may be presumed, which no State of the American Union would be likely to incur.

I would that the spirit and the meaning and the force of those words of this great Massachusetts Senator could burn themselves in upon the mind of every man in the American Union. He has stated the only penalty, but, great Heaven, what a penalty is that! The penalty of dishonor; the penalty of disgrace. When you speak of that you have included all that makes life unhappy and existence unbearable.

To the people of Virginia I bear the same affection, no more and no less, that I do to the people of other States, save only that sometimes their very misfortunes have dignified them in my eyes and touched me with a sympathy and an interest that I did not feel for those who had fared better in the rough voyage of fate. I have no right to interfere in local affairs in Virginia; I never did interfere in local affairs in Virginia; but I had my view privately, and justifiably I expressed it in a spirit of responsive friendship to her people, and publicly to-day do I here express it, when the proposition is made to strengthen the hands of those who I feel are driving daggers into the side of that honored and venerable Commonwealth. I believe I could show with pen and pencil to any reasonable man that this dallying with the debt and suffering the plighted faith of Virginia to be brought in question is costing them annually infinitely more than the principal and interest of their debt combined.

I have since I came in this Chamber, as I think will be admitted, been the steady uncompromising foe to everything like unwise legislation, that would jeopard the public credit of the United States; and no measure, originate where it may, recommended no matter by whom, that tended to strengthen the fabric of our public credit and prosperity but found in me a ready, an earnest, a zealous advocate. So to-day standing here, Senators, and weighing my duty whether by my failure to exercise every parliamentary right given to me I should permit the hand to be strengthened that seeks to strike down or injure the credit of a State of this Union, I tell you I would be recreant to my sense of duty if I failed to exert myself to the utmost in opposition to it.

There stands my case before my conscience and it stands before this country. I submit it to you. Look at the plain facts; look at the results.

I know you say that the democratic party is a dangerous organization and that it is a high and patriotic duty to defeat and disintegrate it. I do not pause now to make denial of that. If I thought so, I would aid you, but I do not think so, and I oppose you.

But oh, gentlemen, does "the end justify the means?" Are you to go back to your people or into your own closets and say, as I heard that eloquent man whom death took from us lately, Mr. Carpenter, once say, that you can "stanch blood with fraud?" Do you think you are justified in strengthening the hands of those who are actual if not avowed repudiators of the public debt of that State in order to disintegrate the organization known as the democratic party of Virginia? That doctrine will corrode all human promise; it will destroy every sense of human obligation. The means must justify itself. What you would have highly that you should have holily. Have you any right to do this thing? I speak to you with respect; I speak to you with the earnestness of a man who desires to prevent you from doing that which I think will be a stain upon this body, and be a frightful precedent in political action. A witty man once said that a blunder was worse than a crime. He meant by that that the consequences of an unwise public act might be injurious far beyond the intent of the man who committed it. The mistake in judgment of a general, the mistake in judgment of a minister of finance on an unwise measure of finance, the plunging a country into business distress, may lead it to ruin and dishonor amid the tears of the man who innocently counseled it. It is not by impeachment of your motives; it is by holding up before you the inevitable consequences of your action, and to beg you to abandon your purpose that I make this appeal.

Sir, I have said these things because I see throughout this country an inability or an indisposition to comprehend the causes that keep this grave body in session apparently to no end. There is reason and right and force in much that you say in regard to your power and your duty as holding this nominal majority, but there is also reason superabundant, as I have tried to show, to justify us in arresting your onward progress in the consummation of this act, and in doing it I believe the facts justify us. I think so now, and so long as I think so I shall try to stand by my conviction. As I said, it is not the time or the occasion or the business for anything like threats or suggestions of physical endurance. That is not the question. I know they often tell us that this is not the heroic age. There are many ways in which heroism may be shown. There is many a man goes down to his death in the sober garments of peace as true a hero in defense of his conviction and his conscience as any who died in panoply upon the field of battle. The question is serious; it may become more so, but by the light that I have received and for the reasons that I have stated, I stand for the present where I was when the contest opened, and shall oppose the passage of your caucus resolutions.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I did not expect yesterday to be drawn into this debate, but I found that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] and I agreed upon so many topics that I thought I was justified in coming forward and stating my position so as to show that although on opposite sides in politics we did agree upon the leading principle involved in the contest which is now going on. Perhaps I had better restate this governing principle before I answer the argument that he has just made.

The Senator agrees with me that the fundamental rule of all deliberative bodies is that a majority shall rule; that in every body, whether a senate or a house of representatives or a house of commons, however composed, in the end the vote of the majority of each member must determine the question; that the minority have certain rights; that to secure those rights rules are prescribed, and that those rules enable such minority to delay business, to procrastinate a vote, to seek debate and to thwart to a great extent the action of the majority; but after all, when debate is exhausted, then the majority must rule. He depicted the results as the opposite doctrine but he did not state them nearly as strongly as they might be stated. When the tactics of the minority go beyond this reasonable rule they become revolutionary.

Fifteen Senators on this floor can prevent the Senate of the United States from doing a single act, and for the time arrest the Government. Under the rules of the Senate, without violating a single one of them, this Government might be as absolutely destroyed as the southern confederates would have destroyed it if they had succeeded in their hopes. The action of a minority of fifteen determined men acting under your rules can prevent the appropriation bills from being passed; the pay of your Army, the pay of your Navy, or the pay of your courts. In other words, to use the expression of my friend, these motions, which were intended to be "the implements of freemen," to enable a minority to exercise their right of full debate, may be converted into revolutionary agencies. There are implements of freemen, but such implements may be very dangerous in the hands of people who will use them for a bad purpose.

The rules of the Senate were prescribed to enable minorities to exercise a reasonable and fair restraint over legislation; to prevent hasty action, but when used for the purpose of defeating the will of the majority, they become revolutionary agencies. If a minority carry their action to the full extent possible under the rules of the Senate, they might destroy this Government, every branch of it from the Executive down through all its departments. These rules were intended to be construed with reason and applied with judgment, and whenever Senators resort to extreme measures under the rules they may entirely defeat the will of the majority and paralyze the Government.

The Senate is so constituted to-day that either party could prevent the passage of any law. Yea, under the rules of the body a very small minority of either party could prevent the passage of any law. Because the minority have that power under the rules, will that justify them and make it right for them to exercise that power? No. The Senator assumes, and he and I agree there, that when you go beyond a reasonable parliamentary opposition to the will of the majority you trespass upon dangerous ground of revolution. If such conduct is accompanied with the evil, bad intent that constitutes treason, it becomes treasonable. Fifteen men might break up this Government by the use of this minority power, and if they conspired for that purpose might be guilty of treason at common law, and yet act in strict accordance with the rules, because they might with a bad intent in exercising the power they enjoy under the rules actually break up the Government and destroy its existence.

The Senator and I agree, therefore, entirely that the doctrine of the right of the majority to rule must prevail. We also agree that the minority have certain rights to interpose dilatory motions and various motions to delay and thwart and weary out, if they can, the majority; but when they pass beyond that boundary then they enter upon dangerous ground, and my friend from Delaware agrees with me there.

Here lies the weakness of the argument. He told us yesterday that he would in a carefully prepared address bring forward the grounds and reasons why he now feels justified in resorting to dilatory motions, not to continue until December, but to continue until he changes his mind. Other Senators on that side of the House not so cautious as he say they must continue until December. If until December, why not until January—why not year after year, and year after year?

What weighty reason does the Senator come forward to-day and give us? I have listened with patience to nearly all he has said. What is it that justifies this act which he denounces as revolutionary and dangerous? Forsooth, it is because the Senate of the United States wish to change three or four officers. He says we ought not to do it. Suppose he is right. I do not stop to debate that question, because I think it is too small for debate. Suppose he is right, must he therefore to defeat a small matter, which he says is a small matter, resort to dangerous expedients? Must he cross the boundary-line between a reasonable opposition to the will of the majority and a dangerous opposition to the will of the majority? Must he make the occasion of the removal of these few clerks the ground for resorting to extraordinary expedients which he himself has eloquently and ably denounced, and in which I concur? What reason does he give us? I have endeavored to sum up these reasons as briefly as I can, so that I may not too long occupy the attention of the Senate; and I think I shall state them in the order in which I believe the Senator stated them.

The first objection made is that the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE,] a member of this body, was a democrat. He was one of thirty-nine Senators who voted for Hancock; and he comes here now in despite of what they expected of him and proposes to vote with the republicans instead of voting with the democrats; in other words, that Senator has changed his mind, has changed his opinion, has changed his party relations. I could go into a minute defense with the facts which have been furnished me, to show that the Senator from Virginia never was elected as a democrat; that he was repudiated by the democrats at the time he was elected; that he was not voted for by the democrats or a majority of them; that he did not claim to be a democrat; that he claimed to be an independent, and was so elected, and was elected by the republican votes and readjuster or independent democratic votes. I might go a little further and show you that before that Senator came here he declared his purpose to separate from the democratic party; that he denounced the democratic party as the Bourbon democracy. In his speech here the other day he stated his position, and while he adheres to it he is a good enough republican for me. He said:

> The desire of our people for cordial relations with all sections of a common country and the people of all the States of the Union, their devotion to popular education, their efforts for the free enjoyment of a priceless suffrage and an honest count of ballots, their determination to make Virginia, in the public belief, a desirable home for all men, wherever their birthplace, whatever their opinions, and to open her fields and her mines to enterprise and capital, and to stay the retrograde movement of years, so as to bring her back from the fifteenth in grade to her original position among the first in the sisterhood of States, forbid that my action here should be controlled or influenced by a caucus whose party has waged war upon my constituency and where party success is held paramount to what I conceive to be the interests of Virginia and the welfare of the whole country.
> The readjusters of Virginia have no feeling of hostility, no words of unkindness for the colored man. His freedom has come, and whether by purpose or by accident, thank God, that, among other issues which so long distracted our country and restrained its growth was concluded, and I trust forever, by the results of the sanguinary struggle between the sections.
> I have faith, and it is my earnest hope, that the march of an enlightened civilization and the progress of human freedom will proceed until God's great family shall everywhere enjoy the products of their own labor and the blessings of civil, political, and religious liberty.

The Senator from Virginia in the same speech sets forth the fact at length that he was not elected by the democrats. He shows that he was not elected by them; that he was elected in opposition to them; and a very excellent gentleman, with whom I had the honor to serve when I was a member of the Senate, who was the nominee of the democratic party, was his opponent, and he beat him.

But it is said that the Senator from Virginia voted for Hancock. A great many men voted for Hancock because he made very fair promises. General Hancock is a very patriotic man. He in his letter of acceptance made a very good platform, much of which the republicans would very cheerfully adopt as their own. The trouble was that the republicans would not like to trust the democratic party to carry out the principles of General Hancock. I need not say anything further in regard to that. A great many men voted for General Hancock who had no faith whatever in the democratic party. But that is not all.

It appears that although the readjusters did vote for Hancock, or for Hancock electors, they did not vote for the same electors, and they did not adopt the democratic platform. On the contrary, they made a platform of their own, and they selected their own electors. Disclaiming any connection or affiliation with the democratic party, they brought forward their own candidates, but they were known as Hancock electors. This half democracy, composed of men who repudiated the party, who denounced the leaders on every stump as the Bourbon democracy who never learned anything and never forgot anything, are held up to the world as deserters by the democracy which they had left. It appears also that every member of the Legislature who voted for the Senator from Virginia was elected as a "MAHONE" man, not as a democrat. Most of them were elected by republicans; they were elected to support Mr. MAHONE in opposition to the democratic party. Some wanted to support the ideas of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] on the Virginia debt; some with the hope that this break in the Bourbon element in the South would enable them to have a free election and a fair count; many with different motives; but all of them were elected as opposed to the democratic party. Every man who voted for the Senator from Virginia was elected in opposition to the democratic party. It is so shown by these papers and so alleged by that Senator and not contradicted, as I understand, by his colleague; and upon this, forsooth, because he who has been repudiated and denounced by them, who was not voted for by a single Virginia democrat, comes in and acts with the republicans, that is the ground of a revolutionary movement to prevent the majority from taking the very first step that they want to take, the election of some officers of this body.

Sir, this is a very slender basis for a revolutionary and dangerous proceeding that will not be justified by candid men.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] I believe is now the best friend of the South. He comes here with a platform which, if he will stand by, the young men of the South will rally around, and with it and a fair leader will meet and overthrow the old democratic party of the South. I tell you, Senators, there is a profound distrust that the democratic party could not carry out any such platform; that from the nature of their organization, from their very composition, from their material, they could not secure a fair count and an honest vote in the South. There is a profound distrust of that kind, but if the young men of the South, and I wish my voice could reach every one of them, whether he be a republican or a democrat; if the young men of the South or the old leaders of the South, yea, even if my friend from Delaware on the other side, who is a leader of his party, would join with the Senator from Virginia in carrying out his promises, we will have a successful and prosperous country, and no more sectional parties in the country.

In order to show you that the Senator from Virginia took a high position on this matter before he came here, I ask the Secretary to read a single paragraph from an interview with him that was published in the papers of the country.

The Secretary read as follows:

> And with the readjustment of the debt as proposed, the readjusters come into full control of the Commonwealth, remove the Bourbon reactionists from place and power, and start Virginia on a new career of progress, prosperity, and greatness. Free suffrage for all men; a fair count at the polls; free education for all children, and an impartial administration of the constitution and the laws for all citizens, will be the internal policy of the liberal party which shall have dethroned the Bourbons; and with respect to the nation and our sister States, the same liberal party will insist upon and inculcate honest submission to the results of the war; due observance of the constitutional amendments, the reconstruction acts, and all the other expressed and implied conditions that accompanied the restoration of Virginia to the Union; the cultivation of fraternal relations with our fellow-citizens of every quarter, and the removal of sectional jealousies and race distinctions in all our politics.

Mr. SHERMAN. The theory that the Senator from Virginia was elected as a democrat, that they had any claim in honor or in conscience upon his vote, that they had any right of courtesy or fair treatment from him except as one gentleman always owes courtesy and fair treatment to all people—the idea that this democratic party which my friend from Delaware represents had any claim of honor on the Senator from Virginia, is utterly unfounded.

Mr. McPHERSON. Was this interview before or after the election?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know exactly when it was. Do you know?

Mr. McPHERSON. I do not. I think it was after the election.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is simply what I find in the papers. When the Senator from Virginia separated from the democratic party, as he did when he was elected in opposition to their candidate by men who were voted for to elect him, the democratic party had no right to expect his vote.

Indeed we know very well that any act whatever of independence on the part of a democrat in the Southern States is punished with a severity that we in the North know nothing about. When a democrat in the South rebels against the intolerant arrogance of that old Bourbon democracy we know what his fate is. As an illustration of that fact I call your attention to a speech made by an honorable member of this body, the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] who, in speaking of General Longstreet, stated what would be done by the democratic party to any man who hesitated or faltered or became an independent or radical in any sense of the term. We all know the character of General Longstreet, a brilliant, able man, probably one of the ablest leaders of the confederates of the South, a man educated at West Point, who went into the confederate army. We thought he violated his oath of fealty, we spoke of him very unkindly; but when the war was over he thought then that the feelings of the war should cease. No sooner had he taken his position as a kind of quasi-independent in the democratic party than he was ostracized. I do not say that upon my own authority, but I shall read to show what the Senator from Virginia might expect from the democratic party if he declared his independence, as he has now done, and the kind of treatment they would deal out to him. This extract is taken from a speech attributed to one of the Senators from South Carolina. It is taken from a southern paper. Speaking of independents, he said:

> If you have grievances here, publish them in the newspapers and refer them to the people, the sovereigns of us all. They have the power and the means, and the inclination, too, to correct whatever evils there may be in the democratic party. But for Heaven's sake, for the sake of the graves of your children, for the honor of your country, don't come out and say, "I'm an independent!" I love independence myself, but I do not believe in asking a blessing of Esau when I want it for Jacob. You independents come out at once and do as you are certain to do in the end, if you persevere in this path, go right square into the ranks of the radical party. There is no half-way ground. You cannot occupy a half-way ground. You must be either for us or against us. I assume that some of these independents believe that they have grievances. If you have been beaten for office, learn a lesson of patience. Sit down and bear it, [applause,] for if you do not you are certain to drift into the radical party. Look at Longstreet. He was begged and implored not to persevere in his course; but he drifted on and on and floundered deeper and into the mire until he landed head and foot into the republican slough. And what has he gained? Scorn, ostracism, odium, ill-will, worse than all, the contempt of the men who stood by him under the shower of death and destruction.

This is the spirit with which the democratic party always punished the men who broke off from their party allegiance. The Senator from Virginia had no right to expect anything else, and has received nothing else.

> He forfeited the opinion of all honest men for the sake of an office, and he began by being an independent.

Thus the very motives of General Longstreet, who had distinguished himself so much in their service, were wrongly imputed to him:

> This appeal I make to colored men, as well as white. Good government is as essential to them as it is to the whites. The republican party at the North is different from the republican party in the South; at the North incorruptible, honest, virtuous, intelligent men are to be found in its ranks. It is not so in the South.

So he goes on and endeavors to cajole or perhaps persuade, I might say, the colored people of the South that the kind of republicans they had down there they could not rely upon. Further:

> Go, then, fellow-democrats, in a body to these men, reason with them, plead with them, bring them back into the democratic fold if you can, and if you cannot, then kick them into the radical crowd where they belong.

We are all men at least of middle age or past middle age. We know very well what independence means in the South. We know the terms of social ostracism. I admire the courage of any man who dares express his opinion openly and freely and follow the dictates of his conscience, and you will not find our northern republicans shrinking from the fellowship and aid of men who dare to do what they think is right in the face of an ostracism like this. How unnatural it appears to us in the North! In the North we have our differences. My colleague and I may agree very well, although we differ as wide as the poles in our political relations. It does not affect or disturb the social relations of men. So in the Northern States generally men differ. So it was before the war; they differed and had their debates and discussions.

How many distinguished men in Virginia in the past have been elected by one party and finding that that party was not pursuing the path which conformed to their ideas of right deserted the party and tried to do better for their country? There is Benjamin Watkins Leigh, who was an eminent man in Virginia in his time, who was elected by one party and followed another. William C. Rives was another, a man who is honored in Virginia everywhere. Ay! one of my old colleagues, Mr. Hunter, of Virginia, was elected by the whigs, and you know what a democrat he became. James M. Mason had something of the same experience. John Tyler, a bitter democrat, was taken up by the whigs and put on their ticket, and then as we thought, the whigs of those times, it was before my day, he deserted and went to the democrats. One of the most remarkable pages of English history was the sudden change of Sir Robert Peel, an eminent English commoner, the very prince of tories, a leader of the tories, who belonged to the country party and who led them in several great contests. He was for protection, he was for the corn laws, and was elected to office on that position; but being convinced by the events that disturbed England in 1845-'46, and along there, he changed his course and although at the head of the government, he took up the notions of Mr. Cobden and aided in repealing the corn laws; but yet Sir Robert Peel was never denounced as much by the tories of that time as the Senator from Virginia is denounced, and why? Though not elected by the democrats, though disclaiming any connection with them, because he did not vote with them here at the beginning of this session.

This will not do, gentlemen. You must find a stronger basis or fulcrum for this revolutionary opposition to the will of the majority than the mere fact that the Senator from Virginia chooses to ally himself with those who sympathize with him in many of the leading ideas that he adopts. And here I feel bound to say that so far as he proposes to repudiate any debt, any obligation, State, county, city, or national, I am utterly opposed to any such idea; and I was surprised beyond measure to hear my friend from Delaware beg us by every consideration not to associate with repudiators. Though I believe every word that he says about his own position, that he would not repudiate a debt, that he had stood by the public faith under strong temptations, yet he is in daily association with Senators of States that have repudiated debts by the wholesale.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator please explain what he means by "strong temptations" to me?

Mr. SHERMAN. Party fealty is always a strong temptation, and the Senator from Delaware has certainly at times separated from the mass of his party on financial questions.

Mr. BAYARD. I never felt the temptation in the least. It was the easiest thing in the world for me to resist it. Those things may be tempting to some other people, but they are not tempting to me.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend from Delaware is a very good man, I have no doubt; but at the same time I think party fealty sometimes pulls him a good way out of a straight line, and the chief objection I have to him is that he does not always stand by his pronunciamientos when it comes to party matters. Sometimes I think he has followed his party where really his conscience did not go with it; but in that I may have been mistaken.

Now, Mr. President, as to the ideas of the Senator from Virginia upon repudiation of any public debt, I am not conversant enough with the question there to debate it even. This is not the time to debate it. We have not full information in regard to the statistics of the repudiated States. One of the officers of the Government is now engaged in making up an elaborate statement of the repudiation of State debts and county debts and district debts and city debts that have occurred in many of the Southern States, and perhaps at times in two or three of the Northern States, and we shall soon have in copious detail all the information that will enable us to fix the responsibility of parties and of men in regard to the repudiation of the Southern States. This, however, I may state in a general way, upon the basis of a document that I now hold in my hand, that at least ten of the Southern States have repudiated or scaled down or refused to pay over one hundred and thirty million dollars of their State debts. I know many explanations have been given; Senators have risen in their places and tried to explain why and wherefore it has been done. That is not the thing; but the fact is that in ten of these States debts have been repudiated to the amount of $130,000,000—more than the entire debt of the country at the formation of the Constitution.

Mr. HARRIS. Would it be inconvenient for the Senator to name those States?

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, I would not do it; because if I were to name the States the Senators would then probably want to reply in the midst of my speech; but here they are, and here is the document, an official document prepared by an officer of the Government, who states the amount of repudiation of these States. I do not care to go into that. This is an article in the International Review, written by Mr. Porter, who is one of the officers of the Census Bureau.

Now, Mr. President, enough for the first of the reasons given by my honorable friend from Delaware. He says next that he is justified in resisting this organization, not only because the Senator from Virginia does not vote with him—and how any democrat could suppose the Senator from Virginia would vote with him under the circumstances I do not know—but he says we ought not to do this at a called session. That is the smallest pin-hook upon which a great revolutionary proceeding could hinge. It will not hang the weight. The Senate can do anything now that it may do without the consent of the House of Representatives. You heard here for almost two hours the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] prove to you by copious extracts from the founders of the Government and from leading prominent men from the beginning of the Government to this hour that the Senate had full power to discuss the question of the funding bill, the national banks, calls for information, to send committees, to do anything that it cared to do; and yet now suddenly we are told that they cannot elect the officers of the Senate, the smallest and least significant of their duties; that they cannot turn out a clerk. They can send committees all over this broad land, as they have done; they can investigate the question of refunding and the conduct of the national banks; they can do anything such as the Senate has done over and over again.

Why, sir, this is too narrow a basis for a revolutionary movement. I could give in my own experience innumerable acts that have been done by the Senate at such sessions. The Senate itself, when it was completely under the control of the democrats, did change its officers at such a session. It is said that was done for cause. Well, sir, suppose we have a political cause for which we do it; that is a cause; the majority must determine. The majority here think it wise under the circumstances to make this change. That surrenders the question of power. Whether we are wise or not in doing it is another question. You can debate that, you can resist that, but you cannot resort to revolution to prevent us from exerting the smallest and weakest power of the Senate, especially when it has been demonstrated here by one of your own members within a few days that we have every power that the Senate can exercise except that which requires the assent of the House of Representatives.

But the third proposition of my friend is that to elect Riddleberger Sergeant-at-Arms is to interfere unconstitutionally with the election in Virginia, that the election of Riddleberger in some way or other has a connection with the election in Virginia. I do not exactly see how, although I hope it will. If the election of Riddleberger will enable us to break up the power of the Bourbon democracy in Virginia I will go into this contest with ten times the heart I have had. If the action of the republican party in coming up to the support of the Senator from Virginia and electing one of his trusted friends will strengthen the republican party in Virginia that is a political object which will greatly advance the good of the people of the United States, it is a political object for which I would contend. Anything that will beat down that party and build up our own is justifiable in morals and in law. Every party does it. Your nominations are made for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency from particular States to help the party in the States from which the candidates come. Every party acts from political motives, and acts honorably in doing so.

Now, sir, for any Senator to tell me that because we choose to elect Mr. Riddleberger it is done for the purpose of corruption in the State of Virginia is the simplest nonsense. There is no corruption about it. We will by the strong right arm of the republican party, that party which has governed the country in twenty years of peace and war, that has a record as honorable as any in American history, protect and defend the Senator from Virginia when he declares his independence of Bourbon democracy. If he will stand with us upon the great principles of our party, we will cover him with our shield, we will back him with our strong arm. If you attack him you attack us, and we are accustomed to contests with you. That is the way I feel.

Therefore, if the election of Mr. Riddleberger will strengthen the republican party we are justified in electing him, if for no other reason; and there is not a Senator on that side of the House, if he would speak from his heart, but would say he would be justified by a political motive like that. To call it corrupt or dishonorable is to use terms totally unworthy. We buy no man; we barter with no man. We have made no promises to any man. Sometimes the imputation has been thrown out, not that Senators make a charge, but sometimes they send a paper up to have it read which contains a charge imputing corruption; sometimes an innuendo is thrown out as that "we will not inquire into the means by which this has been brought about." Gentlemen, that will not do; you cannot make the people believe there has been any corruption, because there has been none—no promise, no hope, no expectation of reward, nothing that is corrupt. Our motives for entering into this movement are as open as the day, as bright as the sun, and can be proclaimed on every house-top and every stump in the broad land. We give our hand to the Senator from Virginia because we believe that in doing that we shall advance the public interests. We believe it will tend to break down that bitter feeling of hostility in the South which has prevailed since the war which almost borders on the dangerous. We believe that by extending our help and aid to these men in expressing their opinions, even if we do not agree with all their opinions, by aiding them in defending themselves against the ostracism of a great and powerful sectional party, we do good to our country, and we propose to carry out that policy, and in carrying out that policy we do more good to the South than we do to ourselves.

We are strong enough in Ohio, strong enough in the other States, although we are nearly equally divided. If either party prevails in any one of the Northern States it makes no great difference, for the time being, any mistake is corrected by the changes of political parties; but in the South you have but one party, you allow no other. If a man goes from one party to another, which ought to be as near as from one neighbor's door to another, you ostracize him, you detract him, you impute to him corruption, you do with him as it was said was done with Longstreet. This is the great evil. That which has held back the democratic party more than anything else is because the northern people of both political parties mistrust you; they doubt you. When you say you will do a thing, they are afraid you will not; not that you do not intend to do it, not that you do not start out with a good purpose, but because you fear the social ostracism and power of the Bourbon democracy of the Southern States.

Mr. President, so much for that. When we elect Mr. Riddelberger we do not elect him because he wanted to readjust the public debt of Virginia; we do not elect him because we agree with all his notions, for I suppose that is scarcely possible in political life, but we do agree with the general ideas that are proclaimed in his doctrine here about equality of rights, about securing a free and fair election and an honest count, and the repeal of that law, intended not for the purpose of levying taxes in Virginia, but for the purpose of deterring voters, a law which itself has reversed the politics of Virginia, a law the repeal of which would to-morrow give the republicans a majority there without any coalition with anybody.

Now, sir, when these gentlemen come forward and say that they will give to all men equal rights, that they will repeal this obnoxious law, that they will make the way open and free to the ballot-box, that the votes shall be fairly counted, and then that the majority shall rule, and that the insolent, dominant, aristocratic minority which controls in the South shall be overthrown, we give them the right hand of fellowship; we will elect them Sergeant-at-Arms, we will elect them to office and share with them all honors and employments as long as they will carry out that doctrine and that pledge. They are of us bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh, even if we do not agree with them in their financial views.

Sir, if I was going to Virginia, I should state to the people of Virginia that I believe that the best thing for Virginia would be to pay the whole of the debt, not to repudiate a single farthing, pay it as fast as they can without regard to the proposed compromise with the bondholders. I know it would be hard. The State of West Virginia, I believe, is more at fault than old Virginia in regard to the debt. Congress itself was at fault in not providing in the fundamental act which organized West Virginia for a mode of dividing the debt. I have always thought so, and always regretted it, though I have no doubt I voted for the bill myself without thinking much about the debt at the time. It ought to have been provided by Congress that West Virginia should assume a certain proportion of the debt, and the rule should have been laid down. They did not do it; but the State government of West Virginia did do it. The State of West Virginia resolved in its first constitution that it would assume a portion of the debt and pay it. Well, sir, the two States could not agree; they appointed commissioners at one time; but there was a difference as to the mode and manner of the division, whether it should be based upon population or upon property, and finally it fell through until the democratic party came into power in West Virginia, and then the debt was repudiated.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, the Senator does not mean what he says, I reckon.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I have said anything the Senator does not agree to, I will yield to him to correct me.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator stated, I believe, that the republican party had made provision to pay the debt of West Virginia and that when the democrats came into power they repudiated it. I think that was the statement.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not say that at all.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then I beg the Senator's pardon if he did not say that. That is what I understood him to say.

Mr. SHERMAN. I said that in the adoption of the constitution of West Virginia the republican party of that State gave a guarantee that they would assume a portion of the Virginia debt, to be ascertained afterward. Am I correct in that?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That far.

Mr. SHERMAN. And efforts were made, commissioners probably were appointed and sent to Richmond, and they disagreed as to the basis of a settlement. Is that right?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is all I said, except that afterward in West Virginia when the democrats came into power they never did anything about it. They have never taken any steps, and I am told changed the constitution——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator now is speaking of what he knows nothing about.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator, then——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Now let me state it in my own way.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me ask, did not the democrats when they revised the constitution of West Virginia leave out that provision for the adjustment of the debt with Virginia?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. No, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was informed they did.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. No, sir; but I will tell you what they did. The same provision that originally existed was not renewed, but a provision was made for the payment of the debt whenever a settlement took place; and if the Senator will look at the constitution he will find that the State of West Virginia made a provision, and that was the only debt she had in view, that whenever the debt was settled between the States, whenever the question was settled, then there should be provision made for it. Now, let me say——

Mr. SHERMAN. That is more cunning than I thought, because they made no provision for a settlement, and yet provided that when it was settled provision should be made.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] yesterday misstated the thing. The Senator from Ohio will permit me to say this: It was stated by the Senator from Connecticut yesterday, and again by the Senator from Ohio to-day, that when the democrats came into power in West Virginia they repudiated the debt, or words to that effect. Now I state to both those Senators that I hope at a future day my colleague and myself will put this question fairly before the Senate; but in the mean time I wish to say to each of these Senators that the democratic party is probably the only party that has moved straight to this question. It appointed commissioners, and they went to Richmond. The resolution was introduced by a democrat, and by your speaker, sir, and passed through the Legislature, and the commissioners went to Richmond, and as the Senator says they disagreed; no settlement took place. They returned and their report was made and agreed to by a republican whom my friend knows well, Mr. Campbell of our State; all these gentlemen have heard of him. He is a leading republican. That report now stands approved by him; and so far as I know, and so far as the action of West Virginia is concerned, she is ready now and has been ready all the time to take her fair, just, and equitable proportion of that debt. I hope some day it will come to an adjustment; but until then I hope that the Senator and others will not misrepresent the parties. Now, I say to the Senator, so far as I know the republicans never sent a commission there, while the democrats did.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think I have given way sufficiently. It is very manifest——

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia a question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would prefer not to yield further.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask aside from the fact that no provision has been made in the constitution by the democratic party for an adjustment of the debt, has not the governor of West Virginia proclaimed in a State paper that the State was not bound for and did not owe any portion of the debt of old Virginia?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. What governor does the Senator refer to?

Mr. KELLOGG. A democratic governor of the State.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. What one?

Mr. KELLOGG. I cannot specify the governor. I am so informed by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. So far as I know, no governor has ever expressed himself in that way. I never heard of it; but on the contrary every governor who has expressed himself on that subject has said we ought to have a settlement.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I must protest against the habit that it seems to me has grown up in the Senate of interruptions more than I think it used to be. I do not know whether it is so or not, but it strikes me that it is more than it used to be. The interruption of Senators on the floor ought not to be carried so far. However, we have secured from the Senator from West Virginia one important fact. I was not arraigning West Virginia or East Virginia; I respect both those States, and I believe both those States have undeveloped resources which some day will make them rich and powerful and able to pay a good deal more than their present debts. But the Senator from West Virginia himself confesses that the guarantee or promise on the part of the State of West Virginia to assume a portion of the debt of Virginia, of the old State, was omitted by the democrats in forming the new constitution, according to his own statement; and I have no time to look into it. All there is in it is that when the proportions are adjusted or settled and they find out what it is, then they will pay the share of West Virginia.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I know the Senator will allow me a moment. In the constitution of 1862, the first the State had, you will find a reference to the debt pending between the two States, and the State of West Virginia proposed to assume a just and equitable proportion of it. That constitution stood until 1872, when there was a second constitutional convention, and by that convention the same words were not used, but a provision was made then for the bonded debt, and he will find it in two places.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator cannot find any such provision, I think.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It will be but a few days before the subject will be properly presented to the Senate, and then the Senators will know just how it stands. In the mean time I would advise my friend from Connecticut particularly to examine into the statements he made yesterday.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let me throw in a remark right here in justice to myself. I stated the exact fact as I understood it, that they left out of the constitution of 1872 that provision in the constitution of 1862 which provided for the assumption of a portion of the debt.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, the Senator said the republicans did so and so and the democrats did so and so. He was wholly mistaken.

Mr. HAWLEY. The democrats have had the State since 1872 and have not taken one step toward paying the debt.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The republicans had it long before that and did not pay anything.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, Mr. President, it is clear that between the two, West Virginia and East Virginia have refused, neglected, and repudiated practically their public debt; that for years after the democrats came into power, after they got control of every department of government, they neglected to pay the interest of the debt, and after they had entered into an agreement to pay a certain sum they failed to pay it, when a controversy arose among the people of Virginia, not only among democrats but among republicans, as to the terms and conditions of the debt, as to what Virginia could pay and ought to pay. One side was called "debt-payers" and the other side called "readjusters." Neither party was in favor of paying the public debt as it stood, so that in one sense both were equally faulty.

The Senator from Virginia has given his version of that controversy. He has stated that he was in favor of paying two-thirds of the debt at a fixed rate of interest, a rate of interest that if the credit of Virginia was as good as it formerly was would make her bonds at par to-day, leaving West Virginia to provide for one-third of the debt, leaving one-third of the debt to be provided for by West Virginia. Although all sides were in favor of repudiating the debt to a certain extent, the "debt-payers" only proposed to pay a part of it at a rate of interest of 4 per cent., I believe, and the readjusters proposed to pay a little less rate but probably more of the principal. Because of this difference, lo and behold! this Senate must be revolutionized by the renewing of motions one after another to adjourn and to go into executive session. This must be continued day after day, and day after day, until next December, in order to prevent us from electing a Virginia readjuster to an office here.

Mr. President, this is too narrow a basis to start a revolutionary proceeding upon, a proceeding that my friend from Delaware denounces as revolutionary when it was confined simply to Senators declining to vote. How is that revolutionary? Has not a Senator a right to vote as he pleases? Has he not a right to withhold his vote? Yes. Has he not a right to go out into the cloak-room and not vote? Yes, ordinarily; but whenever his declining to vote or his going into the cloak-room to avoid a vote is for the purpose of defeating the will of the majority or to break a quorum it is wrong. The Senator agrees with me there. So when he votes day after day, and day after day, for motions to adjourn when he does not want to adjourn, and to go into executive session when he knows that there is a piece of business on the table that a majority wish to dispose of first before they go into executive session, he only travels through the same road of revolutionary precedents which he denounces in others and which I am glad to concur with him in saying is improper.

Now what is the fourth reason he gives? Oh! my friend goes into very eloquent—I am sorry I cannot follow him—tropes and figures to denounce repudiation; repudiation is the evil that threatens our national credit. So it is, but yet he is one of the honored members of a party that has had control in every State of the Union where repudiation has been proposed or has been adopted. If the republican party as it is now organized ever proposed repudiation in any State or community, when or where? At one time we had a proposition to repudiate the debt of Ohio—my colleague is hardly old enough to remember that—when two of the leaders of the democratic party by the name of Byington and McNulty led off in a proposition to repudiate the debt of Ohio, then $25,000,000, when we had a population of something less than two millions. They said we never could pay it. Our bonds had got down to fifty cents on the dollar by reason of their extensive issue for public improvements then going on and conducted by both parties. A proposition was made to repudiate the debt, and it seemed for a time as if we should have the subject seriously discussed in Ohio, just when I was entering into political life; but the good sense of both parties, democrats and whigs, frowned it down, and McNulty was driven to Washington where he was elected by the democratic party Clerk of the House of Representatives, and soon after died, and Byington was driven into exile; and from that day to this we have never had a threat of repudiation from any one.

So with other States; but this doctrine of repudiation now has strong foothold, and it is twin sister to the doctrine that proposed to pay the interest on the public debt by an increased issue of legal-tender notes without any regard to their value. We must remember that ideas about repudiation had even entered these Halls, and for a time it seemed two or three years ago as if the very foundations of the public credit were to be disturbed. I am glad to say that the Senator from Delaware did what he could to prevent it. It was proposed here and almost carried that the resumption act and all acts upon which the public credit was founded should be swept away and repealed by the democratic party; and now my friend from Delaware begs us in eloquent terms, by every consideration of honor, of public faith, not to associate with Riddleberger or the Senator from Virginia because they are tainted with repudiation!

Mr. President, that will not do. That might come from others; but it cannot come from members of the democratic party, which, as I said before, has been the author and the beginner, the finisher and the ender of every proposition of repudiation of the public debt that has been made in the United States of America.

Now, sir, resume the argument, look over it all. Here is a proceeding that is admitted to be, if carried to an extreme extent, revolutionary and dangerous, which blocks the wheels of Government, prevents our discharge of the public business, prevents our going into executive session unless, forsooth, the majority will yield to the minority in regard to the order of business. Suppose, gentlemen, you should drive us to go into executive session; suppose you should control our action so far as to say we shall not do what the majority desire to do; you have the power to do it; no one questions that. Fifteen of you, if you have made up your minds to that dangerous expedient, can do it. It will not be long before the public attention of this country is called to that dangerous revolution. You have the power to do it. Suppose you drive us to that point that we go into executive business and propose to go on with the public business; when we get there you may say, "We will not consider a nomination that we do not like; fifteen of us will begin to exercise the same tactics." If you can do it to prevent the change of clerks here, why can you not do it when you come to act on the nominations of the great officers of the Government? Why can you not do it when you come to great matters as well as little matters? If revolutionary expedients and violation of the rules of the Senate are to be justified in these little matters, why not in greater matters? If the majority once yield to the minority this right of controlling the order of disposing of what they will, there is an end of orderly deliberation in this body.

No, sir, it is better as of old when one party goes out and another comes in that the party going out should accept the inevitable with meekness and kindness. Both parties are subject to these conditions, and whenever a majority of one, or even the bare constitutional majority of the casting vote, appears on one side or the other, the power ought to be cheerfully and in a friendly way handed over to the other, very much as an English minister would say, "Well, gentlemen, I believe I am right, but the House of Commons has decided that I am not by one majority; my message goes to the Queen, and she will send for the leader of the opposition." That is the orderly course of business. So in this body in my judgment this thing ought not to have occupied twenty-four hours. When the majority had by its action plainly intimated to the minority its desire to change certain officers, it ought to have been yielded to. They might have said, "This is very hard; you turn out these gentlemen who are good officers at the beginning of the season; they will lose the summer." We would have said, "Very well; do what has been done in other cases, give them their salary until next December, or if you please let the election of these new officers take effect on the 1st of July." The Senate has full power in that regard. Any terms of that kind would have been acceded to; but when they say, "No, you shall not turn out these officers, though we admit you are a majority; you shall not do it;" and then resort to revolutionary expedients, they pass the bounds of safe example. They cannot even fall behind that narrow basis of drawing a distinction between a majority made by the presiding officer, the Vice-President, and a regular majority, because on every vote made since the committees were organized there has been a majority of Senators on our side except on one tie vote, when their motion made was lost anyway; but on every other vote there has been a majority of Senators.

Sir, I did not intend to be drawn into this discussion. I appeal to Senators to allow us to proceed with the ordinary course of business; let us take the vote on the pending resolution. The majority have shown their desire to do it; and you ought not to resist it any further than to get your absentees in, or any further than to secure full opportunity for the friendly debate you desire to carry on. You may denounce us for our connection with the Senator from Virginia. We will take care of that. You may denounce us for voting for Mr. Riddleberger. We will take care of that. Anything that you ask of us in reason we will yield without any solicitation. But, sir, when you say to us, "Though now in the minority we will not let you go on with the public business except as we shall dictate," you put us in a position where we cannot surrender our position without endangering the institutions of our country, without endangering the laws of every deliberative body that ever existed since deliberation was known in political bodies. The majority must rule; the minority must have its rights; those rights must be respected to the last extent, even to personal discomfort, to secure full debate, to get in their absentees, to arouse public attention. That is reasonable and fair. But when that is exhausted, then the inevitable must come, or we have in this country nothing but a Mexican republic; we have a republic in the power of fifteen Senators to break it up at their will and pleasure under the rules, because we cannot even change the rules so as to defeat an attempted revolution. We cannot do anything except at their pleasure.

Suppose this idea had existed during the war when we had session after session night after night, when some of the most vital measures of the war, upon which rested and depended the fate of this country, were pending, and a small but a very able minority of men had exercised their right to call the yeas and nays and to interpose these dilatory motions. As I said yesterday, we sat through many a weary night to hear them out, but they never resorted to that expedient. I have heard the Senator from Delaware denounce over and over again some of the acts that we have passed, some that have been approved by the Supreme Court of the United States, some that were considered vital and necessary in the reorganization of State governments when reconstruction commenced, as unconstitutional, null, and void, dangerous to the public liberties, and all the other words and phrases that he could heap upon the measures of an opponent, but he never and his associates in those days never thought of resorting to this expedient.

I will say for the democratic party that during those long struggles it was never thought of to resort to dilatory motions except in order to secure debate and to secure time, and we generally gave them the time they desired and thus avoided controversy. Suppose they had adopted this doctrine on the passage of the thirteenth amendment or the fourteenth amendment or the fifteenth amendment, we never could have had those great safeguards of public liberty ingrafted in the Constitution.

This example is dangerous, it is revolutionary; it is like many good things which taken in moderation do very well. These dilatory motions to accomplish a wise purpose will always be acceded to and justified by the people; but when they go beyond reason they travel upon revolution, and I believe that the good sense of the people of this country will see this controversy in that light. The Senator from Delaware has not made out his case; the mysterious and mystical reasons that he was going to give us according to his promise yesterday disappear like the clouds before the summer sun; the ideas are too small, the grounds of opposition too weak. I trust to him, to his sense of honor, to his sense of patriotism, to his independence of character, to let us out of this difficulty by allowing the majority to proceed in an orderly way to the transaction of the public business.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the other side of the Chamber what would be their course in case the Vice-President should notify us to-day that he wanted to go to New York for forty-eight hours and we should bring forward a resolution——

Several SENATORS. Let him go.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Suppose we should bring forward a resolution to elect a President pro tempore?

Mr. COCKRELL. When that time comes we will determine what we will do.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I just suggest it to them. It may be an easy thing to laugh at; but you know what result might happen.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hope he will go. We shall find a way to elect a President pro tempore.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I hope we shall have a vote on the resolution now.

Mr. McPHERSON. I should like to ask the honorable Senator from Ohio a question before he entirely leaves the floor. If the honorable Senator from Ohio at this time, having recently been elected by the republican party of the State of Ohio a Senator in this body, should decide to separate himself from his allegiance to that party and go over to the democratic party—which I suppose is quite impossible; I might as well anticipate his answer in that regard, because that would be a greater stride onward and upward than even a good man from the good State of Ohio would take—but I ask the question, suppose he should decide to separate himself from his party and go over to the democratic side, would he first surrender his commission to the people of Ohio who elected him; would he first offer to them a surrender of that commission, or would he proceed deliberately to take his seat upon the opposite side of the Chamber and vote with the democratic party?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I think my answer to that question will show the absurdity of the position gentlemen occupy. Suppose the Senator from Virginia should resign his commission, as the Senator from New Jersey suggests, would it be a proper thing to do——

Mr. McPHERSON. I have suggested nothing. I have simply asked a question.

Mr. SHERMAN. Ah! Mr. President, we are not children.

Mr. McPHERSON. The deduction may follow.

Mr. SHERMAN. We are not children here. Whenever I choose to change my political relations I will determine then what I will do and how I will do it; but there is no likelihood at all of my joining the democratic party. As to this particular case, there is no pertinency whatever between it and the case put by the Senator in the question he propounds, because, as I have shown, the Senator from Virginia did not get a single democratic vote in the sense in which you consider men democrats. As I am told, he was elected by men who were opposed to the Bourbon democracy; and if he should resign he would resign to his own friends who are now supporting him by resolutions passed in various public meetings held by the very men who support him and who now control the Virginia Legislature. Therefore the case does not arise.

Mr. McPHERSON. I know the honorable Senator has already stated that fact, claiming it to be a fact, and with a great deal of emphasis. I did not suppose that the honorable Senator would undertake a vindication of one of his colleagues unless he was able to accomplish an effective and full vindication. He sent to the desk of the Secretary a statement and had read what was claimed to have been an interview with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE.] When I asked him the question as to whether that interview took place before the election which decided whether Mr. MAHONE was to occupy a seat in this body or not, he said that he did not know, but he still knew the fact of that interview, and he adduced the statements contained in Mr. MAHONE'S answer as an argument why Mr. MAHONE was not supported by the democratic party of Virginia, and as a reason why he owed them no allegiance.

Now, Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Ohio again, or any Senator on that side of the Chamber, to answer me this question: Can they show by any interview, by any speech, by any resolution, by any act, by any declaration made by the Senator from Virginia before his election, before the time that the votes of the people of Virginia were cast for him as a candidate for Senator here, that Mr. MAHONE intended to vote with the republican party? Is it not true, on the other hand, the readjuster party of Virginia ran a ticket upon a platform which the Senator from Ohio declared that he was not in sympathy with some of the declarations of? Now I ask that Senator what declaration there was contained in that platform other than the one with which he is not in sympathy that was not found in the democratic platform? Could he not with the same consistency and the same propriety trust any other democrat from Virginia? Could he not with more consistency and propriety trust a man who repudiated that part of the platform with which he was not in accord? Now, will the honorable Senator answer me another question?

Mr. LOGAN. He has not answered that yet.

Mr. McPHERSON. He can answer them all at once. Does he believe that if Mr. MAHONE—the Senator from Virginia I should say, because I have no right in a parliamentary way to mention names on this floor—does he believe for one moment that the party called the readjuster party, and which I have heard it claimed by republican Senators was made up largely of the democratic party in Virginia, a party that had never renounced its allegiance to the faith and principles and the policy of the national democracy as enunciated in its national platform, but believed in its policy—do you believe that those democrats would have voted for the Senator from Virginia upon the distinct assumption that he was to vote with the republican party when he got here? Unless the Senator can answer these questions to the satisfaction even of his own side of the Chamber, I claim that the full vindication of the Senator from Virginia which he has attempted here has not been made.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not desire to prolong this debate at this moment by any contribution of mine, except to make two sufficient and conclusive answers to the honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. McPHERSON.]

In the first place I wish to show him that, taking his own narrow view of the character and the public duty of a Senator of the United States, he is mistaken. The democratic party of Virginia before the election of the Legislature which sent here the present Senator from Virginia, before the presidential election, warned him by every mode by which they could officially express their relation to him that he had no further part or lot with them.

Mr. McPHERSON. May I interrupt the Senator just now?

Mr. HOAR. Not at this moment until I have made the point, then the Senator may.

I wish to read now from the chief organ of the democratic press of the State of Virginia, the Richmond Dispatch, a sentence published a few days previous to the last fall election:

As for individuals, their action on the 4th of November will settle their status. Those who follow Mahone will do so understanding that they need never ask for recognition by a conservative convention or a democratic administration.

Next I hold in my hand the address of the executive committee of the democratic party of Virginia bearing date—

ROOMS CONSERVATIVE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE,
Richmond, Virginia, July 28, 1880.

After speaking of the regular democratic ticket for presidential electors, they go on to speak of the Mahone ticket thus:

The other ticket was framed—

Says the official committee of the democratic party of Virginia—

The other ticket was framed by a convention that neither bore the name nor affected the principles of the national democracy. It assembled after the national convention adjourned; sent, of course, no representative thereto, and was without a voice or vote therein; was composed indifferently of democrats and republicans; counted among its constituents over forty negroes, and among these some delegates to the State republican convention, and many recognized as republican leaders; took pains, as we shall see, to disown all allegiance to or connection with the party that nominated Hancock and English; and as it was without participation in the choice, so is now without share in the organization of the national democratic party.

Mr. McPHERSON. May I ask the Senator a question right in this connection? Did not the so-called readjuster party of Virginia run an electoral ticket in the interest of Hancock and English?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, and that is the one they are talking about. [Laughter.] Mr. President, it is the very insult of hypocrisy for democrats, members of a party, who by every form of official expression warned this man that he was not of them, that he did not belong to them, and neither he nor any supporter of his Hancock ticket should thereafter be treated as a democrat, when they come into the Senate of the United States, now in a minority, first to get down on their knees, as they did for three weeks before the organization of this Senate, begging him to come in and help them, and then, when they failed in their effort, to assume this sudden virtue and spasm of lofty indignation and undertake to denounce the republican party as they do, that we are allying ourselves with what they call the dregs of the South.

Mr. President, I challenge a democratic Senator on this floor to stand up in the face of the American people and declare that he would refuse to support for public office or refuse to have a political alliance with anybody at the South for the reason that he entertained the opinions in regard to the payment of public debts attributed to Mr. Riddleberger or to Mr. MAHONE.

Mr. BAYARD. May I——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Delaware, who does me the honor now to rise to interrupt me, say that?

Mr. BAYARD. Yes; the Senator wants an answer and I will try to give it to him in the simplest English in the world. If a man—I do not care who, democrat or republican—advocates the side of repudiation and repudiation is made the issue, I would never support him, no matter what might be the number of votes by which he had been nominated.

Mr. HOAR. If repudiation is made the issue; but suppose repudiation is not the issue?

Mr. BAYARD. But repudiation in this case by the action of the Senator's party is made the issue.

Mr. HOAR. It is not. I deny it. Now I will resume the floor.

Mr. BAYARD. I affirm it.

Mr. HOAR. I resume the floor. The difference between the Senator and me is that when the honest ballot, when the living of voters in safety at their homes, when assassination and fraud are the issue, he will ally himself with the repudiationist who stands for all these things, and I ally myself with the repudiationist who joins with me to put them down.

Mr. BAYARD rose.

Mr. HOAR. Now let me read, before the Senator goes further—I do not yield to him at this moment; he was very unwilling to yield to me——

Mr. BAYARD. But the honorable Senator in the heat of his advocacy forgets, I think, to pay due respect to the motives of an opponent.

Mr. HOAR. I do not attribute motives; I deal with the fact.

Mr. BAYARD. But why, then, does the honorable Senator seek to stand before the country and ally me in any way with dishonest and unfair political methods? Why should he do it, and why is it necessary for his case?

Mr. HOAR. Because whenever the party that performs those things at the South is in distress the Senator from Delaware brings the weight of his own honorable and fair personal character always to its rescue. That is why.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not think it worth my while to deny, and I have lived too long to think it necessary for me to deny, such an allegation. The methods spoken of by the honorable Senator have found in me as active, as practical, as resisting, as persistent an opposition as my nature was capable of making.

Mr. HOAR. Well, Mr. President, the Senator thinks so; but in my judgment he is alone in thinking so. I have never heard from a southern Union man, black or white, I have never heard from a northern freeman of any color, the Senator from Delaware reckoned among the saints of that church. Why, Mr. President, let us look a little at this new-born zeal of our democratic friends against men who ally themselves with what he called the dregs of southern politics, with men who, to borrow the language of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] the other day, are indorsing this leprosy. The readjusters of Virginia certainly have been frank in the expression of their opinions, however bad or of evil tendency those opinions might have been; their opinions were well known during the presidential canvass of last year, and democratic oratory was not spared in endeavoring to induce those men to give their support to the democratic party. Let me read from a report in the Staunton Vindicator, a paper which I understand is one of the leading and principal Bourbon democratic papers in the State of Virginia, a passage.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator allow me——

Mr. HOAR. Not at this moment. I am reading from another democrat.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I was only going to ask how long I should have to wait for an answer to my question.

Mr. HOAR. I am going at this time to yield my time to another democratic orator, not to my friend from New Jersey. Here is the speech which that paper says was made by an honorable Senator from North Carolina to an audience of Virginia—MAHONE, Riddleberger, readjusters. Hear what he says, the honorable Senator who sits opposite me, [Mr. VANCE:]

> How can your debt affect or be affected by the presidential election? You must fix this thing up among yourselves. We have had readjustment in North Carolina. I am a readjuster myself.

Just think of my unhappy friend from Delaware. He cannot walk out of his seat through that end of the Chamber without coming against the Senator from North Carolina who says, "I am a readjuster myself." And he goes on:

> We just said, "We had land and negroes; you took the negroes, which were equal to the lands, away; now, you just credit us with fifty cents in the dollar and we'll pay you the balance." [Laughter.] We settled it, and didn't have anything to do with a presidential election either. And your State debt question—

Which has so much to do with the administration of his office by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate!—

> And your State debt question hasn't either. Settle that some other time.

Now, Mr. President, I should wish to repeat once more a passage in Scripture which occurred to me the other day. When our learned friends on the other side, our virtuous friends, our debt-paying friends, our honest friends, preach to us with horror the wickedness of putting this man into a ministerial office in the Senate of the United States, all I have to say is: "Beware ye of the leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy."

But, Mr. President, there is another thing I wish to say. I utterly repudiate for myself the doctrine of the democrats on the other side of the Chamber which makes here a Senator of the United States simply a party tool and organ. The Senator from Delaware, I know, will join with me in that repudiation. He believes as thoroughly as I do in the doctrine that I am about to state, I am sure, although I think he forgot it and abandoned it, and I do not think he is practicing on it at this moment. A Senator of the United States, under the Constitution of the United States, is chosen for six years to perform every duty of the senatorial office according to his best discretion at the time he performs it, not to be instructed by any man or body of men, not to be responsible to any man or body of men, but responsible only to his conscience and his God.

The very idea upon which this conservative branch of the Government of the United States was framed was that for six years the people put out of their own hands, out of the hands of the States, out of the hands of the Legislatures, into the hands of the chosen and picked sages of the Republic this large and weighty power and discretion; and that idea has been acted upon again and again not only in former times but in recent times.

When Senator Trumbull, of Illinois, abandoned the republican party that elected him to his seat in the Senate he retained through his constitutional term his position, although he acted during the last part of that term with the party now occupying the seats on the other side. So did Mr. Doolittle. When my honored and beloved friend, whose memory is to me one of the most cherished recollections of this earth, Charles Sumner, thought it his duty to differ with the republicans of his State and join with the movement on the other side in the support of Horace Greeley; when he wrote a letter urging the colored men of North Carolina to support the Senator himself, who is a readjuster, for the office of governor, much as we regretted his judgment, much as we differed from him in opinion, the republicans of Massachusetts recognized the full right of that illustrious Senator to act in public as his conscience might require; and I say to you—and my colleague I know will confirm what I say—that there was not an event in future history more certain than the re-election of Charles Sumner to his seat in this body by a republican Legislature of Massachusetts if he had lived until the election came around. The doctrine into which party necessity has driven the honorable Senator from Delaware is not only, as has been so well said, revolutionary, but he forgets in his argument in support of that doctrine the senatorial character of which I am happy to say I think him so honorable an example.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, I rose to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether it would be agreeable for me to interrupt him or whether I should wait until he was done; but I did not obtain his recognition. He was pleased to read from a speech which I made in the valley of Virginia in the last campaign showing that I was something of a readjuster myself. I made that speech, Mr. President; and although it is reported by a person who does not pretend to be a stenographic or short-hand reporter, I presume the publication was substantially correct as far as it went. I did advocate the doctrine of readjustment on that occasion. I proposed that instead of readjusting the State debt of Virginia, we should readjust the national politics of this country and eject from office some of the many men who had disgraced it by attempting to deprive the people of their liberties and had covered the American name with corruption. That was the principal readjustment that I advocated. I then alluded to the fact that North Carolina had not settled her debt in full, and that even if I recognized the propriety of a citizen of an adjoining State going into Virginia and reprimanding her people about the manner in which they should settle their own State debt, I should have nothing to reproach Virginia with, because my State had not settled her debt in full. That was the position I assumed there, and I am a little astonished that notwithstanding that speech was published and went throughout the length and breadth of Virginia, the particular friends and adherents of the new Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] should lately have denounced me in Norfolk for an attempt to interfere with them in the State of Virginia in regard to the settlement of their debt! There is a mistake somewhere or other in this matter. I either did not interfere with their debt question in Virginia, or I did. If this speech is true which I made in the valley of Virginia, then, Mr. President, the resolutions of the readjusters in Norfolk were not true. One or the other must be the case.

> Resolved, That we, the readjusters of the city of Norfolk, and others, heretofore acting with the so-called democratic and the republican party, hereby express our hearty approbation of the manly and independent course pursued by General WILLIAM MAHONE, Senator from Virginia, upon the floor of Congress, in refusing to cooperate with BAYARD, who had grossly misrepresented him and his party, and who lacked the manliness to correct his misstatements when informed of them; or to go in caucus with HAMPTON, VANCE, and MORGAN, who came from repudiating States to teach honesty to and defeat our party in Virginia, who were striving for a just and equitable readjustment of the State debt, or to act with JOHNSTON, whose interference with our debt question the people of the Commonwealth had emphatically repudiated at the polls.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him what Morgan is there referred to?

Mr. VANCE. I prefer not to be interrupted by the gentleman who would not recognize me when I was trying to obtain his attention, and if he cannot be easy I hope he will be as easy as he can. [Laughter.] Now, Mr. President, either a direct misstatement has been made with regard to my course in the campaign in Virginia last summer, or there is only one other interpretation to be given to it. It is seen that by the speech which I made in the valley of Virginia I was in favor of paying fifty cents on the dollar, and so said to the crowd who were listening to me; and when I am here accused of trying to teach honesty to the State of Virginia, or rather to that portion of it that were called readjusters, perhaps the impudence and the interference consisted in trying to get them to pay as much as fifty cents on the dollar, which I was willing to do. I do not know how that was. I will leave them to settle it among themselves.

I now desire to say, Mr. President, that North Carolina is not a repudiating State. I desire to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that while North Carolina has not settled her debt in full, comes far short of having settled it in full, the compromise which was made by her last Legislature, and under which her debt has been refunded, or is now in process of refunding, and under which more than half of all her outstanding indebtedness has already been taken in, was made when a committee of the bondholders of the State of North Carolina were present with the committee of the Legislature in charge of the debt question, and that committee of bondholders acceded to the proposition made by the Legislature of North Carolina. It was wholly voluntary and not compulsory. That was the settlement of the debt of North Carolina; and moreover when that committee of bondholders was in conference with the legislative committee and it was agreed that a full and frank and candid conference should be had and questions asked and answered on both sides, after the committee on the part of the Legislature had responded fully to every question concerning the resources and the condition of the State and its capacity to pay its debt in full, then questions were put in turn to the bondholders to know what they had paid for the bonds which they held, for our bonds were nearly all in second hands, and they frankly confessed that the sum which we agreed to give them largely exceeded that which they had paid for their bonds; and they accepted that settlement gladly, and they made money by the proposition.

Now, the Senator from Massachusetts, I know, is aware that there is a good precedent for settling the public debt at what it cost the holder thereof. The Government of the United States so settled the Continental scrip upon which we fought the war of independence and won our victory at about the rate of eight hundred for one, as I recollect.

There is the difference between the State of North Carolina and the State of Virginia; and the Senator from Virginia the other day, when he made his speech, which I did not have the pleasure of hearing, referred to the fact that North Carolina was a repudiating State, as he saw proper to denounce it, and undertook to quote the act of her Legislature by which her debt was settled; he left out, for what reason is best known to himself, two important sections of that act, to wit, the third and fourth, which provide that the bonds to be issued under that act in taking up the old debt were to be non-taxable by any authority whatsoever, State, municipal, or county, and further that the coupons upon those bonds were to be receivable in payment of public taxes. Those two things were left out in his statement, because, as I suppose, while upon the face of the bills as thus presented the Riddleberger bill would appear to be a little better, yet inasmuch as the Riddleberger bill neither permitted the coupons of the bonds to be receivable in payment of taxes nor exempted them from taxation, which might have destroyed the whole of their value, it could not compare with the full text of the North Carolina bill.

Mr. President, I did not propose to occupy time now, but I will address the Senate to-morrow with its permission. For the present, having answered the assault which the Senator from Massachusetts made on me, if it could be called an assault, I do not name it as such in an improper spirit, I shall say no more on the subject of North Carolina; but I propose to-morrow, with the permission of the Senate and for the purpose of vindicating my State and her good name, which is dear to me as a matter of course, to give a short history of the legislation of North Carolina with relation to her public debt.

Mr. DAWES. Now, Mr. President, I hope we may have a vote on the resolution.

Mr. VANCE. I was just about proposing to the Senator from Massachusetts to let us adjourn and go to dinner.

Mr. DAWES. I hope that we may clear up the business before us, which we can do in fifteen minutes, and then the Senator from North Carolina will have a clear field for his speech to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to indefinitely postpone the pending resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, in order that we may give our attention to that business for which we were convened by the President of the United States, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Several SENATORS called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) I am paired for the rest of the day with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HILL, of Colorado, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. WALKER.]

Mr. MORRILL, (when his name was called.) My colleague [Mr. EDMUNDS] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND.] On this question I vote "nay."

Mr. PLATT, of Connecticut, (when his name was called.) I am paired for the day with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. CAMDEN.]

Mr. INGALLS, (when Mr. PLUMB's name was called.) The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] is paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

Mr. ROLLINS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] who was called away on very important business.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GROVER, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK,] and I withdraw my vote. I forgot it when the roll was called.

Mr. TELLER. I am paired on this subject with the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY.] He will be absent from the Senate some little time; and this pair will continue on all political questions.

Mr. HARRIS. I was requested by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] to state that he was paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.]

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Bayard,	George,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Slater,
Call,	Groome,	McPherson,	Vance,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and twenty-one minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, April 7, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CAPITULATIONS OF OTTOMAN EMPIRE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following communication; which was read:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith, in response to the resolution of the Senate of the 18th ultimo, a report of the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, in relation to the capitulations of the Ottoman Empire.

JAMES A. GARFIELD.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON, April 6, 1881.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, April 5, 1881.

To the President:

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate of the 18th ultimo, requesting the transmission to that body of a copy of the report made to him by Edward A. Van Dyck, consular clerk at Cairo, on the capitulations of the Ottoman Empire, has the honor to lay before the President herewith the report called for, with its appendices.

This report, of which the first part is now submitted, will, when complete, be doubtless found of interest and value, as throwing much light, not merely on the relations of the European powers to the Porte, which have been so prominent of late, but also on the treaty rights of the United States, as based on the "most-favored-nation" treatment accorded in the existing treaty with Turkey.

JAMES G. BLAINE.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that the communication and accompanying report be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. BECK, it was Ordered, That William B. Clift and others be allowed to withdraw the papers accompanying Senate bill No. 826 of the Forty-sixth Congress on file in the Senate.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being the resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] for the election of certain officers of the Senate, the pending question being upon the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone the resolution indefinitely, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] yesterday indicated a desire to occupy the attention of the Senate to-day.

Mr. PENDLETON. The motion will not interfere with him. He is willing that we should go into executive session.

Mr. DAWES. I did not know but that it would interrupt his arrangement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. PENDLETON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.] If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when Mr. GROOME's name was called.) The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GROOME] is paired with my colleague, [Mr. SAWYER.]

Mr. HARRIS, (when his name was called.) I agreed to pair with the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] who is absent. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] is confined to his home by indisposition, and I have transferred my pair with the Senator from New York to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. SEWELL, (when Mr. MCPHERSON's name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. MCPHERSON.]

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) I am paired on political questions with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COKE. My colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea." I make the announcement for the day.

Mr. FARLEY. I am requested to announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. FAIR] is paired with his colleague, [Mr. JONES.] I make the announcement for the day.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say, and I also make the announcement for the day, that my colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] is still detained at home by reason of indisposition, and is paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.]

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Bayard,	Farley,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,
Beck,	George,	Jonas,	Slater,
Brown,	Gorman,	Jones of Florida,	Vance,

So the motion was not agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to indefinitely postpone the resolution.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, I announced yesterday that I should claim the floor to-day to make a few remarks in relation to the action of my native State concerning its public indebtedness. Perhaps it is hardly necessary to do so. The circumstances which have attended my State and all the States of the South since the war are pretty well known to the country; but inasmuch as my State has been referred to as one of those in the South that has repudiated her public debt, I deem it incumbent upon me to deny that charge in the terms in which it is made, and to explain to the country the actual state of facts.

In 1866, soon after the close of the war, when the Legislature of North Carolina assembled in the midst of the desolation which then surrounded her people, when her lands from one end to the other had been overrun by hostile armies and the blackened chimneys of her burned homes marked like milestones the path of desolation that had passed through her borders, when her railroads were bankrupt, when her banks and moneyed institutions were all overthrown, when one-half of her property had been destroyed by the abolition of slavery, her homes and her pleasant places had been burned, her fields desolated, her public charities ruined, and almost every interest that the hand of war could reach had been overturned, one among the very first acts to be found upon the statute-book of that State was an act recognizing and providing for the payment of interest on the public debt. The State did not even claim, as Virginia through the readjuster party of that State claims, that she should be exempted from the payment of the interest which had accumulated during the war or of the interest which had accumulated during the period of reconstruction. She provided for the whole of her debt, interest and all. I beg to have read by the Secretary that act in full—it is very short—in order that it may be seen what North Carolina in the midst of her desolation then did toward maintaining her credit and meeting her honest engagements.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

An act to provide for the payment of the State debt, contracted before the war.

Whereas it appears by the estimate of the public treasurer that the debt of the State upon the coupons now due on bonds issued under acts passed prior to the 20th day of May, A. D. 1861, is about the sum of two and a half million dollars, and the coupons falling due in the year 1866 will amount to about the sum of six hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and that the bonds of the State due and to become due in the year 1866 amount to the sum of $364,000, making an aggregate sum of $3,514,000 of the public debt which was contracted before the war to be provided for during the present fiscal year: Therefore, in order to provide means to enable the public treasurer to pay said debts,

SECTION 1. Be it therefore enacted by the General Assembly of the State of North Carolina, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, That the public treasurer be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be prepared and to sell bonds of the State, to an amount not exceeding the sum of $3,500,000, for the purpose of paying the said debt, which bonds shall bear date the 1st day of January, 1866, and be made payable thirty-four years thereafter, with coupons bearing 6 per cent. interest, payable at such places as the public treasurer may prescribe. The said bonds shall be of the denomination of $100, $500, and $1,000, and shall not be disposed of for less than par, and in all other respects shall be issued agreeable to the provisions of the nineteenth chapter of the revised code; and the said bonds and interest accruing thereon shall be exempt from taxation.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That the bonds of the State which were issued under acts passed prior to the 20th day of May, 1861, and which have already become due, or may become due before the 1st day of January, 1867, shall bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the time the same shall have or may become due; and

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That this act shall be in force from its ratification. Ratified the 10th day of March, A. D. 1866.

Mr. VANCE. At the beginning of the war, in 1861, the taxable property of the State of North Carolina, upon which this debt was based, amounted to $225,000,000. I have not been able to obtain in this city, as I expected, the official documents of the State department of North Carolina, and I state it from memory at $225,000,000, $100,000,000 of which was slave property. When the Legislature passed the act I have just had read by the Secretary the slave property of course was gone, and the real estate and all the remainder of the property that had been taxable was much diminished in value, so that it can be said with truth that the taxable property of the State at that time amounted to about one hundred million dollars, not more.

In 1868 further provision was made for funding the accumulated interest that had not been paid; and in the same year, at another session of the Legislature, the maturing bonds were funded. It was also provided that they should bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. until provision was made for their payment; so that up to the year 1868 every act that an impoverished and almost ruined people could perform for the discharge of their obligations was done, and was adhered to as faithfully as was in our power. In 1868, however, there came what was known as reconstruction. The fourteenth amendment was submitted to the people of North Carolina, and it was announced that unless that amendment was adopted the State could not be readmitted into the Union. That fourteenth amendment contained a provision that North Carolina should repudiate all of her debt contracted directly or indirectly in aid of the rebellion. So we had either to remain out of the Union under the control of the military which was placed over us by the reconstruction acts, or we had to adopt the fourteenth amendment and drink this chalice of repudiation which was first put to our lips. I announce without the fear of being contradicted that for the first time in the history of North Carolina was she compelled to repudiate any of her obligations. In the course of two hundred and ninety years, since the ships of Walter Raleigh dropped their anchors in Hatteras Inlet and the first man of the Indo-Germanic race ever beheld her glorious forests and her rivers and her bays, for the first time North Carolina was compelled to be recreant to her plighted faith; and that she then did so at the dictation of the loyal, non-repudiating, debt-paying, honest, and virtuous people of the North!

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The republican party of the North.

Mr. VANCE. The republican party of the North. I speak of those who controlled the North, of course. I commend the fact, Mr. President, to the consideration of gentlemen upon the other side. What was repudiated by that section of the fourteenth amendment which we were compelled to adopt in our own constitution, and which was adopted by the Legislature which was elected under the reconstruction acts? Not only all of the debt properly created by the State of North Carolina in aid of the war, (of that we could not so much complain,) but the bonds issued in support of the government of the State during the period of the war had found their way into all the departments and all the channels of trade and intercourse among our people. A large number of them had found their way to banks necessarily, and most of those banks when these bonds were repudiated became bankrupt and were destroyed. They found their way into all the fiduciary channels of our people. Widows and orphan children whose all consisted in these bonds which had been taken for them by their guardians or by the administrators of the estates of which they were the distributees, these were all repudiated. The school fund found itself in the possession of a large number of them; those were repudiated, and the little children of the State, standing in the midst of a stripped and desolate country, as ours was then, found themselves without the means of education simply because the State had been compelled to repudiate the obligations which constituted their fund. Many an orphan child who has grown up in ignorance, and whose name will appear in the next census reports as one of the illiterate in North Carolina, owes that illiteracy to the repudiating policy forced upon the people of North Carolina by the Government of the United States under the control of the republican party. Nay, sir, it permeated every private contract. In the case of a young man buying a horse and going off into the army and enlisting in the cavalry with that horse, giving his note for it, our republican supreme court, following the dictates of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, have declared that the value of that horse could not be recovered in the courts because the seller believed or had reason to know that the horse was going to be used in aid of the rebellion. At that time, when we were laboring under the most rigid blockade, and when the poor of our people were almost on the point of starvation, communities formed associations for the purpose of buying salt for the support of the poor, and to keep women and children from starvation. Our supreme court decided that under the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States and the articles of our own constitution, which we were obliged to adopt in conformity thereto, the money which purchased that salt to save those women and children from starvation was advanced contrary to public policy, and was in support of the rebellion, and could not be repaid. It permeated everything; it reduced our people to absolute ruin; they had been on the edge of it before. If we had come out straight and square and repudiated every dollar that we owed, we could have been justified to some extent in saying to the country, "You taught us that doctrine of repudiation." In the language of old Mazeppa we could have said:

Ill betide
The school wherein I learned to ride.

But in spite of all that we had endeavored faithfully to maintain our plighted obligation.

The power departed from the true people, the proper citizens of North Carolina, under the reconstruction acts. The Legislature elected under those reconstruction acts assembled in July, 1868, and they sat for two years almost continuously; and what did they do with the public debt? They incorporated a provision in the constitution that it should be sacred and inviolable, and they "bulled" it, as the phrase is, in Wall street, not for the purpose of honestly paying it or to enhance the price of the bonds of the State, which was then very low, but for purposes of their own, which will appear when I get a little further on. They formed all kinds of companies for the improvement of the material interests of the State; they chartered railroads here and there and in every direction; they provided for digging canals; and they provided for the building of a penitentiary. We had never had a penitentiary in North Carolina previous to that time. We had always thought that the cheapest way to deal with a man who was guilty of stealing or any felony was to take him up to a whipping-post and give him thirty-nine and then let him go free.

All these schemes were inaugurated by the Legislature of 1868-'69, and to carry them out they provided for the issue of about twenty-two million dollars in State bonds. The actual issue to the presidents of these various improvement companies, men of their own selection, to build railroads, &c., was more than sixteen million dollars. What was done with that vast amount of money? Our bonds then were worth something like seventy cents on the dollar. What was done with them? I have stated at home, I state it here—it is not an elegant expression, but, sir, one that is extremely characteristic of the conduct of those people in building railroads—that if you would take a dog of a wet afternoon and drag him down a hillside by the hind legs, you would have about as much evidence of railroad building as the State of North Carolina received from the issue of these $22,000,000 of State bonds. Just about no railroads were built; no penitentiary was built; no canals were dug; no public schools were established for the education of the poor; no asylums for the protection of the insane, of the deaf and dumb, or the blind and helpless—nothing of the sort was done.

Where did the bonds go? Where did the money go? An investigation was had before a committee of the Legislature in regard to the one single bill appropriating $7,000,000 for the completion of the Western North Carolina Railroad, as it was called, and it was proven by the oath of the president of that association that he had paid $252,000 for bribing the Legislature to get that one bill through. That was the republican legislature of 1868-'69. How much of the $22,000,000 was paid to get the other bills through was never known judicially.

Where did those bonds go, Mr. President? A large quantity of them in the hands of a carpet-bagger by the name of Dewees went to the State of Ohio and became invested in an entire block in the city of Cleveland. A very large number went to your own city of New York and were gambled off at faro. Numbers of them were found in houses of prostitution. One noted courtesan was seen with forty thousand dollars' worth of bonds of the State of North Carolina in her possession.

They purchased for the erection of a penitentiary 8,000 acres of land. Think of it! That was a time when there was great excitement in my resurrected and regenerated country on the subject of homesteads. We had poetry on the subject, we had judicial decision about providing every man with a homestead that should be free from turret to foundation-stone, in which no man could molest him or make him afraid, &c., not even the men he owed for bread; and the suspicion was naturally infused abroad in the public mind that the purchase of 8,000 acres for a penitentiary looked forward to the time when all the men who were stealing this money should find a homestead in that place. [Laughter.] A committee was formed to locate that penitentiary. One member of the committee contracted with the owner of the land at one dollar an acre, and then recontracted with his co-committee men to sell it to the State at $100,000, over twelve times the amount. The land itself was as remotely connected with the idea of a penitentiary as any land you ever heard of in your life. It was the poorest land to be found in the State of North Carolina. It was a waste that had been held by speculators for years and years and could not be sold at any price. I am told that at times the grasshoppers would climb up on the mullein-stalks with tears in their eyes and talk about the prospects of the coming crops on that plantation. [Laughter.] There went $100,000 of our bonds, and they did not build a penitentiary.

So I might go on and consume the time of the Senate for hours in showing the extravagance and the waste, the carnival of corruption and thievery and scoundrelism that reveled in the old-fashioned and honest State of North Carolina.

Finally, after indignation had been excited to such an extent that it was about to be swept from the face of the earth, that same Legislature passed an act repudiating every single dollar that they had caused to be issued in bonds in aid of railroads. These things went on to such an extent that disorders were produced, and instead of putting down these disorders by redressing the grievances and returning somewhat to the principles of honesty and morality, a law was passed in 1870 by the republican legislature, the same Legislature to which I have referred, authorizing the governor, in his discretion, to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, to declare any county in the State that he saw proper in a state of insurrection and to levy an army to make war upon his own people. That was done; a number of counties were declared to be in insurrection in 1870; the writ of habeas corpus was suspended; an army consisting of two regiments, one white and one black, was levied for the purpose of suppressing disorder in those counties; and having no arms to arm them the State of New Hampshire very kindly loaned the governor of North Carolina sufficient to equip that motley, cut-throat, and ragged crowd to levy war upon the people and liberties of North Carolina.

Well, that war went on; those counties were declared to be in a state of insurrection; the writ of habeas corpus was refused and trampled upon by the governor, though issued by a judge of the supreme court, himself a republican, and men were arrested by the military, and drum-head court-martials were formed for the purpose of trying those men, and even torture was inflicted, as was abundantly proven before a committee of the Legislature, to force those men to confess. They were hanged by the necks until they were almost dead, and then taken down and exhorted to confess.

These things went on until at last the people in their might rose. A large number of the people of North Carolina had been devoted to the Union, and they had accepted the terms of reconstruction; they were opposed to Bourbonism, as it is the fashion to term every man who stands up for his home and his native land; but when they saw this carnival of corruption and riot running wide over society, they turned in the election of 1870, in their quiet manner, without appeals from the newspapers, without inflammatory appeals from politicians on the stump—for the politicians were nearly all afraid of arrest by the military—the people, I say, went to the polls and deposited their ballots, and by the time the sun went down on that noted day in August, 1870, the whole thing was dissolved as the mist before the morning sun. A majority of two to one in the Legislature was democratic, and the democratic candidate for attorney-general, the only officer we elected by a vote at large, was elected by several thousand majority. We recovered the lands of our fathers.

But, Mr. President, we were much in the condition of the old preacher who was traveling, preaching the gospel and depending upon the voluntary contributions of his congregations for his support. On one occasion he stopped and preached lengthily and earnestly at night, and afterward he determined to pass the hat around for a contribution to aid him to go on. The hat was circulated diligently among all the benches, no one was overlooked, and when it was passed back up to the pulpit the old preacher looked into it and there was not a single solitary copper in it. He raised his hands with much pious fervor and said, "Brethren, let us thank God that this hat got back safely out of this crowd." [Laughter.] Mr. President, when the proper citizenship of North Carolina resumed control of it, our taxable property as I have said could not under any circumstances have exceeded $120,000,000, and upon that was a debt of $42,000,000. We thanked God that we had the hat left; we had the dirt left under our feet, and the tradition of liberty which had come from our brave forefathers, and strong hearts and strong arms to go to work with; and like Paul when he came in sight of the Three Taverns, we thanked God and took courage.

Mr. President, from that day to the present, instead of trying to pay this debt that had been created by this carpet-bag government and placed upon us in this fraudulent and outrageous manner, we resolutely turned our back upon it. We have never tried to pay it; we never will try to pay it. It is fraudulent; it is vicious; it is not a debt in any sense of the word. But we have tried to reserve all our energies for the recuperation of our people, and we have been successful in that. The State of North Carolina is now reasonably prosperous, under a good government, and we have taken all classes and conditions of our people in hand down there; nobody has been neglected; all disorders long since have vanished in the State. A constable now can quell with his simple staff of office any kind of disorder that ever arises among our people. The writ of a court is respected by all; the law is enthroned in all its majesty; labor receives a reasonable reward and absolute security in the courts; white children and black are improving in their condition in the schools. Every year the tax for the support of common schools is increased; every year the number of pupils attending common schools increases. Accommodations for the unfortunate of both races have been provided for; two asylums for the insane of the white race, as well appointed as any perhaps in America; one asylum equal in all its appointments has been provided for the unfortunate of the colored race, for the deaf and dumb and blind and the insane. Normal schools for the education of teachers have been provided alike for the white and the black; and although the whites are in a majority of almost two to one in the State over the blacks, yet the amount of money appropriated for the support of schools for the education of teachers for the black race is equal in amount to that appropriated for the education of the teachers of the white race. They have the same rights in every respect; they organize in every city as fire companies; they organize in every city as military companies, and uniform themselves and receive arms and commissions from the State. There is no distinction made; and the man who to-day can rise here or anywhere and say that the law is not observed in the State of North Carolina and that there is not a perfect equality before it for both black and white maligns and slanders a generous and a just people.

That is what we have done, sir; and while all of these things have been done, the last Legislature, except the one now in existence, provided for the settlement of the public debt, which was referred to the other day by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE,] under the present plan which I announced to the Senate yesterday.

I appeal to just and fair-minded men everywhere if North Carolina has not acted in a proper and just and equitable spirit. Mr. President, if I did not think she had I would say so. Although she is the land of my birth and of my unchanging love, yet if her conduct had not been what I call that of a just and an equitable people I would not rise in the presence of the American people and assert it here. I believe that she has settled her debt honorably.

Now the question comes, "If so, why can you not support the candidate for Sergeant-at-Arms of this body who has done no more than you? Why do you and the people on this side of the House make war upon the new Senator from Virginia for the course that he is taking?" Mr. President, that is avoiding the issue; that is undertaking to skip the issue. The question is not to us "Why can you not support him?" but the question is to gentlemen on the other side, "How can you support him?"

The candidate for Sergeant-at-Arms is a democrat. Well, we upon this side of course can forgive that. The candidate for Sergeant-at-Arms was a rebel and an unrepentant rebel; we on this side can forgive that, for many of us are very much like him in that respect. They say the candidate for Sergeant-at-Arms is also a man who undertook to readjust and settle below its face value the debt of his own State; I, for one, can forgive that, but how can you forgive him? He is a rebel, an unrepentant one; he is a democrat, an unrepentant one; he is a readjuster, and an unrepentant one. How can you forgive him—that is the question—not how can we, but how can you?

Mr. President, I will tell you why I object. I object to voting for any man who calls himself a democrat who has a surname before the word "democrat." I object to the manner in which the republican party have undertaken to foist that candidate upon this Senate for the reason that it is in defiance of the whole plan of political salvation; because he has never repented. They have taken him, as it were, in his sins, unaneled and unshriven, in a state of nature, not in a state of grace. [Laughter.] Yes, sir; he has been translated to the heaven of republicanism without ever tasting of death. [Laughter.] This model democratic rebel readjuster, this political Elijah has been taken to the republican heaven in a chariot of fire before our eyes right here, [laughter;] and all that we could do as the sparks flew from the hoofs of these heavenly coursers as they thundered against the cerulean pavements of the skies, was to throw up our hands and exclaim, "My father, my father; the chariot of republicanism and the horsemen thereof." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, may I be pardoned for telling another story? I am aware that it is contravening the dignity of this august body; but when the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] told us the other day of the horrors and the power of this democratic solid South, how they were going to break it up by this election, and how they were going to start the ball in motion, I was reminded of a half-witted boy that had been to Sunday school, and when he came one morning instead of attending to his lesson he insisted on telling his teacher about the death of the family dog; and said he "Tige was a good dog, too, and he looked mighty savage but he would not bite a bit;" and then after a solemn pause and scratching his head said he "I bet the angels will be scared when they see Tige coming trotting through the front gate." [Laughter.] Mr. President, we are to see the solid South broken into a thousand atoms, the foundations of the great deep of the southern democracy are to be broken up when "Tige" comes trotting through the front gate. Did you ever know, sir, so great an undertaking inaugurated by such small means? Did you ever know a party to confess by indirection the extremities and the straits to which they were reduced? They announce here that they rely for party success upon an alliance with the Senator from Virginia and the election of Riddleberger to be Sergeant-at-Arms of this body. That is to break "the solid South." Yes, sir, the end of all things is come now. If the success of the republican party in the next four years depends upon that, I beg to say to them they had better make their wills, put their houses in order, and prepare for the end. That is the notion I have.

Why, Mr. President, the papers are full daily of condemnation of such conduct; the republican portion of this Senate, the so-called majority, are called upon to explain every day why they make such an alliance as this instead of going to work and transacting the public business. There is the President of the United States, who convened this Senate in special session for the purpose of confirming nominations of officers that were necessary to enable him to carry on the government of the country; and the Senate of the United States, at least a majority of the Senate—at any rate they call themselves a majority—have determined that all these things must wait, that there is a great crisis upon the country. Well, Mr. President, there may be. I know very well that the safety of the Republic is the supreme law, and that when these great crises arise confirmations and everything else must be stopped, and the momentous questions upon which depend the welfare of the country and of the people must be attended to.

Sir, there have been a number of these great crises in the history of our country. We had that of the Revolution, by which our independence was won from 1776 onward. That was met, fought through, conquered, and our independence was established. Then another crisis arose in the second war with Great Britain, when our right as a nation and our full recognition before the powers of the world was to be established, and that was fought through and established. Not to mention the minor crises which preceded then came the war of the rebellion, and after four years of arduous struggle, when every other interest and subject-matter was subordinated to that all-important thing, the triumph of the Union arms was established, the Union was restored, and that great crisis passed away. Now, we have another: the great crisis now is, whether Riddleberger shall be the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate or not; and upon that hangs the destiny of nations. Again that old starry flag is not only fluttering in the breeze, but trembling; that flag which Kane planted at the North Pole, which floats in the winds of every sea under heaven, and the roar of the morning guns beneath which announces to the tyrants of the world that the emblem of the great Republic is here, that flag is about to go down again in blood unless the republican caucus can put an unrepentant rebel and readjuster into the office of Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate! I am glad to say, fellow Senators, that I think it is a great crisis for Riddleberger; there can be no doubt about that. [Laughter.]

Then we are told this is to be the beginning of a new order of things. The Senator from Connecticut told us that he hailed it as the avant-courier of better times, of a disposition to break up this old Bourbonism of the South that never forgot anything and never learned anything; and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] abandoning, as he sometimes does, the actual region of facts, went into poetic imagination and told us that he saw in the movement from Virginia a disposition of men to come out from among the tombs and turn their faces toward the sunlight and let their brows be illuminated by the coming dawn. I almost give up after that.

Mr. President, the vanguard of this great army is here sure enough, and what must we think of the army itself when we get a good view of the vanguard? Mr. Riddleberger has come out from among the tombs and turned his face eastward toward the sunrise, and is willing to let his brow be illuminated by the dawn as old Trapbois was—for a "consideration," and I understand, though they are not yet presented on the roll of candidates, that from seven hundred to one thousand glorious patriots have come out from among the tombs of Bourbonism in old Virginia and are here and hereabout besieging the aisles and sitting in the galleries and the lobbies of the hotels, willing every one of them to have their brows illumined for a consideration.

Mr. President, Dr. Johnson is credited with saying that patriotism is the last refuge of a scoundrel. So it would seem to me that leaving Bourbonism and turning their faces toward the dawn is the last refuge of a needy and dissatisfied politician in Virginia; and however much of eloquence the republican Senators here may undertake to pour upon this transaction, after all it is simply an endeavor, as was candidly confessed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] to stay and strengthen the hands of a waning party majority. That is what is the matter. They say they want a free ballot and a fair count, and that is to be the watchword.

Mr. President, when did that free ballot and fair count become necessary? Has it not always been necessary? The honorable Senator from Virginia says that he fell out with the Bourbons some years ago, and if there was any cheating of the people in regard to their votes anywhere in Virginia it must have been done some time ago, for there has been no election there for over six months, and how does it happen that now for the first time this question of a free ballot and fair count becomes necessary to be introduced to the American people? I have noticed—perhaps my powers of observation may be at fault—that a man generally supports his weakest point. If a man is conscious of any particular defect in his character, he is always trying to fool his neighbors in regard to that; and that is why a coward is generally a bully. You will observe that old farmers going around their plantations in the spring of the year do not lay rails up where the fence is high enough. They lay them up on the low places. The commander of a fortress always strengthens the weakest point, and it is said that the strength of a fortification is equal to the strength of its weakest point. So when I hear the leaders of the republican party in this country break out on a fresh trail for a free ballot and a fair count I always look out for some extraordinary outrage upon the ballot-box.

Why, Mr. President, you remember very well that the words which rang through this country like the sound of a trumpet, "Let us have peace," just preceded the time when all the Southern States were deluged with troops. And again it was announced and paraded with another sound of trumpets in regard to the election of 1876, that neither candidate could afford to be counted in by fraud, and that preceded the great, gigantic, climacteric fraud of eight to seven. Always look out when a politician turns reformer. There is something going to happen just as sure as time permits it to happen. Now the cry of "a free ballot and a fair count" I say is raised by the republican party either because they cannot raise anything else, or because some extraordinary outrage upon the ballot-box and the freedom of the citizens of the South is in contemplation. I have heard it whispered that they were going to raise committees to go down South and overturn a number of elections down there and unseat fifteen or twenty perhaps of the Representatives from that section. I do not know whether that is really so or not; but I think it would have been so if the President had seen proper to call an extra session of Congress. At all events I warn the people of my country so far as my voice can go that instead of this being an alliance for the purpose of promoting the purity of the ballot-box and the freedom of the citizen, it is an attempt once more to subject the people of the Southern States—who have been freed long enough now to accumulate a little money—to subject them once more to the domination of carpet-bag rule, in order that their little savings in the mean time may be gobbled up for the benefit of "loyalty!" That is what I think it means.

Mr. President, I have spoken as to repudiation because it became my duty to say that it was not done in my State; and it becomes my duty to show that if there is or has been at any time any dishonest counting of votes or any want of freedom at the ballot-box in the South, for that too we are indebted to the republican party. That was a part of our reconstruction; that was a part of our apprenticeship.

Why, Mr. President, one of the fundamental principles of the American constitutions is that all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. When in 1868—I speak now for North Carolina alone, though the same remark would apply to all the other States that were reconstructed—our government was overturned in the State of North Carolina and we were ordered to frame another constitution and inaugurate another government entirely, how was it done? In the first place the whole State was given into the hands of the military commander of the department; all civil jurisdiction was ousted and no authority whatsoever in the shape of civil law could be exercised. An election was ordered to be held, at which election fully thirty thousand of the voters of the State of North Carolina, comprising all that were most experienced in government and in the conduct of public business, to wit, all who had ever held an office before, were disfranchised and not allowed to participate; troops were stationed at various parts of the State and the elections were conducted by men selected by the general in command, and in many cases they were selected for their supposed loyalty to the Government of the United States, and in many cases the men selected to preside over the ballot-boxes and to count the returns of the votes were the candidates for the convention and the Legislature themselves.

One case occurs to me, one which occurred in the county adjoining the one in which I live, in which there were three men selected to preside over the ballot-box. One was a carpet-bagger, who was a candidate for the Legislature, another was a negro that it was said could not read, and the third was a white man chosen for his loyalty, which consisted in getting drunk occasionally. So that when the election was over the ballot-boxes were taken by this candidate to his own home and kept for three days, and the count was sealed up and sent three hundred and fifty miles to the commander of the district in the city of Charleston, and the result of the election in that county was determined by him without publicity. There was not a soul from the State of North Carolina who knew how it was except this candidate himself, and he declared himself elected by nearly three hundred majority, and at the very next election, two years afterward, that county went democratic by a large majority. Was that either a free ballot or a fair count? What were people to learn from such things as that?

I give that only as a sample of the elections both for the convention and for the Legislature, which Legislature, by the by, was the one that made havoc with our State credit, as I have shown. Both were elected in that way, and the result declared by the commander of the district three hundred miles away in a distant city of an adjoining State. Was that a fair ballot? Was that an honest count? And for many years afterward we never had an election in the State of North Carolina that some man purporting to speak the sentiments of the Government and of the republican party of the North did not come down and undertake to bulldoze us. In the first place we were threatened if we did not accept the constitution which was provided for us that our property should be confiscated; and then so late as the election for President in 1872 the Attorney-General of the United States made a speech in the State of North Carolina, in which he threatened the people with reconstruction if they ventured to vote for the democratic candidate. Was that a free ballot? I contend here to-day that North Carolina never was a republican State, although for years she remained under the thrall of the republican party and both her Senators were republicans, because we did not have the machinery for a fair count.

Mr. President, pardon me for referring to my own State, but it is necessary to understand the situation. The constitution which was adopted in 1868 in this manner provided that all men twenty-one years of age, &c., should vote, black and white, for all officers to be elected under it. When the constitution came to be voted for itself, as I said about thirty thousand of the best people of the State were not permitted to vote on its adoption, but they supposed they would be permitted to vote for the officers elected under that constitution, because the constitution itself said they should, but for the sake of convenience the election was held for it and for officers under it at the same time, and yet we were refused permission to vote for either the constitution itself or for the officers elected under it. Was that a free ballot? Was that a fair count?

Now, sir, I say that since the democratic party has had power in the State of North Carolina there has been no complaint of an unfree ballot or an unfair count from any respectable source. There has been local disorder, there have been furious contests over particular offices in particular localities, in which the defeated party charged fraud upon the other, as will happen anywhere and which does happen everywhere in the United States of America; but I say that no systematic dishonesty in the public officials who manage elections in North Carolina since the democrats came into power has been seriously alleged, and such an allegation will not be seriously made.

The honorable Senator from Connecticut who spoke on the day before yesterday [Mr. HAWLEY] announced to us as though it was something new that universal suffrage was the law of the Republic, and was bound to prevail; that those who objected to it would do so in vain, and that we might as well prepare for that result. I attempted to get the floor to put a question to that honorable Senator at that time, but failed; he declined to yield. I wanted to ask him, and I now ask any Senator to say if there is any State in the American Union—no, I will not put it that way—if there is any State in the southern portion of the American Union that has any law that deprives a man of the freedom of the ballot-box, if there is any distinction made in any State in the South between races and colors in regard to the exercise of the suffrage? And I would also like to remind Senators that I know of one instance where suffrage has been denied to the negro and denied to him by law and denied to him by the republican party, and denied to him by a republican Congress, by a bill which was approved by a republican President; and that is in the very city in which we sit. At one time universal suffrage prevailed here in the city of Washington; now it does not. The city swarms with black men now, and not a solitary one of them can vote, although there are as many intelligent and upright and well qualified black men to vote in the city of Washington and in the District of Columbia as there are in any other portion of the Union, and yet they cannot vote. They once had the right to vote, but they cannot vote here now. Who took that right away from them? These same gentlemen who plead to us so eloquently about the determination to make universal suffrage the law of the Republic. Negroes are good enough to rule the people of the South, but they are not good enough to provide for the comfort and the safety and security of the honorable Senators who assemble in this Capitol for the transaction of public business; and I say, sir, they are good enough for the people of the South: I say if they are let alone they would fraternize with the people among whom they were born and raised.

The black people of my State have the same patriotism that we claim to have; they have the same pride in the character and the reputation and the prosperity of the old North State that we claim to have; and when they came before the exodus committee they showed as much determination to maintain the good character and good name of the land of their birth as the white people did, and they would do it now if you would let them alone. We have no objection to universal suffrage; we have no objection to the black people voting; we are willing for them to vote, and we are willing for them to continue to vote just as long as anybody else votes. They are improving daily; they are far more qualified to vote now than they were when you first gave them the suffrage; they are acquiring property and they are acquiring intelligence, and what is more, they are acquiring good feeling for the people of North Carolina; and the worst thing you can do, Senators, for the comfort and for the advancement of the black race, whose destiny you pretend to have so much at heart, is to step between them and their white neighbors of the South again, proclaiming that they are not receiving their rights at the ballot-box or in the courts or elsewhere. It is not true. It is alleged simply for purposes of party aggrandizement.

Mr. President, I have already detained the Senate longer than I intended, longer perhaps than the circumstances justified. I should not have said one word in this debate if the character of my State had not been impugned, if it had not been attempted to justify others by imputing dishonesty to the State which I have the honor to represent here; and having, as far as I think proper, vindicated the State of North Carolina from that aspersion, and given warning to the people of what they may expect from the coalition that has been formed here for an intrusion and assault upon their rights, I shall leave the subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] that the pending resolution be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I do not propose to go into the question of the debt of North Carolina to any great extent, because I confess I am not familiar with it; but understanding that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] proposed to call the attention of the Senate to the condition of the debt of his State, and combat what he averred had been improperly charged to the political party of the State which he represents, namely, that the debt of the State had been repudiated in part or in whole, I occupied myself while the honorable Senator was speaking in examining into the condition of the debt of that State, and the policy pursued in reference thereto by the democratic party of his State. I was very much amused and interested by the speech of the Senator from North Carolina, always, as he is, an attractive, interesting, and eloquent speaker. But, sir, as I perused these documents bearing the stamp of authenticity, I marveled much at some statements that fell from the honorable Senator's lips. Now, if perchance I misstate anything in regard to the debt of his State and the relation of his State or the party that he represents in reference to that debt, he will correct me. I will endeavor not to occupy the attention of the Senate long.

I lay down the proposition that the debt of the State of North Carolina, eliminating the entire carpet-bag debt from beginning to end, exceeded $20,000,000; indeed, with the accrued interest it approximated $26,000,000. A report of a committee on the debt of the State, I think made in 1875, to whom had been referred various propositions on the subject, is as follows:

The committee on the debt of the State, and to whom have been referred various propositions on the subject, have carefully considered the whole matter, and recommend that no action be taken at the present time. It is unnecessary for us to declare our faith in the integrity and honesty of the people of North Carolina. Our State has ever borne an honorable name for her fidelity to her engagements, and we are sure her character in this respect has not degenerated.

Further on:

In the opinion of the committee the State is not now in a position to offer her creditors such a settlement as they would likely accept. At the same time the committee are of opinion that it is very desirable to have the debt settled upon principles of equity and justice.

We therefore recommend that a commission be appointed, to be composed of the governor, treasurer, attorney-general, and two members each from the senate and house of representatives, to consider the whole matter and report to the next meeting of the General Assembly, and we hope some plan of settlement will be reported acceptable to the bondholders and not too burdensome to be willingly sanctioned by the people of North Carolina.

Here was a high-toned declaration in favor of some honorable adjustment of the debt, but subsequently a scheme of compromise, commutation, or settlement, as I see it is generally termed in the State papers of North Carolina, was adopted, a scheme that first originated, I believe, in 1875. I will state the substance of it by reading, as briefly as I may, to show the policy that had been proposed in reference to the settlement of the State debt, which plan was ultimately substantially adopted. The debt consisted at that time of $38,921,848.05.

The act here proposed does not recognize that part of the debt known as construction bonds, amounting to $14,700,000, but rejects it. The bonds composing the rest of the debt are apportioned by the act into three classes, to be funded at the respective rates of forty cents on the dollar for the first class, and of twenty-five cents for the second and third classes; the new debt bearing a gradually increasing rate of interest for a certain time, namely, of 2 per cent. per annum for the first two years, of 3 per cent. for the next three years, of 4 per cent. for the next five years, and of 5 per cent. for the next twenty years. By this process the whole indebtedness of North Carolina would be reduced to $14,500,000.

Information of the features of this bill in its early stages having reached the creditors abroad, a citizen of New York, who holds North Carolina bonds to the amount of $87,000, wrote to Governor Brogden, complaining of the contemplated provisions of the funding act as partial in favor of the State, and unjust to her creditors; and proposing that the rate of funding the principal should be at the least fifty cents on the dollar, and the annual interest 6 per cent.

This referred mainly to the ante bellum debt for which the State of North Carolina, as I understand—and I do not think it will be contradicted—had received dollar for dollar at par or nearly par, that she had hypothecated the money and expended it upon public works and otherwise.

The governor communicated this letter—to the senate of North Carolina on the 8th of March, 1875, when a member of the senate characterized it as an insult, and moved to table it, which was done without further consideration.

From a cititizen of your State, sir—

That disposed for the time being of the letter and of the debt question. It seems, however, by the financial history of the State that notwithstanding the report of the committee whose report I read a few minutes since, a report declaring that the State ought to adjust its debt honorably, and deprecating any non-payment of the debt, principal or interest, another scheme, substantially the one proposed and that failed to be carried out, was proposed. It was an act "to compromise, commute, and settle the State debt." On the bonds issued before the war (except for the North Carolina Railroad) it proposed to pay 40 per cent. of the principal; not on the bonds issued before the war, but the debt originating under the acts passed by democratic legislatures, no carpet-bag government, that is, none before the war, authorizing the governor of the State to sign and issue bonds at the rate of 40 per cent. on the dollar; and for all bonds issued during the war for public improvements and immediately after the war, under acts passed prior to the war, they were to issue bonds for 25 per cent., but for all that portion of the carpet-bag debt which they admitted ought to be paid, which was a small portion of the debt proper, they proposed to pay 15 per cent. That is the nature, as I understand it, of the adjustment proposed by the debt of North Carolina.

At this time the debt of the State was acknowledged to be $16,960,045 principal, and $10,160,182 interest. This was known as the recognized debt, and distinct from the special tax bonds.

Which I believe was generally denominated the carpet-bag portion of the debt. This recognized debt was referred to in the message of the Senator from North Carolina, then governor, to the Legislature in the following language:

It is out of the question for us to attempt to pay it at its face value. Indeed, I do not conceive that there is any moral obligation on us to do so, nor do our creditors expect it of us. Quite one-half of our property upon which our bonds were based was wantonly destroyed by consent of a large majority of those who held them, and no court of conscience upon the earth would permit a creditor to destroy one-half of his security and claim full payment out of the remainder. But we can and should pay something.

And they proposed to pay, as I have said, 40 per cent. of the old debt before the war, and for the post bellum debt they proposed to pay 15 per cent. for that portion under the carpet-bag régime, as they said, and 25 per cent. for what properly belonged to themselves, incurred under acts passed before the war. I believe that is a fair statement, and if I have fallen into any error it is unintentional, and I am sure the Senator from Nortb Carolina will at once correct me—indeed, I ask him to do so now.

Mr. VANCE. If the Senator will permit me, three millions of that debt that the Senator from Louisiana has read about is paid dollar for dollar, because it is a statutory lien on the stock of the State in the North Carolina Railroad, and he ought to take that into account. Four and a half millions is commuted and three millions is paid dollar for dollar, making seven and a half millions; he ought to give credit for that as he goes on.

Mr. KELLOGG. Well, I can afford to do that, I think, and still leave sixteen millions principal and ten millions accrued interest as the recognized indebtedness, the unquestioned debt of the State of North Carolina. There is twenty-six millions, in round numbers, conceding all the Senator claims. If that be so, the proposition embraced in the legislative act "to compromise, commute, and settle"—to use the terms of the title of the act—the debt of North Carolina proposed to reduce it to less than four millions, wiping out twenty-odd millions by this process of scaling or repudiation. I do not desire to deal in harsh names; but they proposed by this readjustment or commutation to strike out twenty-odd millions from twenty-six millions of debt heretofore acknowledged as valid.

Now, Mr. President, if I understood the Senator from North Carolina correctly, he stated in his speech that the Government of the United States in submitting the so-called fourteenth amendment to the people of his State, and, to use his expression, compelling them to adopt it, practically taught them repudiation, and he justifies the subsequent acts of his Legislature and of his State government in repudiating seven-eighths of the honest principal and interest of the debt, that debt which he admits to have been legal and binding and for which the State received one hundred cents on the dollar, only and entirely upon the ground that the Federal Government said that the debts incurred in an endeavor to overthrow the Constitution, disrupt the Union, and trample the flag under foot should not be paid. That is his entire justification as I understand.

Moreover, if I understand the honorable Senator correctly, he justifies the act of his Legislature up to the present moment, and thereby justifies as I think—and I am sure the record bears me out, save in the matter of the Louisiana State debt—the most unjustifiable as it is the most sweeping act of repudiation that disgraces the record or any State of the South. It more than bears out on examination all that the honorable Senator from Ohio said yesterday and all that the honorable Senator from Virginia said some weeks since in his speech regarding the State debt of North Carolina. This is more and worse than I expected the Senator from North Carolina to concede by far.

Now, sir, I ask in conclusion to have read the extract that I have marked from the International Review, Porter's article on southern repudiation.

The Secretary read as follows:

The State of North Carolina was comparatively free from debt until the year 1849. It had, previous to that time, indorsed or assumed the bonds of a few hundred thousand dollars issued by one or two of its first railroads. The General Assembly, at its session of 1848-'49, and 1850-'51, authorized the issue of $490,000 of bonds of the registered class, without coupons, which were the first State bonds issued. At the same session (1848-'49,) the first coupon bonds were authorized, which were for the construction of the North Carolina Railroad from Goldsborough to Charlotte. The first of these bonds bore date January 1, 1853. Under various acts of the Legislature, large sums of money were voted during the next ten years, principally for the aid of railroads; and at the opening of the war the debt of this State amounted to about ten million dollars. The recognized debt, including bonds issued by the funding debt act of March 10, 1866, and August 20, 1868, amounted to $18,167,300. Under acts of the General Assembly, by which various classes of bonds were retired, this debt was largely reduced. The General Assembly of 1879 passed "An act to compromise the amount and settle the State debt." The act provides that the bonds shall be exchanged for the principal of outstanding bonds some at 40 per cent., which are old, or ante-war bonds; some at 25 per cent., which are bonds issued for certain railroads since the war; and some at 15 per cent., which are the bonds issued under what are known as the funding acts of March 10, 1866, and August 20, 1868. Of the $18,167,300 of debt there had been retired, to the date when the compromise act of 1877 was passed, $2,484,255.

* * * * * * *

The bondholders were by no means Shylocks in this case, and they were willing to offer a settlement which would have cost the State of North Carolina about $10,704,691. The State was able to pay the interest on this sum, and is able to do it to-day; and a sinking fund could have been created by which the principal of the debt might have been canceled within a period of thirty years. But unwise legislation preferred repudiation, and so they forcibly scaled down upward of eighteen million dollars bonds which they recognized as valid debt, and refused to recognize upward of twelve million dollars more, which, it must be admitted bore upon its face the taint of corruption. Taxes in North Carolina are to-day very light. To pay the interest on a debt of $10,000,000 and defray the current expenses of the State, on the basis of the last few years, calls for about one million two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. KELLOGG. I notice in a State authority I have before me, a message to the Legislature, these words:

> Very little property is assessed anywhere within the neighborhood of its value.

To that I wish to add that according to the same authority as that which the Secretary has just read the assessed valuation of real and personal property and the rate of taxation were as follows for the years named:

	Valuation.
1877	$146,390,493
1878	142,308,102
1879	157,967,481

Tax, thirty-eight cents on the $100.

This is the tax on all real and personal property. The assessed value, the chronicler says, is 60 per cent. of the true valuation. That bears out the extract from the message of the governor I have just read. Last year the tax was only thirty-three cents on the hundred dollars.

I have just this moment turned, and turned hurriedly to the New York Herald of to-day which has just been laid on my desk. It will be noticed, however, before I pass to that, from what has been read that the rate of taxation in North Carolina is thirty-eight cents on the hundred dollars, or less than one-half of 1 per cent. In many Northern States the rate of taxation is 1½, and 2 per cent. in some cases, in some cases even higher, rates to which the people voluntarily submit rather than repudiate.

Referring to the reports of transactions on the stock exchange in New York yesterday, I find in regard to the bonds of the Southern States that the issues of bonds of North Carolina under the act I have read having received I presume the sanction of the honorable Senator from North Carolina when he was governor, and since issued at the rate of forty cents, twenty-five cents, and fifteen cents on the dollar, so good is the credit of the State even with all that debt thus scaled so low (well known as it is by moneyed men)—some of the bonds of that State quoted on the New York stock exchange were sold yesterday for the enormous sum of nine cents on the dollar. Now will the Senator from North Carolina tell me how this is?

Mr. VANCE. I want to ask my distinguished friend from Louisiana——

Mr. KELLOGG. I am only seeking for information.

Mr. VANCE. The Senator ought not to be talking about what he does not know anything about.

Mr. KELLOGG. I state what the New York Herald reports to-day.

Mr. VANCE. What bonds are those these reports are talking about? Those are the bonds of his friends, the carpet-baggers, who had charge of North Carolina, that we have turned our backs upon.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then these are the bonds of the repudiated portion of the debt. Is that it—the special-tax and other bonds?

Mr. VANCE. The special-tax bonds, the carpet-bag bonds of North Carolina.

Mr. KELLOGG. It seems that yesterday they were all the bonds that were sold in the market—at least all I can now find quoted.

Mr. VANCE. Very likely.

Mr. RANSOM. I have simply to say that I do not know whether any of the four percents of North Carolina were sold in New York yesterday or at any other time; but I know they are in demand now at 84 per cent., and are advancing every day.

Mr. KELLOGG. There were large sales of North Carolina bonds, the honorable Senator will permit me to say, quoted in New York.

Mr. VANCE. Read them if you please. What bonds are they?

Mr. KELLOGG. I find in the New York Herald of to-day:

1,000 N. C. 6's, s. t., 1st c	9¼
2,000 N. C. 6's, s. t., 2d c	9
10,000 N. C. 6's, s. t., 3d c	9⅜
50,000 N. C. 6's, s. t., 3d c	9¼
5,000 N. C. 6's, s. t., 3d c	9¼
4,000 N. C. 6's, s. t., 3d c	9⅜
10,000 N. C. 6's, s. t., 3d c	9
10,000 N. C. 6's, s. t., 3d c	9¼
100,000 N. C. 6's, s. t., 3d c	9⅜
20,000 N. C. funding act, 1866	17
20,000 N. C. funding act, 1866	17½
20,000 N. C. funding act, 1866	18
10,000 N. C. 6's, s. t., 3d c	9

These seem to be all the transactions at the stock exchange yesterday. They seem to command some kind of price; they seem to command some price.

Mr. RANSOM. These bonds which have been alluded to are the bonds which the State of North Carolina has declared she does not justly owe and which the State has put her foot upon and says she will never pay. Those bonds are quoted at seven or eight or nine cents on the dollar in New York; but the bonds to which my colleague alluded, the new bonds which have been issued in payment of the old debt are now selling above eighty-four cents on the dollar and advancing daily.

Mr. KELLOGG. Very well. It seems these bonds have been trampled under foot without any test of their validity in the courts. Now I ask the honorable Senator for information, what is the amount of these bonds on the market to-day? What is the amount of the entire indebtedness as represented by these bonds? I mean on the bonds recognized now by the State as the debt of the State extant.

Mr. VANCE. The debt is not all taken up as provided for. The bonds on the market now are about three million dollars.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then there are $3,000,000 of bonds representing all the indebtedness of the State of North Carolina that is acknowledged and recognized by its State authorities, and upon which I assume they pay interest. These are the bonds which command eighty-odd cents on the dollar, and that $3,000,000, now in all the marts of the world, represents over twenty-six million dollars of debt that the State received par for, and which, up to the passage of the so-called funding or scaling or repudiating act, was recognized as valid and binding.

Mr. RANSOM. Not at all.

Mr. KELLOGG. Here are the authorities:

> The debt of the State was $16,960,045 principal and $10,160,182 interest. This is known as the recognized debt and distinct from the special-tax bonds.

This is in a State paper of 1878, when the honorable Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE,] who addressed the Senate a short time since, was governor of the State; and in his message referring to that he says:

> It is out of the question for us to attempt to pay it at its face value.

And then he proposed some scheme of adjustment. Subsequently the Legislature passed an act that they called adjusting the debt, by which they proposed to pay the ante bellum debt at forty cents on the dollar and the debt issued prior to the war for public improvements at twenty-five cents, and the carpet-bag debt, which they recognized, leaving out the special-tax bonds which they repudiated, at fifteen cents on the dollar, and they issued $3,000,000 to represent all this old debt. Upon that process of scaling those bonds in the New York market command eighty, or eighty-two, or eighty-five cents, and the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] has just said that is the condition of the finances of the State of North Carolina. It has now that debt and that debt only to represent its enormous debt of over $26,000,000, which was admitted to be binding, and it commands but eighty-odd cents on the dollar. Further comment is unnecessary.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, I desire to do something that perhaps ought to have been done in my original remarks, to read a statement made to me by a member of the committee of the Legislature of North Carolina which settled this debt, a gentleman for whose character for integrity and usefulness I vouch. I have here his statement made to me since this controversy began as to what occurred when the proposition was made to settle this debt. As I had the honor of stating yesterday, a delegation of the creditors of North Carolina came to the Legislature to see what could be done. There was a conference, a frank and free conference between that delegation of the bondholders of the State and the legislative committee that had the debt matter in charge, and here is the statement of that honorable member of that committee which I propose to read to the Senate:

> The bondholders were before the committee several times with many statistics from which they argued that we could pay seventy-five cents and forty cents on our indebtedness. I showed them we now collected double the tax that we did before the war, and when we paid interest on only ten millions of debt that this increase in taxation in State, county, and cities on half of the property that we had before the war, was caused by the Canby government forcing us to overturn our judicial system and repudiate all our confederate debts. It was agreed by the bondholders and the committee at the start that we should have a free and frank conference and answer all pertinent questions when the arguments were concluded on both sides. I requested that they inform the committee what they gave for their bonds, and when they purchased them. They answered about 10 per cent. less, as I remember, than we gave them in this bill, and they cheerfully agreed to accept that sum.

Now, I want to know of the Senator from Louisiana if he was indebted, which I hope he is not, and his creditor proposed to take a certain sum, would he feel that he was dishonored by agreeing to give him the sum which he proposed himself to take and which was satisfactory to him? I want to know if he, either as a public or private man, has attained such a height that he insists upon paying the creditor more than the creditor is willing to take?

Mr. PLUMB. Before the Senator from North Carolina sits down I would like to ask a question. I did not quite understand from the statement which he read whether the sum paid by the bondholders for their bonds was the sum that the State of North Carolina received or only the sum which they paid for them in the market at some time after they were issued.

Mr. VANCE. It was the sum which the bondholders paid for them in the market, as I understand.

Mr. PLUMB. And not the sum that the State of North Carolina received?

Mr. VANCE. Not the sum which the State of North Carolina had received.

Mr. PLUMB. The issue, then, I understand to be somewhat in this way: North Carolina received par for her bonds and claimed the right to take them up at less than par because somebody by reason of a purchase in the market had got them for less.

Mr. VANCE. For the first class the State received par. The bonds were nearly all at the time of the settlement in second hands; in other words, they were in the hands of speculators. The credit of the State had been destroyed by the action of the friends of the Senator from Kansas who had control of our government, and the bonds were very low in the market. These bondholders purchased them on speculation in the market and confessed before the committee that the bill which was then before the committee and which subsequently passed gave them 10 per cent. more than they had paid for the bonds in the market and that they were perfectly willing to accept that sum.

Mr. PLUMB. Replying now to that part of the Senator's remarks in which he says that the republican party by their act had destroyed the credit of his State, I beg leave to call his attention to the fact that after the people with whom he acts have wiped out all of the debt but $3,000,000 the bonds are now selling in the market, what is left of them, at about eighty cents on the dollar; and I should like to ask him what particular act he refers to as destroying the credit of North Carolina which was the act of the republican party?

Mr. VANCE. I presume that the Senator from Kansas did not hear my remarks this morning in which I showed that the carpet-bag government which had possession of the State of North Carolina under the reconstruction acts, which was forced upon us by the disfranchisement of our citizens and by military law, was the party that destroyed the credit of the State by issuing $22,000,000 or $23,000,000 in bonds for various purposes and wasting the money and putting everything to ruin.

Mr. HOAR. When that carpet-bag government came into power, before they did anything at that time, say a month before they came into power, what was the old, the then existing debt of the State selling for in the market?

Mr. VANCE. I am unable to answer.

Mr. HOAR. Was it five cents on the dollar?

Mr. VANCE. No, sir.

Mr. HOAR. So, when the Senator's friends got through with it, the carpet-bag government taking possession, the credit of the State was not, according to its experienced governor's opinion, worth five cents on the dollar, and that was destroyed by the carpet-baggers.

Mr. VANCE. That is a suggestion simply out of the head and imagination of the Senator from Massachusetts. I am unable now to say what the bonds were selling for; but up to that time there had been no kind of denial of the debt due by the State of North Carolina; and while we were not able to pay the accumulated interest, it had been funded by the issue of new bonds bearing 6 per cent. I presume they had a greater value in the market than five cents on the dollar; I know they had, but I am not able to give the exact figure now.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator from North Carolina a moment since asked me a distinct question. He asked me, if I understood him aright, whether I would feel dishonored if I were to pay that amount and that only which my creditor was willing to accept. I certainly would. If he had my note, and that note upon its face specified a sum that I declared by the terms of the note to be due him for a consideration received, I should feel bound to pay that sum, and should feel dishonored if I refused to pay it, especially if I had said to him, "Sir, I have put my property in such a condition," or "I have gone out of the jurisdiction of any court to which you can appeal," or "I have put myself in such a position that you cannot collect it, and you shall take that or nothing else; if you do not take such an amount as I choose to give, I shall not pay you anything, either principal or interest." Then if a creditor in that condition, with that kind of option which my colleague [Mr. JONAS] suggested the other day that the creditors of Louisiana had, the option that the traveler has when a highwayman puts a pistol to his head and tells him to stand and deliver—with such an option if my creditor were to say, "Well, sir, I will take twenty cents on the dollar" rather than get nothing, I should consider that he did it as a dernier ressort; that he accepted it because he chose to take what he could; but that in his heart he thought, and thought justly, that I was a repudiator and a dishonest man.

Mr. VANCE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him if he has any proof that the Legislature of North Carolina declared that the creditors should take that or nothing?

Mr. KELLOGG. The proofs are full it seems to me. That was one branch that I proposed to go into; but I did not want to occupy the attention of the Senate so long. If the Senator desires me, I will show what he himself in his message when he was governor said——

Mr. VANCE. Said what?

Mr. KELLOGG. Here it is—that referring to your State debt:

> It is out of the question for us to attempt to pay it at its face value——

Mr. VANCE. Certainly.

Mr. KELLOGG.

> Indeed I do not conceive that there is any moral obligation on us to do so——

Mr. VANCE. Certainly, I did say so.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is in your own message to the Legislature of North Carolina.

Mr. VANCE. At the same time I did not tell those gentlemen in my official recommendation to the Legislature that if they did not take forty cents of the principal they could not get anything. The Senator has either to acknowledge that he is mistaken about that, or he has to prove that I did say so.

Mr. KELLOGG. You say in your message that no court of conscience in the world—to use your expression:

> No court of conscience upon the earth would permit a creditor to destroy one-half of his security and claim full payment out of the remainder. But we can and should pay something.

The words "can" and "should" pay something are italicized. The speech that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] quoted yesterday as having been made by the Senator from North Carolina breathed a more uncompromising spirit, as much as to say, "You, people of the North, and you, people in Amsterdam and London, who own our bonds and have paid dollar for dollar for them, we have taken that money and hypothecated it, put it in our treasury, put it in improvements and to defray the expenses of the State government. Still we do not propose to pay you because there was a rebellion or a war and a portion of our property or our assets has been eliminated; though you hold these bonds abroad and are foreigners, commercial men, dealers in bonds, financiers, investors in New York, tutors, administrators, executors, savings-banks who represent the poorer class of people, though only one in ten thousand of you own our bonds, still since the fourteenth amendment prohibited the payment of any debt incurred to maintain the war and thereby set us an example, we will not pay any of your debts, we will not pay any of our creditors, any of these widows or orphans, and we will go into the marts of the world dishonored as bankrupts and repudiators."

Mr. VANCE. I desire to interrupt the Senator from Louisiana a moment, with his permission.

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. VANCE. The gentleman for proof of the charge that he made, that I said to the creditors if they did not take this they should have nothing, cites the speech that was quoted by the Senator from Massachusetts yesterday, which I made in the valley of Virginia. Does the Senator know that that speech was made eighteen months after the bill was passed and the debt was compromised; and if so, how could it have gone backward and acted retroactively?

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will permit me to remark that he stated in that speech what he said to the creditor. He said, "We fixed this thing up; we said to them, you just credit us with fifty cents in the dollar and we will pay you the balance." That is the Senator's own narrative of what he had said to the creditors of his State.

Mr. VANCE. I think that the Senator from Massachusetts has strangely for a Massachusetts man fallen into some confusion as to tenses. I do not know that I said I told them that; because in point of fact my official utterances show that I did not tell them that. The Senator no doubt has the documents which contain all my official utterances concerning the public debt while governor of the State of North Carolina.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have them.

Mr. VANCE. At no time can the Senator find that I ever did tell them that. I was reciting upon the stump the basis upon which we settled our debt in North Carolina, but that language was never used to the creditors. I never said it was, sir.

Mr. KELLOGG. No, but the honorable Senator, when governor, in treating upon this question of the debt, said to the creditors of the State, "The debt is so much, $26,000,000, more or less, and we do not propose to pay half of it; and there is no court that ought to compel us;" and in a speech that he made after that he simply enunciated what he enunciated in his message prior to the passage of that bill. The language points to it when he said this——

Mr. RANSOM. Will the Senator allow me to say——

Mr. KELLOGG. One moment. Let me finish.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. SAUNDERS in the chair.) The Senator from Louisiana declines to yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. When speaking of the past he said:

> We just said we had lands and negroes; you took the negroes, which were equal to the lands, away. Now you just credit us with fifty cents in the dollar, and we'll pay you the balance. We settled it, and didn't have anything to do with a presidential election either.

Sir, to whom was he saying this? He was saying it to the creditors, was he not? He was saying it to the world. It was a public utterance which was going forth to the four corners of the land; and indeed he said yesterday, if I recollect aright, that this speech was published broadcast throughout the country. He was speaking of the politics of Virginia, but treating of the question of the debt of his State and the manner in which that debt had been dealt with by the people of his State.

One word more. What does the honorable Senator say in view of these utterances of his and as to what the Legislature of his State did do? The Legislature for years failed to levy any tax whatever to pay the interest. They appealed to the creditors and said, as the honorable Senator himself did in his message which I have read, "We are not able to pay; at least if we have the ability we have not the inclination to pay this debt. We do not intend to pay it; we never intend to pay you more than fifty cents on the dollar; and in the mean time we will not levy any tax whatever or provide any manner or way by which you can receive one single penny of interest." You not only said you would not pay half of the principal, but you said until your creditors came forward and settled upon the terms proposed by the Legislature you would pay no portion of the debt, and thereby compelled your creditors, in order to get a moiety of their principal and even a reduced rate of interest, to accept your repudiating or scaling proposition. Do you not call that dishonoring the credit of the State?

Mr. VANCE. Will the honorable Senator be kind enough to state wherein I ever said officially to the Legislature of North Carolina that I would not pay any portion of the debt unless upon such terms as I proposed?

Mr. KELLOGG. We will settle this very quickly. I ask the honorable Senator if the Legislature of his State in passing the usual annual appropriation bill appropriated or made any provision whatever for the payment of any interest upon any portion of that debt?

Mr. VANCE. Certainly not.

Mr. KELLOGG. Very well.

Mr. VANCE. But still that does not answer my question. The Senator has undertaken to say that I said to the creditor, like a man on the highway with a pistol at his head, "you shall take this or nothing." I say it is not true, sir, and though the Senator dodges well and adroitly I call upon him to show officially that that was what I said to the creditors of North Carolina.

Mr. KELLOGG. From the time the war closed until the republican governor went out and a democratic governor was reinstated in his place, as I understand—the Senator will correct me if I misstate it—an annual appropriation was made for the payment of the interest, though it was not collected; and when the Senator's party went into power they failed to make any appropriation thenceforth for any part of the interest on any of the debt good, bad, or indifferent, and while with one hand he refused to pay one cent of the interest, with the other he said to the creditors, "We do not intend to pay half of your principal." Then they passed an act through their Legislature, approved by him if I mistake not—the Senator will correct me if I am in error—saying to the creditors, "For that debt, for those bonds that you hold representing the debt that originated before the war, for which we received par, we will pay only forty or fifty cents or less on the dollar, and we will issue to represent that forty cents or less bonds on which we will pay 4 per cent. interest," and to those who hold the bonds that represented the debt of the State issued under laws passed prior to the war and during the war, for which the State received money at par or approximating par, they said, "We will pay you twenty-five cents; and to you, gentlemen in the North or abroad, who hold that portion of the bonds of the carpet-bag or republican government that we are willing to take into account, we will pay you fifteen cents on the dollar;" and then they provided that no other bonds should be issued but those. When they said to the creditor, "We will not pay interest, we will not pay you more than forty cents or twenty-five cents or fifteen cents, as the case may be," and there is the law spread upon the statute-book, interdicting the payment of anything else except upon those terms. If that is not pretty nearly, figuratively speaking, putting a pistol at the head of a creditor and compelling him to accept that proposition or nothing, then I do not know what is.

Mr. VANCE. I want once more to remark that I have never known in the time of my brief career a Senator or anybody else who could make as many mistakes in as short a time as the Senator from Louisiana. He speaks of an act that I approved when governor of the State.

Mr. KELLOGG. I said the Senator would correct me if I made a mistake.

Mr. VANCE. Of course if I undertook that job I should have a contract.

Mr. KELLOGG. It is a very simple matter, a matter of proof.

Mr. VANCE. If I should undertake to correct all the gentleman's mistakes I should have to send for some provisions and be kept here for the next two weeks. In the first place, the governor does not approve bills.

Mr. KELLOGG. They become laws without his approval, then; that is all.

Mr. VANCE. I was here in the Senate looking into the face of the Senator from Louisiana when that bill was passed.

Mr. KELLOGG. Very well.

Mr. VANCE. There is about as much correctness in all the rest of his statements in relation to the public debt of North Carolina as there was as to the circumstances under which the bill was passed. The whole truth is that the State of North Carolina never repudiated any of her debt; she never turned her back upon any of her debt. She funded the interest by the issue of new bonds when she could not pay the interest. The power was taken away from her people by the Legislature elected under the reconstruction acts to which I have so often adverted; and when we finally got the power we settled the debt by the act which has been so often read here, and settled it with the full and free consent of the creditors of the State. When the honorable Senator asks us to believe that he would consider that dishonorable and would insist on paying more than the creditors asked, I am compelled to say as was said by Him of old, "I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel."

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I do not pretend to assert that the Senator is not correct. Indeed, I assume that he did not approve the act as governor. Sir, I said that act was passed by the Legislature of North Carolina. That is not denied. I stated the terms of the act, and that is not denied. I have not the dates before me; I have given this subject but a cursory examination. It was only since the honorable Senator took the floor this morning that I sent for these documents. I knew nothing about the debt of the State until then. I did state I thought the honorable Senator approved the act, and that he would correct me if I was in error. He said nothing; but he now corrects me, and says that he did not approve the bill. What of that? It was a law. The Senator says that it is not necessary for the governor of North Carolina to approve a bill. I did not know that; I have not examined their constitution; but what I asserted was that such a law was passed, and that it conformed to the expressed views of the Senator when governor and in his public speeches. I read from his message addressed to the Legislature when he was governor uttering the sentiments embodied in that act. I did assert, what I reiterate, and the honorable Senator will correct me if I am in error, that no appropriation was ever made by his Legislature for the payment of any of the interest upon the bonds that they themselves acknowledged and recognized as part of their valid debt; and they pleaded their inability to pay it in full and provided to pay it by the scaling process, as I have already stated; and this was done, as the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] suggests, when their rate of taxation was really lower than the rate paid by many of the Northern States. If I have committed any error of fact and have not stated the record correctly I shall be very glad at any time to be corrected. The Senator approved the act, as I am reminded by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. BLAIR,] in one way. His party Legislature passed the act, and as it was in conformity with the suggestions or sentiments declared in his message I suppose it may be said that he approved the doctrine of refunding or scaling, by whatever term it may be called, that his party resorted to.

I see that North Carolina under the funding act of 1866 has bonds upon the market, and a large number of those bonds were sold yesterday. I ask the Senator from North Carolina for information, for I confess I do not know myself—I have not investigated the matter—what was the funding act of 1866?

Mr. VANCE. If the Senator wants an answer, I have stated in my opening speech this morning——

Mr. KELLOGG. I did not hear all of the Senator's speech.

Mr. VANCE. That the funding act of 1866 was to fund the maturing interest that we were not able to pay, by the issue of new bonds at 6 per cent.

Mr. KELLOGG. I see that there was $6,000 in one block of those bonds sold yesterday, and they rate from seventeen to seventeen and one-half cents on the dollar. Those are bonds issued under the funding act of 1866.

Mr. VANCE. Those are bonds not yet funded under this new act. Those are bonds which the creditors have not brought in; they are outstanding.

Mr. KELLOGG. They were funded once.

Mr. RANSOM. Dollar for dollar.

Mr. KELLOGG. Dollar for dollar; but what they represent is the interest that accrued on the debt prior to the date of the funding act, namely, in 1866. Then the bonds that were sold yesterday at seventeen cents on the dollar are issued under the authority of the Legislature of the State, as I assume, representing indebtedness in the nature of accrued interest on old bonds issued before the war. There is a little more of the pistol practice. Then they give a bond worth seventeen cents to-day or yesterday representing the interest that had accrued on the debt prior to the war, and that is all they give.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President, I do not propose this morning to enter into any discussion of this question, for reasons that are very satisfactory to me; but if I can have the attention of the Senate for a moment, I will satisfy the country, I will satisfy the Senate, I will satisfy every person who can feel an interest in this question, that the statements which have been made here this morning in reference to the bonds of North Carolina and in reference to her credit should have no weight anywhere.

Words in reference to money matters, as we all know, are worth but little. Of all subjects in the world rhetoric is perhaps most worthless when applied to financial questions. When we treat of questions of money men who deal in that subject wish facts, and nothing but facts will satisfy their minds.

Let me put under foot at once the assertion that the credit of North Carolina is not good and ought not to be good. The statement has been made here upon the casual and, as it is called, the cursory reading of the small print in a newspaper, that although North Carolina had but $3,000,000 of her new consolidated bonds on the market those bonds were now discredited and brought but eighty-five cents on the dollar. I see before me, and I am very happy to see him in his seat, the late Secretary of the Treasury, the distinguished Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] I ask him here, and I ask him in confidence, if eighty-five cents is not a high price for 4 per cent. State bonds? The Senator will pardon me for appealing to him, for he is the best authority I see here; I have not time to send for books; and I ask him if eighty-five cents on the dollar for 4 per cent. State bonds is not a high price, is not a good price?

Mr. SHERMAN. I should say that upon the general run of the market for State bonds that would be about a fair price for a 4 per cent. bond.

Mr. RANSOM. I thank the Senator from Ohio; it was what I knew I had a right to expect from his candor and intelligence. Though it has been held up before the country to-day that North Carolina credit is below par, I establish the fact by the highest authority known in this country that the bonds of her new consolidated loan are selling to-day at eighty-five cents on the dollar. The inquiry was made with an air of triumph to know what would be thought of the credit of a State when her bonds with $3,000,000 in the market were only bringing eighty-five cents. The Senator from Ohio, the best authority in this country on that question, says that is a fair price for such a bond. The same ratio applied to a 6 per cent. bond would make it above par. If these had been 6 per cent. bonds selling below par, the allegation which was made on this floor to-day might have some justice in it.

When North Carolina four percents, under her new loan, bring on Wall street, New York, the highest price that any 4 per cent. bond brings, or as high a price, as the Senator from Ohio says, as such bonds usually bring, it will not do to say that her name is discredited. Wise men, wealthy men, the money brokers of New York, will not pay a high price for a dishonored bond, and when I show you that they pay eighty-five cents on the dollar for North Carolina 4 per cent. bonds of the new loan, I show that by the judgment, by the authority, by the money of the capitalists of this country, the credit of that State is fair and good. I stand upon that fact, upon that authority; and with that I hurl back and kick and spit upon every word that is said against the fair name of my State.

I have said that I do not mean to go into this discussion to-day, and I shall not trust myself to go into it.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not propose to let the Senator from North Carolina escape in that manner. The Senator from North Carolina now is diverting the question. I appeal to the Senate; it was a mere incident in the course of the discussion in regard to the status of the State of North Carolina touching the debt of that State, in which incidentally as a side issue, allusion having been made to the quotations in the New York market of the bonds of his State, the question came up what they rated at. Some I showed, issued under the funding act of 1866, rated at seventeen or eighteen cents on the dollar, and the old bonds not funded at nine cents on the dollar.

Mr. RANSOM. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. RANSOM. I did not think it necessary to state before, but I will state now what I did not care to mention before. Although the Senator quoted the special tax bonds and the consolidated bonds of 1868, if he had looked a little more carefully into this paper which he had read casually and cursorily he would have seen that North Carolina fours consolidated sold at eighty-five cents. There it is, [indicating.]

Mr. KELLOGG. I have not pretended to controvert it; I have not said anything about it.

Mr. RANSOM. Here is the statement.

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly. I turned to the honorable Senator and I asked him how it was, and he said those were the old bonds. "Very well," said I; "I see they are quoted here." Now he finds a paper containing a quotation in New York of the 4 per cent. bonds at 85 per cent., and he tells me with some degree of triumph, unnecessarily, I think, that if I had looked further I should have discovered what he intimates was an error on my part. That is a side issue. He appeals to the ex-Secretary of the Treasury to know if that is not a fair price for a Southern State bond. I think the Secretary of the Treasury has stated correctly that it is on a State bond; but the honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. PLATT,] who is conversant with those matters, will tell you that there is scarcely a school-district bond or a bond issued by any incorporated city in the great State of New York drawing 4 per cent. but that is above par. He will tell you that the bonds of corporations in the great city of New York, that the bonds of counties and the bonds of his State and of other States rate at above par when drawing only 4 per cent. interest, which goes to show that the canker of repudiation, if it has existed, does affect the credit of a State. The question at issue is not the question what the rate of a 4 per cent. bond is, whether the bonds of the State of North Carolina, compressed and ginned down from $26,000,000, admitted to be the legitimate debt for which the State received par, to $3,000,000, and ginned down and by a double-twisted hydraulic pressure put into $3,000,000, drawing 4 per cent., with all the resources of the State quadrupled giving pledges to pay that interest, rate at eighty-five cents in New York. That does not seem to be a very high rate for $3,000,000 out of $26,000,000, to say nothing of the $15,500,000 that they repudiated aside from that; for the debt was over forty-one million dollars, principal and interest, when they started, and there are but $3,000,000 now to show for it. That is the vital point; that is the question in controversy. It is "a new way of paying old debts," and it is to that I was addressing myself.

The question broadly before the Senate is not the particular side issue of whether the bonds rate at eighty-five cents, or whether the honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] approved that law, or whether it is necessary that any law shall be approved by the governor of North Carolina; but the Senator from North Carolina comes into the Senate this morning and in answer to a statement made by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] some days ago and yesterday by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] undertakes to arraign their statements, and to say that the reputation of his State regarding the finances of the State, regarding the debt of the State, is not questionable; that if it is not above reproach, he can at least justify it. I undertake to say that upon the showing he has made, in the face of the record, he cannot justify that act of open and patent repudiation of seven-eighths of the debt. He cannot do that.

Mr. SHERMAN. Having answered the question of the honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] according to my judgment correctly, I desire to state that, as I understand, the debt of North Carolina was scaled down in this way: All the ante-war debt, the old debt of the State, was paid at the rate of forty cents on the dollar. The debt that was issued after the war was paid at the rate of twenty-five cents on the dollar without interest—a debt that was acknowledged to be a valid debt. The $12,000,000 of debt referred to by the Senator from North Carolina farthest from me, [Mr. VANCE,] which was issued to railroad companies, was repudiated entirely. That I understand is the actual fact in regard to the North Carolina debt. I do not care to enter into a discussion about it, because I have not the figures before me, but I presume she reduced it from some twenty-six million dollars, acknowledged to be due, to about three million dollars, or thereabout.

Mr. RANSOM. I did not intend to have another word to say, but I know the Senator from Ohio desires to reach the truth in this matter. The conclusion to which he comes would do our State injustice, and would do violence to the facts. He has substantially stated the facts in relation to the condition of the North Carolina debt correctly, but a part of that debt, the ante-war debt, as he designates it, did not enter into this settlement. Why? That debt constituted what are known as the North Carolina Railroad construction bonds; and there is what my colleague calls a statutory lien upon the stock of the road for the payment of the interest on those bonds, and the holders of those bonds are now receiving 6 per cent., paid semi-annually, upon them.

Mr. SHERMAN. From the railroads?

Mr. RANSOM. Yes, sir; from the railroads; the State's interest which it held in the railroads. The stock of the railroads was bound to the State for these bonds, and the State binds that stock for the payment of them. So there is in the neighborhood of $3,000,000 to be added to the $3,000,000 of which the Senator speaks.

Then, if I may further instruct the Senator from Ohio, (I use that word with very great respect,) even before that time, under a statute to which my colleague did not allude to-day, North Carolina immediately after the war tried to settle a great part of her debt, and did settle a large part of it in this way: to every creditor that she had, owning stock in all the railroads and canals in the State which she had borrowed money to construct, she made a proposition to come in and take that stock for her bonds issued upon those works, at par. A large amount, I do not know what amount, though, of the North Carolina debt was settled in that way.

I desire furthermore to say—and I thank the Senator from Ohio for giving me the opportunity of saying it—that I am informed by gentlemen who were on the committee of the North Carolina Legislature who settled this debt, and I have been informed by a large number of Senators upon this floor who are interested in the debt, that the settlement was satisfactory to the creditors of North Carolina. Hours, days, nights were consumed at Raleigh in the arrangement of that debt.

Let me say, Mr. President, to the credit of our State that when the bill settling the North Carolina debt was passed it was voted for irrespective of party. I have the vote here, if any gentleman desires to see it. The act was voted for by both parties; it was approved by all the people of our State; it was approved by the creditors, I believe universally; it has been accepted; and every bond that can be heard of has been brought in and funded under that settlement. As an evidence that that settlement was honorable, as an evidence that it was equitable, as proof conclusive that it was fair, I hold up to the country here to-day the fact that on Wall street yesterday North Carolina four percents brought eighty-five cents on the dollar.

Mr. ROLLINS. And six percents sold for seventeen cents on the dollar.

Mr. RANSOM. Those are the bonds that are still to be funded. What does the flippant statement of an uninformed Senator amount to against the judgment of the men who put their money in these North Carolina bonds? It has been eloquently said on this floor that one of the great misfortunes, or perhaps one of the good fortunes, of dishonored credit is that the person who dishonored his credit could make no further debt, and that has been held up in financial works against a glorious State in this Union; but here North Carolina can make a new debt and her bonds sell to-day at eighty-five cents on the dollar—a fair price, a good price, a high price for four percents.

Mr. ROLLINS. I merely wish to suggest in reply to the honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] that it seems to me the price which is paid in the New York market to-day, about seventeen cents on the dollar, for six percents authorized by the act of 1866 is a fairer indication of the credit of North Carolina than the price of a bond which actually costs, owing to the repudiation or scaling-down process, perhaps 250 and which brings 82 or 85.

One word more, Mr. President, while I am upon my feet. There has been some allusion made to a carpet-bag governor from New Hampshire. I want to ask the Senator from North Carolina how long it takes to make a northern man a citizen of North Carolina? How many years has a man got to live there before he is recognized as anything but a carpet-bagger?

Mr. VANCE. If the Senator will allow me I will answer him.

Mr. ROLLINS. I should like to know, and the people of this country would like to know, how long it is necessary for a man from a Northern State to live in a Southern State before he will be recognized as anything but a carpet-bagger?

Mr. VANCE. If he brings a trunk about twenty-four hours will do. If he brings a carpet-bag and hunts around in the purlieus of a city for some colored man to begin to operate with for an election it takes a longer time. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROLLINS. The gentleman to whom the Senator from North Carolina alluded did carry his trunk to North Carolina many years ago, and he carried with him not only his own money, but the money of many other people of New Hampshire. He has planted it upon the soil of North Carolina, and now here, at this late day, fifteen years after, you are talking about the carpet-baggers of New Hampshire who had gone down and settled upon your soil. What we want to know in the Northern States is how long have we got to live there before you will recognize us as citizens of your State? I have put some money into the Southern States; I have been down there and spent some money in Florida, for instance. I hope they will not call me a carpet-bagger if by and by I go down there and live for fifteen years. I hope by that time at least they will be willing to recognize me as a citizen of that State.

Mr. VANCE. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ROLLINS. Certainly.

Mr. VANCE. He alluded to some citizen of his State who went to North Carolina, and planted his money on the soil, and so forth. I do not know who it was. I should like to ask the Senator who it was.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Senator alluded to a New Hampshire governor of North Carolina.

Mr. VANCE. Oh, no, I did not; I beg pardon.

Mr. ROLLINS. A New Hampshire carpet-bagger.

Mr. VANCE. No; I said that the State of New Hampshire loaned the governor of the State of North Carolina money to arm a motley crowd to make war upon the liberties of our people. That is what I said.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Senator from North Carolina alluded to carpet-baggers; I did not catch the whole of his remark. I supposed he alluded to one of our citizens who had gone down there. I may be mistaken in that respect, but I am not mistaken as to the real facts in the case. I am not mistaken as to the general idea that is entertained in the Southern States with reference to carpet-baggers. I know what I state to be true.

Mr. President, I did not purpose at this time, and I do not now, to detain the Senate with a discussion of this question; but there is one other feature to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate and the country. While gentlemen upon the other side, the Senators from North Carolina, for instance, are so shocked at the idea that we upon this side of the Chamber should dare under any circumstances to give a vote for a readjuster of Virginia, they have supported upon that side for any and every office of the Government, no matter how large or how small, the strongest and the boldest repudiators in the land, and not even my friend from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] is shocked. That is what I have to say. You gentlemen are disturbed in your nightly dreams, you are horrified because we upon this side, forsooth, determine to vote for a readjuster of Virginia, who purposes to readjust in some way the debt of that great State, when we find he is with us upon all important questions, when we find that he is with us upon the question of a free ballot and an honest count, and we see fit to support him, you are shocked; but you are not disturbed by repudiation in Louisiana, you are not disturbed by repudiation in North Carolina, you are not disturbed by the repudiation of your friends all through the South, you are not disturbed by the repudiation which has taken place in this country in democratic States, and in democratic States alone. You are only disturbed when we under some circumstances dare to vote or indicate a purpose to vote for Riddleberger, of Virginia.

Mr. VANCE. Will the Senator yield to me one moment for a question?

Mr. ROLLINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. VANCE. When the Senator states that Mr. Riddleberger is with him in favor of a free ballot and an honest count, I should like to ask him what is the difference between counting a man out of the votes he has got and counting him out of the money that is due him? [Laughter.]

Mr. ROLLINS. You have tried both; you ought to be able to answer that question yourself. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President——

Mr. ROLLINS. I want to say a word myself.

Mr. VANCE. The Senator does not answer my question.

Mr. ROLLINS. I say to the Senator from North Carolina that you have tried both experiments in your State and ought to know.

Mr. VANCE. I say to the Senator from New Hampshire that I have not tried either.

Mr. ROLLINS. You have denied the right to cast a free vote——

Mr. VANCE. I have not tried either.

Mr. ROLLINS. You have repudiated your debt.

Mr. VANCE. And the Senator knows I have not tried either.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor.

Mr. VANCE. The Senator cannot substantiate that charge by dodging it in that way. I have not tried either. My State has not tried either.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. VANCE. The assertion was witty, but it lacked truth.

Mr. DAWES. You counted out fifty cents on the dollar on all your debt.

Mr. VANCE. The Senator knows very well what that assertion is based upon. He knows very well that the Government of the United States deprived us in North Carolina of half of our property.

Mr. DAWES. Yes, but——

Mr. ROLLINS. I have the floor.

Mr. VANCE. We were willing to submit and anxious——

Mr. ROLLINS. I think I am entitled to the floor, and I guess I will keep it.

Mr. DAWES. I do know that the Government of the United States deprived the Senator from North Carolina and his coadjutors of the power of making slaves work for them for nothing; and he deliberately avows that for that offense of the United States against the power to enslave men he will pay but fifty cents and forty cents on the dollar of his honest debts.

Mr. ROLLINS. Mr. President——

Mr. VANCE. I hope the honorable Senator from New Hampshire will not farm out the floor to his friends to strike at me and not allow me the privilege of striking back.

Mr. ROLLINS. But I have the floor.

Mr. VANCE. I want to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a simple question, if the honorable Senator from New Hampshire will be kind enough to yield.

Mr. ROLLINS. I may say——

Mr. VANCE. Just one question, and then I will leave off; I will sign a bond to quit.

Mr. ROLLINS. Will you pay forty cents on the dollar? [Laughter.]

Mr. VANCE. I will pay a hundred. [Laughter.] I want to ask the honorable Senator from Massachusetts if his ancestors did not bring those slaves over here to this country in ships provided by the people of Massachusetts and sell them to the people of the South?

Mr. DAWES. Is that any reason why you should cheat your honest creditors? [Laughter.]

Mr. ROLLINS. There is one——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ROLLINS. No; I will not yield at this moment; by and by I will give way.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. You alluded to Florida.

Mr. ROLLINS. I will hear you by and by, after I get on a little further.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Let me ask one question.

Mr. ROLLINS. I cannot yield now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor and declines to yield.

Mr. ROLLINS. Before I leave the subject I want to say one other thing, and that is, that the gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber, unless they have been most wickedly misrepresented, would have been quite willing to have received the vote of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE,] and to have made any arrangement with him that would have inured to their benefit and given them the control of the Senate.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. But we would not have bought it.

Mr. ROLLINS. You wanted to make arrangements, but you could not do it. You made your offers, but they were spurned. It would have been all right if you had received the vote of the Senator from Virginia; it would have been all proper for you to have done it, but it is all wrong for us, in your estimation. A great difference it makes whose bull it is that gores the ox. It is all right if you could have had the vote of the Senator from Virginia, although he was elected in spite of you, in spite of your democratic organization in Virginia, in spite of all the combined efforts of the great democratic party. He was elected a Senator upon this floor, and because he dares to stand up here and vote in accordance with his convictions he is denounced; ostracism is threatened, as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] told us in the campaign last fall that ostracism and contempt had been heaped upon Longstreet, over and over again. It is all right when you can receive the benefit, but all wrong for us. Now I will listen to what the Senator from Florida has to say.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I wish to ask a question of the Senator from New Hampshire, and he knows very well there is no malice in it, because he alluded to the fact that he made an investment in my State, which I sincerely hope will prove to be profitable, for I know he will manage it well. I desire to know whether that investment was made at a time when the State was under the control of the democrats or whether it was made under republican control?

Mr. ROLLINS. It has been made under both. I do not think it has improved under democratic administration. I hope it will pan out well in the end, for I have great faith in the State of Florida, and particularly in that portion of it where I happened to invest. There are many very respectable people there; and I hope that by and by, if I and other citizens of the North wish to go down there to live, we will not have to stay there fifteen or twenty years before the people of Florida will recognize us as something else besides carpet-baggers. That is the point I have to make. If my friend from Florida, whom I esteem so much, should have his way, I think it would not require a residence of fifteen years in that State to make a citizen of a man, even though he be a Yankee. That is all I have to say on this point.

Mr. RANSOM. Only one word in reply to my kind friend from New Hampshire, if he will pardon me. I do not know what he has done with himself, but he has satisfied me that he is not serious in the charges that he is making against the Southern States. I have never had the great pleasure of being in New Hampshire——

Mr. ROLLINS. You ought to go there.

Mr. RANSOM. I anticipate such a visit with a great deal of joy, for I have great respect for that people; I have great respect for their intelligence. I do not believe the Senator from New Hampshire had real faith in the statements which he has made here about repudiation in the South, or he never would have carried his money to one of those States.

Mr. ROLLINS. I put some of it there before they began the work of repudiation.

Mr. RANSOM. Since, too.

Mr. ROLLINS. Yes, I did; but I had to stay with my money. [Laughter.] The gentleman will understand me——

Mr. RANSOM. I thought you would stay with it.

Mr. ROLLINS. Certainly. I have no unkind feelings toward the South. I would vote for a measure that would benefit the State of North Carolina or South Carolina or Georgia or Florida just as quickly as I would vote for a measure that would benefit my own State of New Hampshire. All we ask of you, gentlemen, is fair play; all we ask of you is honest and square treatment of our citizens when they go there; all we ask of you is that you shall give us in those States a free and fair ballot, for we are just as much interested in that as you are yourselves. We do not want you to send men to the other branch of Congress by means of fraud, intimidation, and tissue ballots, as many have been sent there within the last six or eight years, but we want men sent there by a free and fair election, who represent the honest voters of those States. That is what we ask at your hands. Give us that, and we will show you that we at the North are not to be outdone in generosity or magnanimity.

Mr. DAWES. Now I hope we shall have a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to indefinitely postpone the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] who is now absent. I should vote "yea" if he were here.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. GROVER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

Mr. LOGAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired for the day with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE.]

Mr. SEWELL, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. MCPHERSON.]

Mr. WALKER, (when his name was called.) My colleague [Mr. GARLAND] is paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] I am paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. HILL.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, (after having voted in the negative.) I withdraw my vote. I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. FAIR.]

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Bayard,	Farley,	Johnston,	Ransom,
Brown,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Call,	Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Camden,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Vance,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Morgan,	Vest.
Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	Pendleton,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jackson,	Pugh,

NAYS—27.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Kellogg,	Platt of Conn.,
Anthony,	Ferry,	McDill,	Platt of New York,
Blair,	Frye,	McMillan,	Plumb,
Burnside,	Harrison,	Mahone,	Rollins,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Miller,	Sawyer,
Conger,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Sherman.
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Morrill,

ABSENT—23.

Beck,	Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Teller,
Butler,	Garland,	Logan,	Van Wyck,
Cameron of Pa.,	George,	McPherson,	Voorhees,
Conkling,	Grover,	Maxey,	Walker,
Davis of Illinois,	Hale,	Saunders,	Williams.
Edmunds,	Hill of Colorado,	Sewell,

So the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

Mr. DAWES. Nothing is in the way of taking a vote upon the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has the floor.

Mr. DAWES. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not observe that he rose.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Florida yields to me for a few moments. I think the criticism by New England of other portions of this country deserves some little attention at least. I have been surprised frequently not only to-day but heretofore at the moral and political superiority that the people of New England assume over the people of other sections of the country. I have no doubt there are very many fine people in the New England States; I have no doubt there are many good people, honest people, upright people in all the walks of life, but when New England Senators on this floor assume the prerogative over other people in reference to morality and politics, they ought, in my opinion, to begin to look a little at their own records.

As I came to the Senate this morning I happened to buy a book written by one of New England's own distinguished poets, Whittier, entitled "The King's Missive," and on the very opening pages the poet narrates in poetry the early traditions of the people of Massachusetts, and he tells how they persecuted the poor Quakers in those early times. From that day to this there has been a persecuting spirit manifested by some of the people of New England toward their brethren in other parts of the country, and we have had an exemplification of it to-day in the criticisms of the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from New Hampshire in reference to the people of the Southern States. I presume they could find, if they were disposed to look around their own door-sills, objects there that ought to engage their attention, but their benevolence and charity are of that expansive kind which looks away from home to ascertain what they can do for people in remote sections of the country.

I read not very long since that there had been in the New England States within the last year six hundred divorces granted, and two hundred of the number were granted in the State of Massachusetts. I really think that before the Senators from Massachusetts take hold of the doctrine of readjusting a State debt they had better go to work to readjust the marriage relations in their own State. I do not find any fault with the people of New England; they are like other people.

Mr. HOAR. I want to ask my friend from Delaware if the fear of divorce gives him any personal alarm? [Laughter.]

Mr. SAULSBURY. If I lived in New England I conscientiously believe that I should be afraid to enter into the marriage relation for fear of the contamination from that source. [Laughter.] But we frequently hear these gentlemen lecturing southern people, and to-day they are arraigning the noble State of North Carolina for the repudiation, as they allege, of her debt. If they turned their attention to their own factory hands and tried to improve the condition of that class of their people—a class which is held in as abject slavery to-day as the negroes of the Southern States were ever held, I think it would be much more creditable to those Senators than to expend all their charity and all their benevolence in reference to another class of people in a different section of the country.

Yes, sir, in New England to-day—I assert it in the presence of her Senators—men who are doomed to poverty, honest men toil in her factories with no hope of advancement, and delicate females who, if they had the opportunity, would shine in the best circles of society, are doomed to the labor of her factories; and why do you not expend your benevolent humanity in trying to elevate the condition of that class of people? Why should you be always taking charge of the freedmen of the South? Turn your attention to the people of your own States and you will get the credit at least for something of honesty in your pretensions of philanthropy for the colored people.

We hear these lectures on all occasions. One of the Senators from Massachusetts yesterday repeated for the second time a favorite text of Scripture, which he is apt to quote and seek to give an application of to this side of the Chamber. More than once he has said, "Beware ye of the leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy." Well, sir, if I were a preacher and were going to give an exegesis of that passage, I should first inquire who is the Pharisee. I should inquire whether that man who was constantly preaching fidelity to public trusts, honest payment of debts and in the practical illustration of his political life was making affiliations to encourage repudiation in the Southern States, was in fact, or not, the Pharisee. If so I would say, beware of the Pharisee; "beware ye of the leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy;" and when I hear men here crying out for "a free ballot and a fair count," and who yet when the opportunity arose that they could disfranchise the people of the Southern States when they sat upon the electoral commission and examined into the work of returning boards, cast out 10,000 votes of the white people of Louisiana and failed to look behind the returns, I think it proper to quote the passage of Scripture and say, beware of the leaven of the Pharisees, for the Senator from Massachusetts says it is hypocrisy.

It is time that we were plain on these things. If gentlemen will turn their attention first to their own section of country and strive to improve the moral and political condition of that people, if, for instance, the Senator from Massachusetts will take out of his constitution that provision which disfranchises a large number of poor men in his State before he comes here and preaches "a free ballot and a fair count," it would come with something more of grace from his lips than it does at present. There stands a provision in the constitution of Massachusetts requiring that a man shall read the constitution of the State and write his name before he is permitted to vote, and write it in the English language, too, when many of the citizens of that State are not educated in the English language. What is the consequence? You make poverty a disfranchising cause, a crime, and incorporate it in your State constitution, and yet you come here and cry out for "a free ballot and a fair count." Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees, says the Senator from Massachusetts, for it is hypocrisy.

Mr. President, I have got tired of all these lectures and fault-findings with the people of the other States; and if this thing goes on we will drive it home, and we will read the history of the different States of this Union. I am perfectly willing that we shall commence anywhere, with my own State or any other State. Let us compare records. We have probably in all the States something with which we can find fault; as much fault can be found with Massachusetts as with other States; and before those Senators come here to lecture the people of other sections of the Union let them go home and put their own houses in order; especially let them inculcate upon the people of Massachusetts that when they enter into the marriage relation it ought to be a sacred tie, binding a husband indissolubly to his wife. Let them at least shut up their courts against the continual applications for divorces, which are likely to become contagious still more than they are, and I hope it will not interfere with the marriage relations of any Senator on that side of the Chamber.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator should bear in mind that in New England an existing cause of divorce is taken notice of. I imagine that the difference may be that there some notice is taken of it, while in other States it may be passed over without observation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, that the resolution be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] yesterday made the following remarks:

> Indeed we know very well that any act whatever of independence on the part of a democrat in the Southern States is punished with a severity that we in the North know nothing about. When a democrat in the South rebels against the intolerant arrogance of that old Bourbon democracy we know what his fate is.

Again, the honorable Senator used the following language:

> I admire the courage of any man who dares express his opinion openly and freely and follow the dictates of his conscience, and you will not find our northern republicans shrinking from the fellowship and aid of men who dare to do what they think is right in the face of an ostracism like this. How unnatural it appears to us in the North! In the North we have our differences. My colleague and I may agree very well, although we differ as wide as the polls in our political relations. It does not affect or disturb the social relations of men. So in the Northern States generally men differ. So it was before the war; they differed and had their debates and discussions.

It is not the first time, Mr. President, that the charge has been made upon the floor of the Senate of an ostracism and an intolerant arrogance on the part of the southern people toward those who entertain different political opinions from their own. The assumption is that the South is democratic by causes of repression, by causes of violence, by unlawful means. Mr. President, I desire to say to the honorable Senator from Ohio and also to the honorable Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] whom I know only by that high reputation which he holds in the hearts of the American people as a man of kindly sympathies and true loyalty to the principles which he entertains, that they have no evidence for the assertion which they have made, that they cannot produce any evidence which will bear any examination since the close of the war that there has been either intolerance, ostracism, or violence of any kind on account of political opinion. I make the challenge for my own State with perfect confidence, and I have no question as to the other portions of the South.

MAHONE REPUBLICAN COALITION.

But, Mr. President, the declarations of the honorable Senator from Ohio, who occupies so high a position before the country, have been drawn out in defense of a coalition made in this Chamber, or at least disclosed in this Chamber since the 4th day of March last. That coalition has announced to the country, it has announced to the Senate here, that its object is to obtain "a free ballot and a fair count," "a priceless suffrage," as the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] terms it, in the State of Virginia and in the Southern States. The honorable Senator from Connecticut has informed us and warned us that universal suffrage is the law of this land, and that it must be enforced; the assumption being that in the Southern States it is not enforced. I propose to discuss that subject, to discuss it in its relations to the Southern States and in its relations to the other States of the Union, but before doing so I desire to look for a moment at the peculiar aspects of that coalition which has been formed here, in relation to the present condition of the public business of the country, in relation to the constitutional duties and obligations which rest upon us here, for I desire, so far as I am concerned, that my individual action shall rest upon solid ground which may be sustained before the country.

And, Mr. President, I desire to ask for one moment what is that coalition which has been disclosed here in the Senate? We are presented with a view of the honorable Senator from Virginia as the chief and central figure, an ex-confederate soldier, fighting as he has informed us here under the authority of the confederate government for what he now terms a dream of empire, an aspiration and a hope, but which was quenched in blood, and standing by his side the Senator from New Hampshire—the Senator from Massachusetts I should say—since the coalition declares and proclaims to the country that he was fighting for the perpetuation of human slavery.

Mr. ROLLINS. Will the Senator repeat that remark.

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Massachusetts I should have said. I beg the Senator's pardon if I said "New Hampshire."

Mr. ROLLINS. You said "New Hampshire."

Mr. CALL. I beg pardon. I meant to refer to the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] The Senator is sustained on the other side by the honorable gentleman who represents in part the State of Louisiana here, [Mr. KELLOGG,] and he declares since the coalition, upon the floor of the Senate, that to have been a democrat since the war in a Southern State was to have been an assassin and a murderer.

So, Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Virginia, sustained by gentlemen who characterize him in his political attitude as a soldier for the perpetuation of human slavery, as an assassin and a murderer since the war, is announced here as in favor of "a free ballot and a fair count;" and we are told to herald the day when the scales are falling from the eyes of southern men and that the new South is about to reveal itself.

Mr. President, if this be sincere, if there be a real, honest, and true purpose in the heart of any man to ally himself to any political party or association for the real good of the country or from honest convictions, I do not desire to cast any aspersion upon that man. I regard the right of change of opinion as absolute as the duty of sincerity, the duty of truth, the duty of a real devotion to the interests of his country and his people.

Let us examine this subject and see. The honorable Senator from Ohio has presented to the people of the South, to the young men of the South, the flattering picture and the bright hope of a country in which there are to be no longer sectional parties, and he has exhorted them to follow the example of the Senator from Virginia, although he has been, in the language of one of his political associates, as a democrat, and so declared on this floor to have been, an assassin and a murderer, and as a confederate to have been fighting, not for a dream of empire, a hope, and an aspiration, but for the perpetuation of human slavery. Still we are told by this example to take note that the republican party holds out the hand of generous fellowship to the men of the South who come with true purpose and advocate "a free ballot and a fair count."

Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Ohio said yesterday that the attitude which this side of the Chamber held in opposing the passage of the resolution providing for the election of officers was one which, although not in this instance perhaps revolutionary, might become so, and he charged that in the special instance here presented there was not enough in the attitude of the Senator from Virginia and his relations toward the democratic party or in the propositions of the learned Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to justify the action of this side of the House. I do not propose to enter at large into that subject; but I desire to ask the honorable Senator from Ohio that he will do me the honor to answer me a question.

The honorable Senator in his able speech answered propositions which, like Falstaff's men in buckram, were only the creatures of his own imagination, and not the real propositions made by the honorable Senator from Delaware and on which we rest our case here.

I ask the honorable Senator from Ohio if he will do me the honor to answer me an abstract question, which every Senator may apply for himself and which may or may not determine the rightful attitude or the wrongful attitude of this side of the Chamber upon this question?

I will ask the honorable Senator whether a bestowal by a caucus of lucrative offices and a simultaneous support for the first time of the party or caucus bestowing the offices, a simultaneous change of party relations and principles by the person who either for himself or his friends and supporters receives such offices, and a simultaneous transfer of political power made by the change of party relations by the person thus benefited, can coexist properly and with a due regard to the public interest at any time or under any circumstances?

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Senator want an answer to that question?

Mr. CALL. I do, and shall be very glad to have an answer.

Mr. SHERMAN. In the first place I do not know that such a condition of facts as is assumed in that question exists. I do not know that the Senator from Virginia was under any obligation whatever to go with the democratic party under any circumstances, and I do not see how a man with any self-respect, with any sense of honor, with any love of manhood, could vote with the democratic party after they had treated him as they had treated that Senator at his election and before and since.

Now I will say, in further answer to the question, that it was just as natural, just as proper for the Senator from Virginia to act with us as it was possible for men who have previously differed upon other collateral questions. When he comes here and tells us that he is willing to act with us in carrying out all the great principles for which the republican party stands and has stood for the last twenty years, namely, equal civil and political rights to all men, I say we will receive him into our fellowship, we will treat him as one of us; we will confer upon him and his offices and honors, and share with him the bread and meat at our table as friends and kinsmen.

I think that is a full answer to the Senator from Florida, if I properly comprehend his question.

Mr. CALL. Then the honorable Senator thinks there can properly be a simultaneous bestowal of lucrative office by a party or caucus, a simultaneous acceptance, and a simultaneous action for the first time with the party or caucus thus bestowing office, a simultaneous transfer at the same moment of political power from one side of the Chamber to the other.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, when every republican member of the Legislature of Virginia, I believe—I do not know whether every one or not—when at least the great body of the republican members of the Legislature of Virginia co-operated with the personal friends of the Senator from Virginia in electing him, they baptized him, and we have only approved that baptism. Long ago it was manifest by the drift of events that the Senator from Virginia had no stopping-place short of the republican party, because we know, by the discipline exercised by the democratic party upon every man in the South who differs with them on any question whatever, that there is, to use the language of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, no half-way house; and I expected before I came here that the Senator from Virginia, although he never has participated in our caucus, never has gone into our conferences, never has made any promises to us, that "the logic of events" would drive him into the ranks of the great party to which I belong.

Mr. HARRIS. Did the Senator from Ohio hear the Senator from Virginia announce on this floor that he was a better democrat than the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL?]

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, Mr. President, I have heard that remark made over and over again. I heard a former colleague once say that he was a better democrat than any democrat on the other side of the House, and he was a famous republican. I am a better democrat, according to the literal sense of the word, than any Senator on the other side of the House, because what is the meaning of democracy? It means equality, love of liberty, equal rights, and in the true sense and meaning of the word "democrat," we claim to be democrats while we are republicans; and therefore it is a very common thing for a person to say, "I am a better democrat than you are;" and I think I could use the same language.

Mr. HARRIS. Did not the Senator from Ohio understand the Senator from Virginia when he used that term to mean it in the ordinary current party sense of to-day?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I understood him, on the other hand, to go on to say that the kind of democracy he belonged to—and he was a better democrat than you are—was not the Bourbon democracy, which he denounced and defined and explained in the very speech in which he made that remark.

Mr. CALL. Then, Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Ohio has taken another position. He does not admit the fact that the simultaneous change of party relations and political principles occurred at the time of the bestowal of this lucrative office; he holds that it antedated it. That is a question of fact, and therefore I will now ask the honorable Senator another question. I ask him to say whether an avowed and open candidacy for a nomination for governor from a political party, and the support of the candidate of the same party for the Presidency some years afterward, and the absence of any declaration of dissent from the platform and principles of that party except upon certain local issues and questions, and the declaration of the most intimate friends and political associates of such person of his continued identity with that party on all questions except on the expressed local issues, is or is not sufficient and conclusive proof of the party relations of such person?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, although I am rather submitting to these interrogatories I do it in perfect good humor. I will say that although the Senator from Virginia voted for an electoral ticket pledged to vote for General Hancock he did not do what I would do. He was willing to vote for General Hancock upon the platform that he, the Senator from Virginia, framed, taking General Hancock's promises to be true; but if he had known what I knew, or what I believed, that the democratic party could not be trusted to carry out the promises made by General Hancock, the candidate for whom the Senator from Virginia was willing to vote, he, I think, would have come over a little sooner and a little more rapidly. That is the answer.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the honorable Senator will note that in these cases the argument which he is required to meet is not the single instance, not the single fact, but the concurrence of facts, the cumulative facts, all tending to one conclusion; and it is no answer to the argument to take each of these facts singly and say that no one of them by itself is sufficient to maintain the conclusion. The argument itself affirms this in declaring that the cumulative force of these concurring facts is absolute and conclusive.

It is not, as the honorable gentleman ably and astutely treated the argument of the learned Senator from Delaware yesterday, a single fact, but he must come here and meet the concurrence of facts; he must either deny that these facts do exist and do concur, or he must show that the honorable Senator from Virginia before the 4th of March acted with the republican party in some shape or form. He cannot deny the concurrent force of simultaneous facts, and the force of the proposition is the bestowal of the lucrative offices of the Senate and the simultaneous transfer of political power at that moment and in connection with that act, and the continued enforcement here before the Senate of the United States of the purpose of bestowing those political offices contemporaneously with the first declaration of political action and political support between the party and the Senator. I say again it is the concurrence of facts which bears its weight and furnishes the justification to this side of the Chamber.

THE REPUBLICAN PARTY DENY A FREE BALLOT TO THE SOUTH.

But, Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Ohio and the honorable Senator from Connecticut, the latter of whom I know only as a Senator standing high in the public regard and holding a place in the hearts of the American people as a man of kindly sympathies and sincere devotion to principle, have declared this coalition to be a movement for a free ballot not only in Virginia, but in the South; they have spoken of ostracism for political opinion's sake, of the courage which independent political action requires in the Southern States, and they ascribe the unity of political action in these States to repressive causes. With great respect to the honorable Senators, I may say that I admire the audacity of this declaration. You have learned from the Frenchman's philosophy of success, Audace, audace, audace toujours. Why, Mr. President, was it not the Senator from Ohio, greatly respected and learned as he is, and his party, under his teachings and influence, who instead of a free ballot disfranchised a majority of the intelligent and virtuous and property-holding men of the Southern States in the first reconstruction by the direct denial of the ballot?

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to ask the Senator right at that point, if it was not the fact that every southern man who by the original constitutions of those States as they existed at the outbreak of the war was allowed to vote had a right to vote, most of them without conditions, and all of them who would take the oath of amnesty prescribed by the proclamation of President Johnson?

Mr. CALL. No man had a right to vote except those whom the military officers permitted to vote, and thousands of men who ought to have voted were not allowed to vote.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator will refer to the proclamation itself he will find that my assertion is correct, and that every man who had a right to vote by the constitutions of the Southern States as they were at the outbreak of the war had that right to vote under the proclamation of the President and the instructions of the provisional governors, if that man would simply swear fealty to the Union of these States.

Mr. CALL. And thousands were disfranchised, and the military officers of the country were made the judges.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator confounds the distinction between the right to exercise the suffrage and the right to hold office.

Mr. CALL. I do not confound the two. The reconstruction was under military authority; it was not a civil act.

Mr. BLAIR. Necessarily under military authority, for there was no other authority which could preserve the peace. All reconstruction must take place under military authority in the first instance, because military authority was in possession of those States; but the suffrage was extended, under instructions to those military authorities, to the entire southern population which had the right to vote under their old constitutions, provided they would but swear loyalty to the Union.

Mr. CALL. I beg the honorable Senator's pardon; he is speaking of the text, of the letter of the law, but its main and distinguishing feature was that it was to be executed not under the guarantees of the Constitution and the courts, not as a civil right, but by military force and power.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me? Do I understand him to concede that I state properly and correctly the letter of the law?

Mr. CALL. No, I do not, because my memory does not serve me.

Mr. BLAIR. The documents will bear me out in what I say.

Mr. CALL. I think it possible that the Senator may be right, that the general terms of the law, with special clauses of disfranchisement, did allow a general suffrage in the country.

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator claim that as a matter of fact, that any man who chose to take that oath was not allowed to vote?

Mr. CALL. Oh, thousands were disfranchised, and it always will be so under military authority as contradistinguished from civil. That was the object of depriving the civil power and the courts of their authority to protect individuals.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator is entirely incorrect in his statement. There is no historic fact to support him.

Mr. CALL. The difference between the Senator from New Hampshire and myself is that I know the fact and that he does not, that I am sustained by the whole concurrent authority of history and the Government records themselves, and the Senator is not.

Mr. BLAIR. There is no fact that stood between the exercise of the suffrage and the citizen as the citizen was before the outbreak of the war, except the sole fact that he refused to take that oath.

Mr. VANCE. And except the bayonets of the United States Army.

Mr. BLAIR. No bayonets of the United States were ever interposed, South or North, but for the protection of the ballot, and the Senator cannot specify one single instance in which the armed forces of the United States ever exercised any authority whatever but in the protection of the suffrage of the people of the United States, North or South.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me, I will say to him that in my State, which never was in rebellion but held her relations with the Federal Union during the whole time, I myself was disfranchised by a military order which prescribed a qualification in addition to that which was prescribed by the constitution and laws of my State; and I saw a Federal officer stand with his sword at the polling place to enforce a military order made by General Schenck, which military order was made for the very purpose of trying to carry the election for the republican party.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will bear in mind that my remark was only with reference to the statement of the Senator from Florida as to the period of reconstruction. The Senator from Delaware now speaks of a military order issued during the prosecution of the war itself, taking supervision of a state of things quasi-rebellious, if not really so, and an order issued by his own subsequent candidate for the Presidency, General McClellan, during the war.

Mr. SAULSBURY. General McClellan?

Mr. BLAIR. General McClellan.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It was not issued by General McClellan. It was issued by General Schenck. He was the general.

Mr. BLAIR. But was he not a subordinate of General McClellan, and did he not merely repeat the order of his superior?

Mr. SAULSBURY. No; General McClellan at that time had passed out of the public service and been displaced. There never was a more unjustifiable act on earth by any military officer, and his own party there were ready to condemn it, and at the very next election they would not permit it themselves.

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator from Delaware controvert the statement which I made that the original efforts at reconstruction, that the provisional governments established by virtue of the proclamation of Andrew Johnson, were reconstructed upon the basis of suffrage as it existed in the Southern States just at the breaking out of the war and by virtue of the constitutions of those States, subject only to the condition that whoever was to vote must declare allegiance to the laws of the land?

Mr. CALL. I have asserted the proposition, and I reassert it, that to put the suffrage in the hands of the military is to deny under the Constitution and laws of this country "a free ballot and a fair count." Whatever may have been the precept of the law, the mode of reconstruction in the Southern States was a registration and an arbitrary authority as to voting in the hands of military officers; and it depended, to say the least, upon the intelligence, upon the right purpose, and upon the fairness of the officers into whose hands that power was confided. As a matter of fact they did return the vote so as to disfranchise the intelligent, the virtuous, the influential people of the entire South; they did build up majorities where none existed, and for eight years they held power against the votes of a majority of the people.

I ask again was it not the Senator from Ohio who reconstructed the Southern States upon the basis of black or colored suffrage avowedly for the purpose of excluding the white citizens from a free ballot and a fair count by the Freedman's Bureau and the use of the Army of the United States, for that was the instrumentality by which the colored man was built up into a deep and settled and a profound animosity, which it took years to overcome, against the intelligent, the virtuous, the kind, and the friendly people who had nurtured him from infancy to manhood? I ask was it not the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Massachusetts—and I ask it with great respect and kind feeling to them, and I refer to the facts of the past without indulging in personal feeling although I may differ with them—who maintained the force bill long afterward in the Congress of the United States for the purpose of substituting force for civil process and civil means in the government of those people? And what does that show? Is that "a free ballot and a fair count?"

I ask again, Mr. President, was it not the Senators from Ohio and Massachusetts who sustained the returning boards in refusing "a free ballot and a fair count," and thus disfranchising whole districts and States? Was it not those Senators who sustained the corrupt courts and officials who packed the juries with partisan jurors selected for conviction of accused persons by suborned and perjured witnesses bought with the public money? Was it not you, gentlemen upon the other side, who sustained these governments by force until they had beggared the people with taxes, exhausted the public credit with riotous expenditure, and made virtue and religion stand aghast with horror and shame at the unbridled lust, the unlicensed passions which were installed in the high places of power, and like Absalom, in the very wantonness of crime and power exhibited its shameless passion to all the world?

RECONSTRUCTION.

You talk about polygamy and the Mormons; but the governments which you established in the Southern States on the basis of the denial of a free ballot, directly and indirectly on the basis of the exclusion of the virtue, the intelligence, and the property of the country from all places of power have never had a parallel in the history of mankind either for the extent of criminal practices, unrestrained licentiousness, and open, admitted, and unblushing bribery, fraud, and theft.

I hold in my hand a report, which is sustained by republican authority, made by a committee of the Legislature of South Carolina, the record of which will cause any citizen of America to hang his head with shame and with sorrow. The very capitol and executive mansion were disgraced by the public exhibition of crimes that would bring the blush to the cheek of every American mother and make the heart of every father shrink within him at the contemplation of licentiousness openly proclaiming itself to the world.

The honorable Senator from New Hampshire a few moments ago called my attention to the letter of the law under which the first reconstruction occurred. The honorable Senator controverted my statement that that was a reconstruction in which "a free ballot and a fair count" was not permitted. My statement that it was done by military coercion he admitted, but he claimed that under the law the naked right existed. Let us see how far he was correct even in that. This is the act:

Provided, That no person excluded from the privilege of holding office by said proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States shall be eligible to election as a member of the convention to frame a constitution for any of said rebel States, nor shall any such person vote for members of such convention.

I knew that the fact was that the law and the practice had disfranchised a large proportion of the intelligent people of the South. So again the oath which they were required to take operated as a disfranchisement. I will send to the desk the law prescribing the oath and have it put in my speech.

The Secretary read as follows:

An act supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That before the 1st day of September, 1867, the commanding general in each district defined by an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, shall cause a registration to be made of the male citizens of the United States twenty-one years of age and upward, resident in each county or parish in the State or States included in his district, which registration shall include only those persons who are qualified to vote for delegates by the act aforesaid, and who shall have taken and subscribed the following oath or affirmation: "I, ——— ———, do solemnly swear, (or affirm,) in the presence of Almighty God, that I am a citizen of the State of ———; that I have resided in said State for ——— months next preceding this day, and now reside in the county of ———, or the parish of ———, in said State, (as the case may be;) that I am twenty-one years old; that I have not been disfranchised for participation in any rebellion or civil war against the United States, nor for felony committed against the laws of any State or of the United States; that I have never been a member of any State Legislature, nor held any executive or judicial office in any State, and afterward engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. That I have never taken an oath as a member of Congress of the United States, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, and afterward engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof; that I will faithfully support the Constitution and obey the laws of the United States, and will, to the best of my ability, encourage others so to do, so help me God;"—which oath or affirmation may be administered by any registering officer.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the honorable Senator allow me a moment, for I should like to be perfectly accurate in a statement of this kind? On page 10 of McPherson's History of the Reconstruction, a work which, as we all know, is made up from official documents very largely, almost wholly, you will find a portion of the proclamation of amnesty issued by President Johnson, May 29, 1865, which enumerates the several classes excepted from absolute unconditional amnesty. There are fourteen in number. I will read them:

The following classes of persons are excepted from the benefits of this proclamation:

First. All who are or shall have been pretended civil or diplomatic officers or otherwise domestic or foreign agents of the pretended government.

Second. All who left judicial stations under the United States to aid the rebellion.

Third. All who shall have been military or naval officers of said pretended confederate government above the rank of colonel in the army, or lieutenant in the navy.

Fourth. All who left seats in the Congress of the United States to aid the rebellion.

Fifth. All who resigned or tendered resignations of their commissions in the Army or Navy of the United States, to evade duty in resisting the rebellion.

Sixth. All who have engaged in any way in treating otherwise than lawfully as prisoners of war, persons found in the United States service as officers, soldiers, seamen, or in other capacities.

Seventh. All persons who have been or are absentees from the United States for the purpose of aiding the rebellion.

Eighth. All military and naval officers, in the rebel service, who were educated by the Government in the Military Academy at West Point or the United States Naval Academy.

Ninth. All persons who held the pretended offices of governors of States in insurrection against the United States.

Tenth. All persons who left their homes within the jurisdiction and protection of the United States, and passed beyond the Federal military lines into the pretended Confederate States for the purpose of aiding the rebellion.

Eleventh. All persons who have been engaged in the destruction of the commerce of the United States upon the high seas, and all persons who have made raids into the United States from Canada, or been engaged in destroying the commerce of the United States upon the lakes and rivers that separate the British Provinces from the United States.

Twelfth. All persons who, at the time when they seek to obtain the benefits hereof by taking the oath herein prescribed, are in military, naval, or civil confinement, or custody, or under bonds of the civil, military, or naval authorities, or agents of the United States, as prisoners of war, or persons detained for offenses of any kind, either before or after conviction.

Thirteenth. All persons who have voluntarily participated in said rebellion, and the estimated value of whose taxable property is over twenty thousand dollars.

Fourteenth. All persons who have taken the oath of amnesty as prescribed in the President's proclamation of December 8, A. D. 1863, or an oath of allegiance to the Government of the United States since the date of said proclamation, and who thenceforward kept and maintained the same inviolate.

Then comes this provision:

Provided, That special application may be made to the President for pardon by any person belonging to the excepted classes; and such clemency will be liberally extended as may be consistent with the facts of the case and the peace and dignity of the United States.

And the instance of the refusal of clemency upon such application I never heard of in the world, and I do not believe that a single such instance exists where the application was made.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will bear with me a moment, for I wish the two parts of this statement to be made in connection with each other. On the eleventh page of the same work is the proclamation appointing William W. Holden provisional governor of North Carolina, and which provides under the supervision of the military power for the re-establishment of civil authority in that State. The second paragraph goes on in this wise, and it is all that is pertinent to the proposition which I made:

Now, therefore, in obedience to the high and solemn duties imposed upon me by the Constitution of the United States, and for the purpose of enabling the loyal people of said State to organize a State government, whereby justice may be established, domestic tranquillity insured, and loyal citizens protected in all their rights of life, liberty, and property, I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States and Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, do hereby appoint William W. Holden provisional governor of the State of North Carolina, whose duty it shall be, at the earliest practicable period, to prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for convening a convention, composed of delegates to be chosen by that portion of the people of said State who are loyal to the United States, and no others, for the purpose of altering or amending the constitution thereof; and with authority to exercise, within the limits of said State, all the powers necessary and proper to enable such loyal people of the State of North Carolina to restore said State to its constitutional relations to the Federal Government, and to present such a republican form of State government as will entitle the State to the guarantee of the United States therefor, and its people to protection by the United States against invasion, insurrection, and domestic violence: Provided, That in any election that may be hereafter held for choosing delegates to any State convention, as aforesaid, no person shall be qualified as an elector, or shall be eligible as a member of such convention, unless he shall have previously taken the oath of amnesty, as set forth in the President's proclamation of May 29, A. D. 1865, and is a voter qualified as prescribed by the constitution and laws of the State of North Carolina, in force immediately before the 20th day of May, 1861, the date of the so-called ordinance of secession; and the said convention when convened, or the Legislature that shall be thereafter assembled, will prescribe the qualification of electors, and the eligibility of persons to hold office under the constitution and laws of the State, a power the people of the several States composing the Federal Union have rightfully exercised from the origin of the Government to the present time.

And in connection with this I wish to read the oath of amnesty alluded to in this appointment of Governor Holden.

Mr. CALL. I must beg the Senator from New Hampshire to remember that this is not exactly fair. I cannot consent to his filling up the whole RECORD now. If my learned friend wants to make a short speech, selecting the salient points of that document, well and good, but it is scarcely right that he should take a half hour——

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to read only nine lines more.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator allow me to say a word?

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that I occupy the floor by the courtesy of the Senator from Florida. I was reading certain documentary evidence in connection with evidence of like character which he introduced, that the whole might be considered together.

Mr. CALL. I do not want the Senator to put in a document that is so long that it takes an hour to read.

Mr. BLAIR. I have read about five minutes, the Senator will bear in mind, and one minute will let me get through with nine lines. I wish to put in this connection the oath of amnesty alluded to in the proclamation:

I, —— ——, do solemnly swear, (or affirm,) in presence of Almighty God, that I will henceforth faithfully support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States, and the union of the States thereunder; and that I will, in like manner, abide by and faithfully support all laws and proclamations which have been made during the existing rebellion with reference to the emancipation of slaves, so help me God.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator allow me one word? I have risen not to make a speech, but the Senator from New Hampshire either forgets or carefully refrains from reading the reconstruction acts of March and July, 1867.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. One moment; I do not want to be interrupted now.

Mr. BLAIR. But the Senator will allow me to correct him when he charges me with an incorrect statement, either intentionally or ignorantly made.

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAIR. I assure the honorable Senator that he is at least two years out of his bearings. I am talking about the initial act when civil government was restored in those States, and he has got two years this side, when the abuse of power under the exercise of the suffrage compelled the reconstruction of those provisional governments themselves.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, the acts under which those States were reconstructed I shall take occasion to examine the first of next week or to-morrow when we meet if you like. I happened to be a member of the reconstruction committee. I happened to be one of the perambulating committee of twenty-one where all this matter was taken up. It was because the people of those States under the proclamation of Andrew Johnson were about to send decent men to Congress and did send them—the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] was sent, Judge Sharkey, of Mississippi, was sent, the best men of the country were sent to overthrow the infamous laws which had been passed by the Congress then existing—that those States were turned out, declared to be subject provinces, placed under military rule worse than all the satrapies of Turkey, and the General of the Army was required to take absolute control over them. You would not even allow the President to interpose. You passed laws in the Congress of the United States that disfranchised a man if he had been a constable or a justice of the peace forty years before the war, and had during any of the years of strife given a pair of shoes to his son whose feet were bleeding from the frost, and allowed every negro and every carpet-bagger and every thief and every plunderer to control that people in a way that no people were ever tortured before. It was the most cruel, the most iniquitous legislation that ever was resorted to. The men of property, the men of intelligence were crushed in the dust, and their former slaves were made their masters, and the Army was put over all, and a band of men nine-tenths of whom were never in the Federal Army, who were the cow-boys, the squaws of the war, were sent to give a double representation to the North in order to maintain the legislation then upon the statute-book. They were not content with disfranchising the South, but they doubled their own representation by sending the most infamous men they could find to plunder that people until General Grant and all the decent men of the republican party protested against it. I will show that when I come to consider the subject.

Mr. CALL. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida submit to a moment's further interruption?

Mr. CALL. Only a moment; not to read another document.

Mr. BLAIR. I will not read another document, but I will take that moment to remind the honorable Senator from Kentucky that he knows very little of the history of which he was himself a part or he fails to state it with accuracy. I was reading documents having a bearing, a genuine bearing upon the point which was raised by the Senator from Florida, and I said, and the documents bear me out absolutely, I think, certainly substantially, in the assertion which I made, that the original reconstruction of the Southern States, the transition from military to the exercise of civil power was, by virtue of the authority of the United States, based upon precisely the same right of suffrage which existed at the date of the passage of the various ordinances of secession in the several States; and this is the truth that the Southern States were reconstructed upon that suffrage. They framed their constitutions, they organized their Legislatures, they enacted their laws, all based upon precisely that same suffrage; and so inhuman were they, so absolutely subversive of the great objects and purposes and results of the war were they that it became necessary, in order to prevent the actual re-establishment of slavery in the Southern States in a worse form than it had existed prior to the war and which had been abolished as the result of the war, that a reconstruction of those governments should be had. It was absolutely indispensable, and thereupon the National Congress took the matter in hand two years afterward and appointed the committee on reconstruction of which the Senator from Kentucky was so prominent and so able a member. That committee upon reconstruction recommended a measure which passed the Thirty-ninth Congress, a Congress ending March 4, 1867. It and the Fortieth Congress immediately following proposed and enacted measures which based the reorganization of the South upon manhood suffrage, giving to those who had been in the war, those who constituted the confederate army, and the colored man as well a vote, so that the right to be heard at the ballot-box belonged to all. And they initiated and carried out the measures which were necessary to give to every man, white and black, at the South, whether he had been in the rebellion or not, the opportunity to speak at the ballot-box and to be represented in the resulting government. If there were abuses resulting it was simply because the white population at the South, the controlling, the intelligent, the wealthy population at the South rebelled in spirit once more, and fell sullenly back and refused to participate with their colored brethren in these efforts to reconstruct their governments upon the basis of universal suffrage. If these intelligent and wealthy men who had reconstructed the South in the first place, and who have recaptured it since, had asserted themselves at the polls at the same time when the negro went there and deposited his ballot, can it be pretended that they would not have been able by the force of intelligence and by their superior numbers to have controlled the subsequent reconstruction in the South, based as it was upon universal suffrage?

No, Mr. President; this is all an idle and hollow pretense. Whatever calamities the carpet-bag governments brought upon the South the South brought upon herself, because she refused to exercise her right and her power under these reconstruction measures which are so much belied; and she chose, rather than vote at the side of a freedman, who might also be a black man, to ignore the reconstruction which was provided by the national authorities; and her calamities, if they are calamities, are due to herself.

But, Mr. President, the carpet-bag governments were the best governments the South ever had; and the common school and the principles of universal liberty which prevail there now and which are the basis of your rising prosperity, all those great ideas of genuine liberty extended to all men which are the basis of your prosperity and of your future happiness, and which will make you the crowning glory of our great Union of States, come to you by virtue of these same carpet-bag governments which you curse.

Mr. BECK. Now, Mr. President, one word, and I will say nothing further. If the Senator from New Hampshire had not displayed absolute ignorance before, he has done it now. He says that the reconstruction acts allowed every man to vote. I say they did not. They lie before me and I can prove it by reading them.

Mr. BLAIR. I have at no time intended to say that the reconstruction acts of 1867, two years later than the proclamation which I read, gave to every man the unqualified right to vote, but every man who chose to be a loyal man and to give evidence of his loyalty by taking the necessary oath—nearly every man, but there were a very few of those men who had been prominent in the rebellion excepted, I grant.

Mr. BECK. And a man could not take the oath, as I say, if he had been a constable or an overseer of a highway or a justice of the peace twenty years before the war, and had resisted secession all he could, if he had at any time, and he was obliged to admit that he had, given a pair of shoes or a pair of stockings even to a conscript son during any of the years of strife.

I shall go into that matter at some early day, because this thing is going to last a week; these gentlemen dare not go into executive session; they do not propose to do it until next Wednesday or Thursday when their friends come back from Wisconsin; and this is all a pretense we know. They are afraid to go into executive session; we all know that; and they are endeavoring to make the country believe that we are responsible for their not going there. They can do their work there and come back into this wrangle if they want to, but they are afraid to face the responsibility of the nominations of their own President, and therefore next week when there is ample time I will go into this discussion. They will adjourn to Monday now if they can. I will show the Senator from New Hampshire that the statements he is making of the laws under which those people were reconstructed, and his laudation of the carpet-bag governments are not only untrue in the eyes of the American people, but will meet with no response except with himself and with a few others who hate the southern people as badly as he seems to do.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky has said three or four times——

Mr. CALL. I thought I had the floor.

Mr. DAWES. Just one moment. He has said three or four times that we dared not go into executive session. I would like to have him state what is the ground of that.

Mr. BECK. What is the ground of what?

Mr. DAWES. Of that assertion.

Mr. BECK. Because you have such divisions among yourselves that you dare not face the questions that will arise if you venture to go into executive session.

Mr. DAWES. That is not an answer. I ask him on what ground he says I dare not go into executive session?

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Massachusetts is not the republican party. I know he has been scolding us here for days, and it has given him a wonderful amount of satisfaction. I know for eight years, when I was in the other House with him, he used to indulge in it nearly every day, scolding everybody. He used not to do it here, but he has taken more courage the last few weeks, because he has a new set to deal with that he never had before. I do not mean him alone; I mean his party.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I must claim my rights.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAWES. I will not interrupt the Senator but one moment. The Senator has been informed by me three or four times——

Mr. HARRIS. I understood that the Senator from Florida declined to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Florida knows whether he declines, just as well as the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HARRIS. I understood the Senator from Florida distinctly to say that he declined to yield, and yet the Senator from Massachusetts persevered. I call the Senator from Massachusetts to order.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has the floor.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator yield a moment?

Mr. CALL. How long does the Senator wish to speak? One minute?

Mr. DAWES. About a minute.

Mr. CALL. Very well.

Mr. DAWES. I wanted to ask the Senator from Tennessee who constituted him the guardian of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. CALL. I think I must go on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida declines to yield further.

Mr. CALL. I thought the Senator from Massachusetts had something he wanted to say. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. I thought so, too.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I stated as a fact that the first reconstruction, not the reconstruction under the provisional governments under President Johnson, but the first reconstruction under the act of Congress, was a forced reconstruction in which a free ballot was denied to the intelligent and the property-holding classes of the South. I find in the message of President Grant in 1870 the following language:

> In view, however, of the vast importance of the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution, this day declared a part of that revered instrument, I deem a departure from the usual custom justifiable. A measure which makes at once four millions of people voters, who were heretofore declared by the highest tribunal in the land not citizens of the United States—

The Senator from New Hampshire must know that those four millions of people by military authority were permitted to vote in the reconstruction, while by General Grant's declaration, and by the past they were not until the adoption of the fifteenth amendment eligible to vote in any State or in any form; and while that was so under the oath required to be taken and under the provisions of this law which provided that no person should vote for a member of the convention who was not eligible to the convention under the law there was a disfranchisement of the larger portion of the men of character, of virtue, of religion, of honesty, and of integrity in the Southern States.

CARPET-BAG GOVERNMENT.

I said, Mr. President, in the progress of this history, charging as I do that you are not sincere, gentlemen, in your proposition when you say that you are in favor of "a free ballot and a fair count," that in your course toward the southern people, instead of inviting the affiliation and support of virtue, of capacity, of character, you have refused to accept them, and sought to develop, to purchase infamy, degradation, infidelity, insincerity, and hypocrisy as your allies in those States. I said, and I say again, that upon the record the history of the world furnishes no parallel to the carpet-bag governments which have become infamous in history as such, which you created in the Southern States on the basis of a solid black power and a minority of whites gathered from all quarters of the world to govern and control that people by denying "a free ballot and a fair count" through returning boards, through military power, through the terror of cruel laws administered by corrupt and perjured judges, by corrupt and perjured district attorneys, by jurors selected from the most ignorant and bitterly prejudiced parts of the community for the purpose of conviction and not of a fair and honest trial. Let us look a little at the proofs.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] said a few days ago, "Point us to the proof." Sir, I do not impeach the character of the great political organization known as the republican party; but I do impeach the wisdom, the success, the honesty of their reconstruction work in the Southern States. I do charge upon that work the unity of opinion and feeling, gentlemen, which not only makes southern men but makes every northern man who carries into that country his wife and young children, just budding into womanhood and manhood, a democrat, however stalwart a republican he has been, because you bring him in contact with the infinite vileness of that system of things which you established there.

Is this empty declamation? The Almighty has not set his seal upon mere bold assertion. Gentlemen on the other side cannot destroy the truth of facts, the truth of society, the truth of political action, by gathering falsehood and detraction and abuse from the lips of hired and perjured men. What are the facts? I hold in my hand a report, which I venture to say cannot be controverted by any fair processes of investigation or denial anywhere, a report that rests alike upon republican and upon democratic authority. That report is the report of a committee of investigation of the South Carolina Legislature after there had been a reassertion of the great conservative forces of society, after the intelligence, the religion, the industry, and the virtue of the country, whether of northern or southern origin, whether republican or democratic, had combined to restore power to the hands of the better and the wiser and the honester portion of the people. What does that report show? Let us look for a moment at the great picture of this work of reconstruction which beggared the people of the South, which insulted by gross crimes and licentiousness in public places the purity of the domestic household and cast abroad throughout the land vice and the examples of vice in its most horrid form. What does that report show?

The expenses of the Legislature of South Carolina in 1871 were $822,698.83; in 1871–'72 they were $1,533,574; in 1872–'73 they were $908,865; in 1873–'74, $922,000, and in 1877, under Governor Hampton's administration, they were $84,096, as against a million and a million and a half preceding that time. And what was done with that sum of money drawn from an impoverished State and people whose industries were ruined? Look at the list of articles purchased; look at the unbridled luxury and looseness, see the provision for shameless passion and indulgence which it is not even becoming to read in the Senate of the United States, in which nearly one million four hundred thousand dollars was expended to gratify the passions and lustful tastes of the men holding power by virtue of that forced reconstruction.

Gentlemen, there is nothing new in this, and I am not using extraordinary language when I say that the religion and the virtue of the North and the South, of every man and every family in that country, stood aghast at the spectacle presented.

Talk about a free ballot! Gentlemen, you talk about ostracism. There has not been ostracism except in cases where a man countenanced and upheld such wicked crimes, and then not because of his political opinions or his party relations, but because he was particeps criminis to these offenses against good order and public decency, against religion and good morals.

Why, sir, in the very first political convention which was a convention of both parties that met in my State and composed of men that were northern and southern, we offered a unanimous nomination to a republican then and now as loyal to his convictions of party duty and principle as any of you who sit upon the other side. I refer to Captain James, a citizen of the State of Massachusetts, a graduate of one of her great institutions of learning, a captain in the war and a captain of that class of troops against whom it was supposed the greatest prejudice existed on the part of the southern people. I say that every man's house has been open to every man without regard to his republican faith who was a gentleman and a man of fair and honest character and demeanor and who did not make it his business to incite strife and murder and crime on the part of the colored people toward the white or the white people toward the colored.

You proposed, gentlemen, to reconstruct government and to maintain it on the basis of the supremacy of the black man over the white; you propose to maintain that state of things under the lead of strangers and the few southern white men who would sell themselves for the purpose by the bribe of office. I know some good men, both northern and southern, who could find it in their conscience to be reconciled to this condition of things; but while there was one of this kind there were ten, whether they came from the North or the South, whose moral nature recoiled from the hideous reality. But under all aspects and at all times your scheme proposed to govern these people with a solid black power and a small minority of whites, and to exclude the great body of the young men and the old from all participancy in and control over their own State governments, and to supplement this state of things with the power of the sword and the terrors of cruel laws administered by stalwart judges and district attorneys and packed juries and perjured witnesses. This is what you call "a free ballot and a fair count!"

And this is what you propose to renew in the Southern States, and you wish to encourage enough independents to accept it; but first, gentlemen, abolish the churches, stop the schools, shut out the literature and the learning, and all the sources through which morals and decency are taught, and you may begin to accomplish your object.

You must forbid the access of your New England newspapers and forbid the ministers of religion and the humble priest from going with his Bible from house to house and administering his moral instruction with the consolations of religion; you must prohibit your northern men from coming with their wives and their young daughters growing into beautiful and virtuous and intelligent womanhood, and their boys into an honorable and truthful manhood, for as surely as they go and come in contact with the condition of things you established there their stalwart religion and virtue will change their stalwart republicanism into horror at the contact with the vileness of that political system which you are seeking to establish on the basis of a solid black power, resting on bitter hatred and animosity, fomented in secret political societies where no free discussion is allowed, and where absolute ostracism of the respectable elements of the country is practiced; where no colored man's life or property is safe if he is independent. You will have again placed vice and crime above virtue and innocence, ignorance above learning, idleness and vagabondism over industry, and theft and dishonesty above honesty. Then licentiousness will be made respectable, and qualifications for office will be falsehood and perjury. When you have passed such laws, you will have begun to accomplish your purpose of proving to the people who shall live in that unhappy country that you intend to press them down to the level of this infamous and terrible condition of things.

Mr. President, this has been the history. The Senator from Ohio bore a large part in producing this condition of things. The Senators from Ohio and Massachusetts who are responsible for that terrible condition of things revealed by the history of that South Carolina Legislature and measurably by others, appear here and reproach the South for what they call repudiation. They reproach them for the refusal, or the failure rather than the refusal, to pay the obligations incurred by bribed legislators, to pay obligations not one dollar of which has ever gone into public uses. Well, Mr. President, in my State we have not done so. The statement which has been read here is, so far as we are concerned, utterly and absolutely false. No obligation of the State of Florida has ever been refused to be met; every obligation of the State, with the single exception of a few bonds held in the Department over which the honorable Senator from Ohio so lately presided, and against which the State has thought and still thinks that she has a right to an honest offset of money due to her under an act of Congress and the laws of the country and once appropriated for its payment—no other bonds, created by any government of the State of Florida, stand unpaid or, at least, unacknowledged and the interest upon them paid.

MASSACHUSETTS DENIES A FREE BALLOT.

But, Mr. President, I further say that this proposition of "a free ballot and a fair count" is a pretense that you have no right to make. Why? Where have you a free ballot? What do you mean by a free ballot? Do you mean a ballot extended to everybody? You certainly do not. The Senator from New Hampshire—the Senator from Massachusetts, I mean—holds his place here by virtue of a law disfranchising enough of her adult male population to change the politics of the State.

Mr. ROLLINS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Florida what portion of the population of New Hampshire is disfranchised?

Mr. CALL. I said Massachusetts.

Mr. ROLLINS. You said New Hampshire.

Mr. CALL. I said Massachusetts. The gentleman's ears are open to hear what he wants to hear.

Mr. ROLLINS. I appeal to the Reporter. The Senator said New Hampshire. If he says he meant Massachusetts, all right.

Mr. CALL. I have corrected it, and you heard the correction.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator would understand the constitution and laws of Massachusetts a little better he would correct himself about Massachusetts.

Mr. CALL. Does the Senator from Massachusetts deny—I do not blame the qualification—the fact that there are one hundred thousand or nearly that number of adult males in Massachusetts who have not the right of suffrage?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly I do, sir. Nobody who understands anything about the facts would ever make such a statement as that.

Mr. CALL. Well, that will not do. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts cannot get out of the proposition by bravado and bold assertion. We must have facts and proof. It is stated in the report of a special committee of which the late Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. Wallace, was chairman, and it has been asserted time and again. Now, will the Senator tell us whether there are any persons disfranchised in the State of Massachusetts?

Mr. DAWES. More is the pity that men should state in a report that which has not the slightest foundation in fact.

Mr. CALL. I beg the Senator's pardon. He cannot truthfully deny upon this floor that there are thousands of people disfranchised in Massachusetts by her qualification. I challenge him to the proof; whether the number be one hundred thousand or not, the Senator cannot truthfully deny that there are many thousands of people in Massachusetts disfranchised.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I think I know pretty well about the people of Massachusetts, and without a great deal of assumption I know as much about them as the Senator from Florida, and I repeat what I have said here in the hearing of Massachusetts.

Mr. CALL. Well, Mr. President, I will not stop now, but I think I shall be able to prove that there are thousands of men to-day disfranchised under the laws of Massachusetts, which require that men shall read and write, which require that they shall pay a poll-tax; and I want the Senator from Massachusetts to tell us how in the face of the people of the United States and of this Senate he can undertake to sustain the Senator from Virginia, who noted his point of departure in opposition to the democratic party of Virginia because they have a capitation suffrage tax. I should like the Senator from Massachusetts to tell us as to that.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I have nothing to do with that question just at this time. I am responding to the Senator's accusation against Massachusetts. We will settle that before we pass to any other State. I have no doubt the Senator can find just what he says in the report to which he alludes, but that does not alter the fact. Now, if the Senator desires to know just what the fact is, I will state it.

Mr. CALL. I always like to know what you say the fact is.

Mr. DAWES. The State of Massachusetts adopted some twenty years ago an amendment to her constitution which provided that every person who became a voter from and after that date should be able to read and write, but especially providing that it should deprive no man already a voter of his right to vote, and then provided that every man at the expense of the State should have the means of learning how to read and write, so that every man if he chose to remain in ignorance did it voluntarily, and was not deprived by the law or the constitution of the right to vote, but deprived himself of it.

Mr. CALL. Well, now, Mr. President——

Mr. DAWES. It took no right to vote from anybody. It furnished everybody with the means of conforming to the provisions of its law, and then if he chose voluntarily himself to deprive himself of the right to vote he had no complaint to make.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, that won't do. The proposition which the Senator is denouncing the people of Virginia for is that they provide a capitation tax as a qualification for voting, and he says here Massachusetts only imposes a qualification that a man can get rid of if he chooses; it does not deprive him of any right. It withholds the right, and that is a deprival of it.

Mr. DAWES. Does a single word I have said about any capitation tax occur to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. CALL. Oh, well, the principle is the same thing. You have a limitation of intelligence.

Mr. DAWES. Have I said anything, I ask the Senator, about a capitation tax in any Southern State?

Mr. CALL. Oh, no; but you affirm the same principle; they are both a qualification. I said you allege that nobody is disfranchised, that there is no person who does not vote in the State of Massachusetts because of its disqualification.

Mr. DAWES. Let us have a clear understanding. If our Southern brother will see to it that everybody qualified by their laws to vote shall have a free ballot and a fair count, he will hear no word of complaint from me.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator what do you mean by a free ballot? Do you mean a ballot that is free to everybody because of manhood? If so, you have no right, as I said, to come here while you hold your own seat under a ballot that deprives your people by its qualification of the right to vote.

Mr. DAWES. I will not go back, but I will tell the Senator what I mean by a free ballot.

Mr. CALL. Let us come to the point. Do you mean free in respect of manhood suffrage, every adult male having the right to vote?

Mr. DAWES. I have answered what the Senator said about people being deprived of the ballot in Massachusetts, and I do not propose to answer that again.

Mr. CALL. You have not answered it.

Mr. DAWES. I will tell him what I mean by a free ballot. I hold that every State has a right to prescribe the qualifications of its voter within the Constitution of the United States; but having prescribed them, I insist, so far as I am concerned, and am in for that to the end, that a man who is a lawful voter by the laws of the State in which he lives and by the Constitution of the United States shall have a right to walk up to the ballot-box without fear and deposit his ballot, and it shall be counted, and nothing else counted.

Mr. CALL. That is all that you mean. You mean that he shall not be prevented by violence. If you mean that we are with you; and the ballot is freer in our States than it has been in Massachusetts. If your ballot was as free as ours you would have a democratic representation from the State of Massachusetts to-day. It is because of fear, the fear of starvation, the fear of disease, the fear of your great corporate capital, which is actively brought in, as you know, and as the philosophy and truth of the case demonstrate beyond a doubt, to prevent your Massachusetts adult males from voting as they desire. That is the reason why——

Mr. DAWES. If a single man entitled to the ballot in Massachusetts should have a straw laid across his path to the ballot-box the whole judiciary and executive power of the State would come down upon the offender.

Mr. CALL. Yes, and so it would in any State of the South. The fact is that in the South nobody ever seeks to interfere with the ballot by force or in any other way than by those persuasive arguments of reason, of kindness, and sympathy which exist in all societies. I brand it as a falsehood, without one particle of evidence. You may swear, and swear, and swear; but for one oath of a bad and perjured man I will bring you fifty of respectable republicans, and your instances, like that of the man you brought here the other day, will fade into disgraceful obscurity. They do not exist; they never did. But under the constitution of society in Massachusetts, a dense population, the money accumulated all upon one side and poverty upon the other, starvation and disease threatening the employé, with nothing but your splendid though cold charities for the feeble infant and the sick wife, everybody knows that the power of money coerces and controls the suffrage.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator speaks of the instance I alluded to the other day as fading into obscurity. I suppose it faded into obscurity just as the accusations and the evidence of violence in the Southern States fade into obscurity, because the authors of the acts of violence get up and say they never heard of them. The author, the inventor, the man under whose administration in the State of Mississippi a majority of 15,000 or 20,000 faded into the stillness of death, is the only man who never has heard of the instance I brought here.

Mr. CALL. When the honorable Senator from Massachusetts says that, he says it without evidence; but here stand the sworn oaths of a dozen respectable men from Massachusetts who have sworn that they have been intimidated by fear of starvation, by the power of employment, into voting against their principles. He knows that there are over a hundred thousand men in Massachusetts, adult and white intelligent males, who would constitute a majority against him and who are changed by the power of capital to bring him here. There is the proof. He asserts that about the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE,] but the evidence is here against him that he stands here by the suppression of a free ballot in the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Florida if he was ever in Massachusetts? Was he ever in New England?

Mr. CALL. Let us see——

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator answer the question? Was the Senator ever in New England?

Mr. CALL. Oh, yes, I have been in New England.

Mr. DAWES. Was he ever there on election day?

Mr. CALL. No. Were you ever in Mississippi on election day?

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. CALL. Tell me. Were you ever in Mississippi or Florida on election day?

Mr. DAWES. No, sir.

Mr. CALL. Then we stand even.

Mr. DAWES. No; I should not be very safe if I was there then.

Mr. CALL. I beg your pardon; if you are an honest man and true to what is right in New England and what is taught in your schools and your churches, you will be welcomed in Florida or in Mississippi; but if you are disloyal, treacherous, and false, if you are a conspirator against the public peace and the decency and good morals of society, alike in Massachusetts and in Mississippi and in Florida, you will not be welcomed.

Mr. DAWES. And do not vote the democratic ticket!

Mr. CALL. That is a question I suppose we have a right to decide ourselves.

Mr. DAWES. I want the Senator to allow me to say a word about what he calls the domination of wealth over the voter in Massachusetts.

Mr. CALL. Precisely; those are the words.

Mr. DAWES. He speaks of the splendid but cold charity of Massachusetts.

Mr. CALL. Of Massachusetts' benevolent institutions. Now, I do not mean any reflection on Massachusetts in that.

Mr. DAWES. Of Massachusetts' benevolent institutions; and yet he says he has been in Massachusetts. Sir, the charities of Massachusetts reach around the globe, and they are no respecter of persons. No man, woman, or child, the world over, in want, in suffering, in distress, whether it be from yellow fever in the southern country or starving for food in Ireland, or whatever it be, ever appealed in vain to the charity of Massachusetts. No man in Massachusetts with the right to vote according to her laws ever had the slightest restraint put upon him. Perhaps the Senator does not know that any voter in Massachusetts can seal up his ballot in an envelope furnished him by the State and put it into the ballot-box, and no mortal man can know how he votes until the envelope is unsealed and the ballot counted. There is no contrivance of law, no enactment of law, that wisdom or patriotism ever devised that Massachusetts does not gladly embrace and put in force to throw around the voter every safeguard that shall make him walk a sovereign to the ballot-box. There is not a man in Massachusetts entitled to vote who is not a sovereign on election day. The man who says that a single voter in Massachusetts was ever deprived of a free ballot by the influence of money, by the influence of corporate associated wealth, or anything else but his own crime or his own voluntary choice, states that which does not exist in Massachusetts; and I do not care who the man is, if he will come to Massachusetts and stay there long enough to know and will take cognizance of what his own eyes see and his own ears hear, he will be ashamed to go anywhere else and say that the voter in Massachusetts is deprived of a free ballot and an honest count.

Mr. CALL. The honorable gentleman says I shall be ashamed. I ask him if he does not know that a committee of the Senate have been into Massachusetts, and they have brought back the charge in their report. They state here:

A witness describes the process thus:

"My attention was called to the peculiar way they had of managing the voters there. I stepped up to the little railing that they had there to go around and up to the polls, and I saw two men stationed at the entrance where the voters went in. One was a Mr. Chase, and the other was a Mr. Knox. I saw that the help of the village (I was acquainted with a great portion of them) came along in a sort of rotation. Mr. Chase was on one side and this Mr. Knox was on the other."

Talk about a secret ballot!—

"and as each man came up they would take hold of the ticket that the man had, and say, 'That is right, pass on.' Another would come up, and they would say, 'That is right, pass on.' Another would come up, and they would say, 'Hold on, that is not the vote you want to cast.' 'Why, yes, it is the vote I want to cast.' 'No, it is not.' 'Why certainly this is my vote.' 'Oh, no;' and he got it out of the man's hand, tore it up, and threw it on the floor. He said, 'You do not want to vote such a damned vote as that.' He then handed the voter another one. The man then remarked, 'I don't want to cast this vote.' The reply was, 'Go right along; that is the vote you want.' The man went right along and put it in the box. Mr. Hastings, the constable, stood right opposite, and I stood, perhaps, four feet from this Mr. Knox."

Mr. HOAR. Was not that thoroughly contradicted by the democratic witnesses?

Mr. CALL. Wait a moment and I will let you come in.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator answer that question?

Mr. CALL. Another instance is given thus:

"Q. Who was at the polls to receive the employés in November last?

"A. Mr. Chase.

"Q. Is he connected with the corporation?

"A. He is the bookkeeper there.

"Q. Who takes them from the mills to the poll?

"A. The teams of the corporation take them.

"Q. What have you seen in regard to tickets when they have got to the polls?

"A. I have seen Mr. Chase change their tickets. He generally stands at one side there where there is a small place to go through, and as they come along he always has the ballots there, and I have seen him change them, and have seen them get tickets from him and carry them in.

"Q. The specific tickets you speak of, did they examine those?

"A. I do not know whether they could or not. Pretty nearly all of those who work there are French, and I do not know whether they could examine them.

"Q. Do you know whether those tickets were in envelopes or open?

"A. I have seen Mr. Chase give tickets to them that were open.

"Q. Did you see this occur in November, 1878?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Specify an instance and describe how this occurred, if you can.

"A. As they passed along he was standing there on this side, and as they would come up to the polls he would stop them, hand them one of the tickets, and say, 'Here, carry it in.' They might have had an envelope or something of that kind. I have seen them have envelopes. I have seen that occur."

The ballot-boxes were open boxes and those in charge could see the form and appearance of the ballot voted, and they were easily distinguishable apart.

Mr. HOAR. Now will the Senator permit me to say——

Several SENATORS, (to Mr. CALL.) Do not yield.

Mr. HOAR. I appeal to the courtesy of the Senator from Florida, not to gentlemen who sit in their seats expressing their opinion.

Mr. CALL. Yes, I will yield, if not too long.

Mr. HOAR. If it is inconvenient to the Senator, I shall not make the appeal again.

Mr. CALL. I have no objection, unless the Senator is going to talk a long time.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to say that the village concerning which that testimony is given is a village within ten or twelve miles of my own city. I know its people. I know that the democratic employés of that Manchaug corporation remain in its employ year in and year out and vote the democratic ticket as freely as the republican ticket; that if one agent or another agent happens to hold a town office or be on a committee, it is because it suits him to be, whether he is a republican or a democrat; and that evidence which the Senator from Florida has read was met, overthrown, disproved by abundant democratic testimony. I say what I said the other day, that if my friend from Florida will go down into the village of Manchaug and call together an audience of the democrats of that village and undertake to imply to them that any fear of loss of employment, of the face of man, ever affected them in their votes, they will laugh in his face.

I denounce that report, I do not care who made it, made by a democratic portion of a committee as a political report, made up for political purposes and contrary to the fact. If my friend from Florida will take the evidence on which that report is based, on both sides, read the report of my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] to the contrary, and look it over in his own room over night, I know he is too good a lawyer and too upright a man to come in here and reaffirm what he has read. It is a garbled extract of the evidence of one or two persons. You can find around every manufacturing village some fellow who will appear before a committee and testify in that way. The report of that committee is absolutely contrary to the evidence which they took. This same committee brought in before the Senate and made speeches based upon fraudulent documents which had been put before their hands knowing that they were fraudulent, which the Senate itself suppressed and ordered to be stricken out from the publication. It is an insult to any community to make such a charge.

Mr. CALL. I ask the honorable Senator why it is that you wish the patronage of the Government and the Senate to be so dispensed if men are not influenced in their political suffrage by fear or interest? Then I say that by all reason and argument it is obliged to be true that the employer in a great corporation with vast amounts of capital must hold a great influence and power over those people who live at his will and his pleasure. You cannot meet the proposition that starvation and pestilence are influential forces over the human mind.

Mr. HOAR. If my friend will allow me to answer his question, I desire to say to him that I suppose nine-tenths of the people of Massachusetts get their living by working in mills and factories. The legislation of the State, the policy of the State, the government of the State, the law which controls corporation and factory and factory owner is dependent upon their will, and anybody who would venture to use such influences upon the voters of Massachusetts would encounter a storm of indignation which would drive him and his party and his manufacturing property and his corporate rights in disgrace out of the State. The reason why property does not control labor in Massachusetts is because the arm of labor is a thousand-fold stronger than the whole aggregate force of capital, property, or factory ownership in that State. I could not go home to Worcester County if her mechanics and her mill operatives who are my neighbors and friends who sent me here, who agree with me in politics, should dream that I would undertake to constrain, or to defend the man who constrained their honest and free vote. Can the Senators from the South stand here and affirm that?

Mr. CALL. The Senators from the South can stand here and before the Senator from Massachusetts defy him upon the truth when they say that their elections are a thousand times freer and fairer than they are in his State.

I am amazed that the Senator from Massachusetts should undertake to maintain here, in view of all the experience of labor unions and of strikes, that capital has no power over labor; that it is not a conservative force. The proposition is too absurd for reason. The whole laboring people of the North protest against the crushing power of capital. It must be so. I am not denouncing it; I do not know but that it may be a just and a conservative influence when properly used; but you, gentlemen, do know that without the power of your great moneyed men and your corporations you could not hold control in the Northern States. My friend, [Mr. LOGAN,] who used to be so good a democrat, who stood upon the Constitution so fairly and squarely, (better than I did; I did not go with him in some of his views,) will soon have exhausted the animosities of the war; they will all be gone; and what would you do if the conservative powers of money, of your great corporations, of intelligence, of religion, did not qualify the mere force of numbers? Yet both the Senators from Massachusetts get up here in the face of the American people and assert that in Massachusetts with its qualification of intelligence and of residence for men of foreign birth, and payment of taxes, they believe the mere naked and absolute power of numbers is the great and controlling force of the country, without intelligence, without property, without capital. That is what they say. That will not do.

Mr. DAWES. Is the Senator through?

Mr. CALL. Oh, no, unless you want to move to adjourn.

Mr. RANSOM. That is what the Senator from Massachusetts wishes to do.

Mr. CALL. I have no objection to a motion to adjourn. I have something further to say, however.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to make a few remarks in connection with what the Senator has said.

Mr. CALL. I will yield for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to say something about the Senator's remarks on the malign influence of education, of wealth, of morals, and of religion in Massachusetts.

Mr. CALL. No, I do not want to yield for a speech unless the gentleman is very anxious to come in and say something right here. If he is I do not care to object particularly. I am not afraid of these propositions. I know the Senators from Massachusetts cannot meet them. I know every capitalist in Massachusetts to-day will read with astonishment the denial that there is any power of money over voters, any influence upon the electoral qualification, and the assertion that to be a rich man and the head of a great corporation does not give him any more influence in society than if he were a beggar in rags. I am willing for you to demonstrate the proposition that the beggar has just as much influence, just as much power as the great capitalist, Jay Gould, with his $100,000,000.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will allow me to say that it will be news in Massachusetts that any one vote has any greater power than any other vote.

Mr. CALL. You mean after it is in the ballot-box.

Mr. DAWES. The man who can assert that the influence of education, of religion, and of morals in Massachusetts upon the voter is a malign influence, seems to me to be past all cure. Massachusetts does two things: she brings her laws within the reach of every man in the State; she throws them alike around all. She then declares by her laws that every operative in every factory shall be secure in an education furnished that operative by the State free of cost; and any man who deprives an operative during the years of school age of the opportunity of obtaining such an education as will enable him to act his part with intelligence in this world is indictable for it. Any man who employs the poorest and the humblest individual in the State without allowing him or her to have a school education during that time, furnished by the State, is indictable for it and may be imprisoned for it. The operatives hold the power in Massachusetts, and it is because they wield it so wisely, because they are intelligent, because they are moral, because they are religious, and because by this means they gather together around their homes competence and comfort and intelligence and influence.

Sir, it is a libel upon the voter in Massachusetts to say that there is any power this side of God himself that can control him to cast his vote differently from his honest and intelligent conviction. No man can say it in Massachusetts and live politically an hour. No man asserts it in Massachusetts who has any political influence or who dare pretend to ordinary intelligence and common honesty. Men must live five hundred miles from there who have intelligence and ought to have honesty before they assert with impunity any such allegation as that against the free, honest, intelligent, and upright, humble though he may possibly be, voter in Massachusetts. There is not one so humble that he is not a sovereign, proud of his sovereignty, and on the day of election he walks side by side with the proudest and the richest and deposits his ballot, knowing that on that day the law and the constitution of Massachusetts are no respecters of persons.

Mr. CALL. I want to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question right there. I ask him if a colored man, a citizen of my State, who is a voter there, shall go into Massachusetts, and if he cannot read and write, would he be entitled to suffrage?

Mr. DAWES. If he has common intelligence, and knows the value of the institutions of Massachusetts, he will not sleep a night before he will take hold of her opportunities held out to him to be a voter there.

Mr. CALL. Then you admit he cannot vote?

Mr. DAWES. I want to ask the Senator from Florida, in all kindness, if the man who from the lap-stone works his way up by degrees to the second highest office in the gift of this nation, who had hardly property enough to bury him when he was dead, who commanded more influence among the voters of Massachusetts in his time than any other man within her borders, and who wielded it, enlightened as he was by his own experience to help the poor and the humble to be like him efficient, influential, honest and honored men in the community, could ever have accomplished all that if what the Senator from Florida now says is true? He lived among the corporations, he lived within a stone's throw almost of Lowell and of Lawrence, and of the seats of all those large corporations; he moved in and out among their operatives, and among their overseers, and among their owners. He was a king among them all. He had no money, and when he began he had no education, he had nothing but that which was common to all the voters in Massachusetts—brain, energy, honesty, and that opportunity which Massachusetts guarantees to every living soul within her borders.

Mr. CALL. I had expected that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts would have made just the remarkable speech he has made. He tells us that there are no people in Massachusetts who cannot read and write; there are no poor people there; disease and the ills that man is heir to do not exist in that happy Commonwealth. Sir, I wish to go further than the Senator in his love and appreciation of the honest laboring man in this country. He, his wife, and his children, and his interests are dear to me, but it is no evidence because a great man rose as they rise continually from the poor and the humble to the high places of government, that a man who cannot read and write (which was the question I asked the Senator) can or cannot vote. We know that he cannot vote in Massachusetts. We know that hardship and poverty and labor confine and press down some of the noblest spirits and the kindest and best of men. I say that when the Senators from Massachusetts come here and strike hands with the Senator from Virginia upon the ground that they are for a free ballot when in Massachusetts there is no free ballot, and inaugurate a crusade against those people where there is a free ballot, upon false charges which this coalition have made of murder, assassination, and crime upon a whole people, they cannot make the record right or justify themselves in reason and in argument upon that proposition.

Mr. President, I want to discuss this subject further. I have been greatly interrupted, but I do not object to that. I desire to submit some remarks upon this general subject. Whatever I say I shall say in kindness. I propose to justify my action here, I propose to demonstrate and I shall demonstrate by incontestible proof that the charges which have been made of a ballot not free and a count not fair are false.

Mr. FARLEY. Will the Senator yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. CALL. Go ahead.

Mr. FARLEY. This debate seems to have changed the condition of things on the floor of the Senate. It has changed from the defense of the South to the defense of Massachusetts. I hope that both sides will have an opportunity to be heard; and as the South has attempted to defend itself and I come from the North myself, I want Massachusetts to have a fair show. If she can remove the charges that have been made against her, I hope she will have an opportunity of doing so. I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. I hope not.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator withdraw that motion one moment? Then he can renew it. I merely want to ask the Senator from Florida a question, if he will permit me; he is not now speaking.

Mr. FARLEY. Certainly; I withdraw the motion.

Mr. HOAR. I want to ask the honorable Senator from Florida if he has read the minority report of the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. BLAIR.]

Mr. CALL. I have, and I think it is an admirable report in many respects.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to ask him if he observed the statement that the witnesses on whose statements rests this extraordinary charge against the people of Manchaug, which he has restated, were two persons who had fled from Connecticut to escape State's prison, and escaped it by a mere flaw in the indictment? I ask whether he knew that?

Mr. CALL. I have known many a good man who ran away to keep out of State's prison. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOAR. Let me put this seriously. My question to the Senator from Florida is this: I wish to know if, when he made this charge against the people of Manchaug, he knew that the evidence on which it rested was that of two fellows who had run away from State's prison, and that it was contradicted by a large number of leading democrats of the place? I ask the Senator whether he knew that?

Mr. CALL. I will answer the honorable Senator. In the first place, I have made no charge against the people of Manchaug.

Mr. HOAR. If you do not make the charge, it is all right.

Mr. CALL. I say that men who possess property and influence everywhere exercise the influence and weight of that property in the control directly and indirectly of the suffrage. I say, furthermore, that I have read the report of the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. BLAIR,] but that I had not noticed, nor do I now know except from the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, the particular character of these witnesses; but I do say that I think the Senator will find abundance of other evidence, and of a man who has been honored, a man of great intellect and power in his State, and whom it took a combination of all the corporations, democratic and republican, to defeat.

Mr. HOAR. Who was that?

Mr. CALL. Benjamin F. Butler. He has not run away to keep out of State's prison yet; and he brings some powerful evidence upon this subject.

Mr. HOAR. If I have any controversy with General Butler anywhere, I should rather not have it in his absence, and he is abundantly able to take care of himself at home. I do not think it is quite desirable that he should be drawn into the discussion.

Mr. CALL. I agree with the Senator in that.

Mr. HOAR. It would not be manly for me to be drawn into a discussion with General Butler here, as I should have to be driven into it, which I do not propose to be. If I have any criticism to make on him, I will make it in Massachusetts, and he will be likely to make a reply, as everybody knows he is able to do. But I wish to say that the evidence which was furnished, which it was said was furnished by that gentleman to this committee, is the evidence which with the consent of its chairman the Senate itself ordered to be struck out of this document as fraudulent.

Mr. DAWES. As the Senator from California does not renew his motion, I think I will make a motion myself.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to a motion which I desire to make?

Mr. DAWES. It depends upon what it is.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I am satisfied that the Senate should adjourn over to-morrow and Saturday; and I think that the quieting influences of Sunday may have some good effect on our friends on the other side of the Chamber. I therefore move to adjourn until Monday at twelve o'clock.

Mr. FARLEY. I hope that motion will not prevail.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Let our friends come here to-morrow and go into executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURNSIDE.]

Mr. CALL. Before that motion is put I should like to have incorporated in the RECORD the electoral qualifications of the constitution of the State of Massachusetts. They are as follows:

ART. XX. No person shall have the right to vote, or be eligible to office under the constitution of this Commonwealth, who shall not be able to read the constitution in the English language, and write his name: Provided, however, That the provisions of this amendment shall not apply to any person prevented by a physical disability from complying with its requisitions, nor to any person who now has the right to vote, nor to any persons who shall be sixty years of age or upward at the time this amendment shall take effect.

ART. XXIII. No person of foreign birth shall be entitled to vote, or shall be eligible to office, unless he shall have resided within the jurisdiction of the United States for two years subsequent to his naturalization, and shall be otherwise qualified according to the constitution and laws of this Commonwealth: Provided, That this amendment shall not affect the rights which any person of foreign birth possessed at the time of the adoption thereof: And provided further, That it shall not affect the rights of any child of a citizen of the United States born during the temporary absence of the parents therefrom.

Mr. FARLEY. Mr. President, it strikes me——

Mr. DAWES. I have no objection to taking the sense of the Senate upon the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. FARLEY. I have been recognized by the Chair, but, unfortunately, the two Senators from Massachusetts seem to think that they have a right to monopolize this entire discussion. If a motion is made and a Senator is trying to give the reasons why the motion ought not to prevail, he is immediately interrupted by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts.

I suggest that on to-morrow, Friday, and on Saturday we can consider some executive business that is important to be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. FARLEY. A motion to adjourn to a day certain surely is debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not under the rules.

Mr. FARLEY. I do not understand that any point of order has been made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is not debatable unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I make no point of order.

Mr. FARLEY. I want to say this: I appeal to my colleague and his friends on that side of the Chamber to assist me in getting into executive session to consider matters pertaining to the interests of our people on the Pacific coast; and you, gentlemen, who are anxious to consider this question of the election of officers, give us to-morrow and next day to consider the treaties that are lying on the table of the Secretary of the Senate, and then renew your contest for the election of officers.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, just stay here ten minutes and adopt this resolution, and then I will agree to it.

Mr. FARLEY. That has become monotonous; that has been the facetious remark of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. DAWES. It seems to be.

Mr. FARLEY. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. DAWES. You are right.

Mr. FARLEY. That has been the cry from that side of the Chamber for the past two weeks. It must have become apparent, and I think has become apparent, to every Senator on this floor that that resolution will not be considered.

Mr. DAWES. Then, Mr. President, I am afraid the Senator will not get his matters considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island, that the Senate do now adjourn until Monday next at twelve o'clock.

Mr. PENDLETON. We may as well have the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this and all other questions with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] If I were allowed to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SLATER, (when Mr. GROVER'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. GROVER] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. INGALLS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.]

Mr. PLATT, of Connecticut, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] unless my vote should be needed to make a quorum. If it be, I shall vote.

Mr. ROLLINS, (when his named was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HAWLEY. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. JACKSON.]

Mr. PLATT, of Connecticut. I understand that a quorum has not voted.

Mr. ROLLINS. I inquire if there is a quorum?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed by the Secretary that as yet there is not a quorum voting.

Mr. ROLLINS. I vote "yea." I reserved that right.

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—23.

Allison,	Dawes,	Kellogg,	Morrill,
Anthony,	Edgerton,	McDill,	Platt of N. Y.,
Blair,	Ferry,	McMillan,	Rollins,
Burnside,	Frye,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	Miller,	Sherman.
Conger,	Hoar,	Mitchell,

NAYS—16.

Bayard,	Coke,	Hampton,	Pendleton,
Brown,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Call,	Gorman,	Lamar,	Saulsbury,
Cockrell,	Groome,	Morgan,	Slater.

ABSENT—37.

Beck,	George,	Jones of Florida,	Teller,

Edmunds,	Hill of Georgia,	Plumb,	Williams.
Fair,	Ingalls,	Pugh,
Farley,	Jackson,	Saunders,
Garland,	Johnston,	Sewell,

So the motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and thirty-eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday next at twelve o'clock, noon.

MONDAY, April 11, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of the last day's session of the Senate, being the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] providing for the election of certain officers of the Senate, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone the resolution indefinitely, on which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. In the absence of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I believe that is what we ought to do, and I hope that is what we will do.

Mr. DAWES. When the Senate adjourned on Thursday the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] had the floor. Does the Senator from Florida yield the floor?

Mr. CALL. I yield that the Senator from West Virginia may make the motion he has just made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield the floor?

Mr. CALL. For the purpose of the motion of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. DAWES. Can the Senator yield for a particular purpose?

Mr. FERRY. I think that cannot be done. The Senator must either retain the floor, or if he yields it he yields altogether.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. The Senator from Florida can get the floor when he wants it. There will be no trouble about that. Senators need not trouble themselves about that, I say to my friends.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida yields the floor to the Senator from West Virginia, who moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. He yields for all purposes.

Mr. DAWES. I did not suppose there would be any trouble about it. I wished to see if the Senator from West Virginia really wanted to go into executive session. The Senator discloses that this is only a by-play for some purpose. I trust that the regular business of the Senate will not be thrust aside by any such sort of performance as that on the part of the Senator from West Virginia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Debate is not in order.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator from West Virginia really wants business done, let the Senator address himself to the matter before the Senate. If the Senator from West Virginia——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts is not in order. The motion of the Senator from West Virginia is that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business, which motion is not debatable.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRIS. I call the Senator from Massachusetts to order.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from West Virginia is not in order if the Senator from Florida retains the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida has yielded the floor.

Mr. DAWES. Very well; that was all I wanted to know.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The motion seems to be carried.

Mr. DAWES. I ask for a division.

Mr. FERRY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY, (when his name was called.) I am paired to-day on political questions with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.] I should vote "nay" if he were here.

Mr. CAMDEN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.]

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, rose when his name was called.

Mr. BLAIR. I voted.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I notice that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] is present, but the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is not here, and I will announce a pair with him unless he should come in before the roll-call is concluded.

Mr. FRYE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.]

Mr. GORMAN, (when Mr. GROOME'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. GROOME] is paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.]

Mr. HARRIS, (when his name was called.) I agreed to pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] who is absent. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] is also absent, and I transfer the pair with the Senator from New York to the Senator from Indiana, and I announce the fact for the day. I vote "yea."

Mr. JACKSON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.]

Mr. JONAS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. EDGERTON.] If he were here I should vote "yea."

Mr. VEST, (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Florida, was called.) I was requested to announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. ROLLINS.]

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. COKE, (when Mr. MAXEY'S name was called.) I desire to announce for the day that my colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.] If my colleague were here he would vote "yea."

Mr. MITCHELL, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.]

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Mr. SHERMAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] for this week. I announce the pair now so that there will be no occasion to announce it hereafter this week.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MCMILLAN. My colleague [Mr. EDGERTON] has been called away from the city for a day or two, and is paired with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. JONAS,] as the latter has stated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to announce that I have been for a long time paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND,] who I believe is absent. As I have been absent until now, of course the pair will continue, and I announce it once for all. It may be that the Senator from Arkansas, as he had a right to do, has transferred the pair to some other gentleman. If so, it operates the same. I regard my pair with the Senator from Arkansas or any other gentleman to whom he may have transferred it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I will state to the Senator from Vermont that I understand the Senator from Arkansas has gone home with the understanding that he is paired with the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Undoubtedly; it will stay so.

Mr. HARRIS. He told me so distinctly, I will state to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. FERRY. I should like to state in that connection that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] paired with me on a particular question of executive business. I do not know whether he expected the pair to extend any further, but on that question I am paired with him and stand paired. I suppose it does not apply any further; I so understand it.

Mr. WALKER. On general questions my colleague [Mr. GARLAND] left a written statement that he is paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] On the matter of executive business referred to by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] my colleague is paired with that Senator.

Mr. SEWELL, (after having voted in the negative.) I desire to withdraw my vote. I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. MCPHERSON.]

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Beck,	Farley,	Harris,	Slater,
Brown,	George,	Johnston,	Vance
Butler	Gorman,	Morgan,	Vest,
Call,	Grover,	Pendleton,	Walker.

So the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

Mr. DAWES. I regret that the Senator from Florida should give over the regular business of the day. I hope now that the Senator will not object to proceeding to the business before the Senate; I hope there will be a vote upon the question before the Senate and let us determine it as we may, let the majority be as it may, I trust that we shall proceed with the business of the Senate and consume no more time. I shall listen with pleasure to the Senator from Florida to-day; but as he seems to have lost interest in the matter and has given way for the dilatory motion of the Senator from West Virginia, I hope now nothing will be in the way but that we may proceed. I ask for a vote upon the pending question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] that the resolution be indefinitely postponed, on which the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] has the floor.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the Senator to yield just one moment.

Mr. CALL. I yield for a moment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. When there are several hundred nominations of the President pending before us ready for action, I am rather suprised to hear the Senator from Massachusetts say when a motion is made to go into executive session for the purpose of doing the business that we were called here to transact that it is a dilatory motion. That Senator certainly has lost that business sense which he is generally credited with having when he says that a motion to go into executive session is a dilatory motion, with several hundred nominations pending here ready for confirmation or ready for action in some form or other. I hardly think the Senator from Massachusetts meant what he said when he called a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business a dilatory motion.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. CALL. For a moment only. I desire to go on in a moment with my remarks.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will indulge me a moment, it is because the Senator from West Virginia is confused as to the way to get at the business that I speak. I realize quite as much as that Senator the necessity of getting at the business in executive session. There are a great many nominations there pending and the public service is suffering because of the persistency of Senators in interrupting the regular public business and preventing our reaching the business in which we are ultimately to be engaged. The Senator from West Virginia made the motion knowing full well that it would consume without avail just so much time that ought to have been devoted to the pending business in order that we might reach that which is before us. Has the Senator's experience here taught him nothing? Does he not know that the only way to reach the public business is to clear out that which is before it? Does the Senator propose to go round in front and put his head against that which it is necessary to do before we go at the public business? The Senator cannot be in earnest when he says he wants to proceed to the business in executive session, while he refuses to go to work and do that which lies before it. I hope the Senator will re-examine his own situation and come to a clearer understanding of the obstruction which he is throwing in the way of public business.

THE COALITION HAS NO COMMON GROUND OF OPINION.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, on Thursday last when the Senate adjourned I had affirmed that there was no common and real ground of opinion in the coalition which has been formed between the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] and the republican Senators here; that the members of the coalition of the republican party have always opposed a free ballot and a fair count; that the Senators of the coalition themselves hold their seats here under State laws in the Northern States which deny a free ballot, and that in their own States they justify and defend these laws.

I affirmed that the capitation tax, which the Senator from Virginia made in his speech here the point of his departure from and his opposition to the democratic party of Virginia, is the law of several of the Northern States whose republican Senators are in this coalition for an alleged free ballot; that Mr. KELLOGG, of Louisiana, a prominent member of the coalition standing on the right hand of the Senator from Virginia, and one of his main supports, has always opposed a free ballot, and is here by virtue of a device which denied "a free ballot and a fair count" to the people of Louisiana by a returning board supported by military force; that the republican Senators from Ohio and Massachusetts and other States have sustained the denial of a free ballot to the Southern States and have sustained the disfranchisement of that class of the southern people in whom was the intelligence and the wealth and the property of that country, both directly and indirectly, both by the device of false counts by returning boards which made and unmade votes in the will and discretion of its members and by preventing a free ballot with military force. I affirmed that the Senators from Massachusetts are here members of a coalition for an alleged free ballot, and that they hold their seats here under State laws which deny a free ballot to more than one hundred thousand adult males who cannot vote because of a suffrage capitation tax and an intelligence qualification of reading and writing the English language, even though the citizen is a highly educated person of foreign birth, and he was under a qualification of two years' residence in addition to the period of naturalization. I asked the attention of the Senate and the country to the fact that while holding their seats here under laws which deny a free ballot to more than one hundred thousand adult males the Senators from Massachusetts at the same time declare that they are opposed to the readjustment or non-debt-paying views of the Senator from Virginia, which is the alleged reason for which he left the democratic party of Virginia; and that they also oppose his suffrage-capitation-tax theory, the only point on which he claims ever to have differed with the democratic party of Virginia respecting a free ballot. Yet they join in a coalition with him for "a free ballot and a fair count" which is denied by the laws of their own State, and which, upon the principles which their laws affirm, cannot prevail.

MASSACHUSETTS LAWS DENY A FREE BALLOT.

I propose further to examine this subject in respect to the Northern States: First, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] denied on Thursday that more than one hundred thousand males in Massachusetts were deprived of a free ballot, and he denied that any large number of persons were deprived of the ballot in Massachusetts. I stated then that I would prove it, and I now propose to do so; but before doing so let us define with some degree of accuracy the meaning of "a free ballot." It must mean either a ballot free from all limitations of law, or it must mean a free ballot in the sense of the voter being free to cast it as he pleases, without fear, favor, or affection for, of, or on account of any person, and free from all motives of interest. If the term means anything it must mean one of these things.

The Senators from Massachusetts are in favor of "a free ballot." How free is it in the State of Massachusetts in respect to limitations of law, in respect to the actual number of people who cannot vote and do not vote there? The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] says everybody can vote there. If a colored man goes there from Florida where he has been voting, he has the privilege of learning to read the English language and of paying a capitation tax, and then he can vote. If an educated person of foreign birth, learned in all the lore of the ages, goes there, he has the privilege of learning to read the English language and of paying his capitation tax, and then after staying two years beyond his naturalization under the laws of the United States, he may vote.

This is the "free ballot" of Massachusetts which justifies the Senator holding his seat here under it in stopping the public business which the Constitution requires to be done by the Senate, in order that he may give the patronage of the Senate toward making the ballot free in Virginia, where both black and white, native and foreign born, can vote without any of these limitations except a suffrage capitation tax.

But here is the evidence on the point on which the learned Senator denied my statement on Thursday. I have two witnesses, neither of whom have run away to escape State's prison, one of whom, Hon. George B. Loring, was a member of the last Congress from the sixth district of Massachusetts, the other the contestant, Hon. E. M. Boynton, both republicans, and with their statements is a great mass of evidence taken and sworn to in respect both to the way in which they may have "a free ballot" in Massachusetts and also the way in which they have "a fair count," or, in the words of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] the way in which they lay straws across the voter's path in Massachusetts and how they punish men for it.

The distinguished member of Congress, a man of great intellect, deservedly standing high throughout the country, Hon. George B. Loring, says upon the point of the number of disfranchised persons:

> Taking his figures, namely, 134,256, and of that number, according to his tables, 86,258 are aliens and therefore not citizens. Now, add to this last the number of paupers, idiots, criminals, and insane, namely, 9,271, and we have 95,529 disqualified for the above reasons, leaving 38,727 to be otherwise accounted for. Of these 14,691 naturalized citizens and 3,437 natives, or only 18,128, are disqualified for illiteracy.

There is an admission that the whole of this vast number of people are disqualified for one reason or another, but it needs no admission upon the subject; it is well known; and I was surprised that the honorable Senator should have hesitated to admit the fact that in Massachusetts, under her suffrage laws of qualification, her capitation suffrage tax, which the Senator from Virginia makes the express point of his departure from the democracy of the State of Virginia, there are more than 130,000 (by a calculation which is impregnable on the returns of that State) disfranchised adult males in the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. President, how can gentlemen talk here about "a free ballot" when by the laws of their State the ballot is subject to this qualification? The contestant, Mr. Boynton—and this is the report of the minority of the committee in the other House of Congress sustained by the facts in the case—says:

That of the 376,501 citizens of the United States made so by the fourteenth amendment, (allowing that 4 per cent. of the total vote of the State remained away from the polls,) 136,859 were disfranchised from other causes than criminality, idiocy, and insanity, the causes being what are known as "illiteracy," failure to pay a tax, and pauperism.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] the other day engaged in a very tragic recitation here of the laws of the Southern States in regard to the colored population made soon after the surrender, when in regard to those poor people who had never had charge of themselves nor had to provide for their wants there was some necessity for such legislation as would enable them to be protected against want and starvation; and yet I find what I shall read in the laws of Massachusetts; and I ask gentlemen with what candor, with what truth, with what justice can they come into the Senate and inveigh in such declamation against the people of the country, exciting animosity and strife where peace and friendship exist, when we turn to the laws of their States and find even upon the suffrage question in Massachusetts a law of this description? I am not assailing the State of Massachusetts; I honor and respect her and her great history, but I insist that her Senators may not come with justice upon the floor of the Senate and in defiance of the very provisions of her own laws in regard to their own people assail the people of the South for laws which are not as severe, which upon the suffrage question are vastly more liberal. I read here:

By chapter 109, section 9 of the general laws of Massachusetts, when any person, by excessive drinking, gaming, idleness, debauchery of any kind, so spends, wastes, or lessens his estate as to expose himself or his family, the mayor and aldermen, or the selectmen of the city or town of which such spendthrift is an inhabitant or resident, or upon which he is or may become chargeable, may present a complaint and have him put under guardianship, according to the provisions of that chapter.

When he gets to be under guardianship he does not vote.

Mr. HOAR, (in his seat.) Where do you get that?

Mr. CALL. I get that in this report. Let us see if it is not so. Perhaps I may have misread it; I will not be positive about that. But I say this about it: you cannot find any law, anywhere in any Southern State, putting men under guardianship. It may be a very good law; I do not pretend to say it is not; I am not assailing your laws. I am assailing you because, taking your own laws, you are condemned in the attitude you occupy toward us.

Mr. HOAR. I ought to beg pardon of the Senator from Florida for making such an exclamation from my seat.

Mr. CALL. Not at all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida consent to be interrupted?

Mr. CALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator is commenting upon a law providing that after persons have shown an utter incapacity to take charge of their property they may be put under guardianship as spendthrifts; and I suppose the court of chancery has such power in England, if I am not mistaken, independent of statute. But, however that may be, the Senator added that persons put under guardianship for that purpose could not vote. I denied it by an exclamation in my seat. In that I was mistaken.

Mr. CALL. Let us see:

By section 1, chapter 376 of the law of 1874, every male citizen twenty-one years of age and upward (except paupers, persons under guardianship, and persons excluded by "article 20 of the amendments to the constitution) who has resided in the State one year, and within the city or town in which he claims a right to vote six months next preceding any election of city, town, county, or State officers, or of Representatives to Congress, or electors of President and Vice-President, and who has paid by himself, his parent, master, or guardian, a State or county tax, assessed upon him in this State within two years next preceding such election, and every citizen exempted from taxation, but otherwise qualified, shall have a right to vote in all such elections; and no other person shall have such right to vote."

The honorable Senator can explain that; I am not very familiar with the laws of Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I will explain it in the most frank possible manner by repeating what I have already stated, that I was entirely mistaken.

Mr. CALL. Here it is. I apprehend——

Mr. HOAR. My honorable friend, I think, does not understand me. I say I make the explanation by saying I was entirely mistaken. I had forgotten that spendthrifts under guardianship could not vote in Massachusetts. The Senator is right.

Mr. CALL. Then it appears that while in the Southern States a conviction for crime is required, in the State of Massachusetts, whose Senators want a "free ballot," in the discretion of the mayor and selectmen any man can be put under guardianship and disqualified from suffrage——

Mr. HOAR. No, sir; the Senator is a little mistaken there now; and as I have confessed my mistake——

Mr. CALL. Without conviction of crime.

Mr. HOAR. The person who is put under guardianship as a spendthrift is not put under guardianship in the discretion of selectmen, mayor, and aldermen. They, in the first place, are the persons who have the right to make the application.

Mr. CALL. They make complaint to the court?

Mr. HOAR. The application is made to the court of probate with the right of appeal to the supreme court of the State. I do not suppose that ever in a single year a dozen persons were put under guardianship. It is a provision for persons who, without being absolutely insane, are actually incapable of managing their property. It is only done in cases where persons have property which they are wasting. Does the Senator undertake to make a comparison between such a provision as that, which does not affect a dozen persons a year, and the turning cannon on voters at election day, or provisions by which large masses of voters may be sold into slavery practically, or practically disfranchised because of their poverty? Does he mean to give the weight of his honorable personal character to the affirmation that in the Southern States those laws were devised for any purpose akin to the spendthrift laws of the Northern States?

Mr. CALL. Well, I have presented here the fact that about 130,000 adult white male people, by the statement of Dr. Loring and Mr. Boynton and Gen. B. F. Butler and others, are disfranchised under laws for a capitation tax, requiring the intelligence qualification of reading and writing the English language, and for putting men under guardianship, not for crime, but for vice less than crime. The Senator asks me, in the face of this admitted record of 139,000 adult male disfranchised citizens that he cannot deny, about training a cannon on voters to keep them from voting!

Mr. HOAR. Where does the Senator get that number of 139,000 adult males deprived of the right of voting?

Mr. CALL. Let us see. I will read it again.

Mr. HOAR. What is the whole vote of Massachusetts?

Mr. CALL. Let us see.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator has included in that every man of foreign birth who is not naturalized, of which class we have a larger number in proportion than almost any other State in the Union. I think he will find that he has included both sexes, all ages, and all persons not naturalized.

Mr. CALL. In your interpretation of "a free ballot," do you not include all ages and both sexes?

Mr. HOAR. The honorable Senator when he rises and affirms that he finds in Dr. Loring's speech an admission that 139,000——

Mr. CALL. No, I did not say——

Mr. HOAR. Allow me—that 139,000 adult males are affected by that provision, I call his attention to the fact that he must be mistaken in that. He does not mean to turn that off by a gibe or a jest. The Senator does not want to say that, if it is not true; I know him too well for that.

Mr. CALL. Not at all.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator should find out that that provision did not affect 10,000 persons who would otherwise have the right to vote, and should further find out that those 10,000 being required to live a year in the State before they can vote, which has been an old provision, and there is an abundant opportunity for them to learn to read and write in that year, he would come out and make that correction instantly, would he not?

Mr. CALL. Now, let us see——

Mr. HOAR. He would not tell a comic almanac story or make a joke founded on such a mistake.

[A message in writing was received from the President of the United States by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.]

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. I admitted instantly and frankly and fully when I made a mistake about the constitution of my own State and gave the Senator the full advantage of the correction. Now the Senator, I know, will do the same thing.

Mr. CALL. When I find out that I am wrong, I will with a great deal of pleasure acknowledge it; but let us see. I did not say that Dr. Loring said there were 139,000——

Mr. HOAR. Will not the Senator look and see if he is not wrong and find out that he is wrong and admit it?

Mr. CALL. I will not concede it by any means. I did not say that Dr. Loring said there were 139,000. I said Dr. Loring admitted that there were large numbers of disfranchised people. Then I proceeded and took up the minority report and I will go a little further now. The minority report of Mr. Weaver states the facts as follows, and here is the calculation taken I believe from General Butler's brief on the subject:

Now, the population of Massachusetts in 1870 was 1,457,352 by the United States census. The whole population by the census of 1875 was 1,651,652, making an increase of 194,300, or thirteen and thirty-three one hundredths (13.33) percentage of gain. Assuming that the percentage of increase of population from May, 1875, to November, 1878, was the same as it was from 1870 to 1875, (in the proportion of the lengths of the two periods of time covered by these dates,) although in fact the gain would be considerably greater, and that there would be a corresponding increase in the number of ratable polls, of voters, and of each of the prohibited classes, we have the following table, showing first the statistics under these several heads, as reported in the Massachusetts census for 1875, and secondly the estimated gain of each class up to November, 1878, (three and a half years,) on a calculated increase of 9 per cent. for that period.

Mr. HOAR. Where are the 139,000 adult males? That is what we are looking for.

Mr. CALL. "Ratable polls, i. e., males above twenty years, 449,686." I have the brief itself.

Mr. DAWES. You will find it in Butler's brief; but suppose the Senator adds that a democratic House and a democratic committee——

Mr. CALL. You admit it.

Mr. DAWES. We all admit that it is in Butler's brief.

Mr. CALL. You asked to have the state of facts.

Mr. DAWES. You will find it stated just so in Butler's brief; no doubt about that.

Mr. CALL. Let me continue to read from this report:

From this table may be deduced the following startling facts:

That of the 376,501 citizens of the United States, made so by the fourteenth amendment, (allowing that 4 per cent. of the total vote of the State remained away from the polls,) 136,859 were disfranchised from other causes than criminality, idiocy, and insanity, the causes being what are known as "illiteracy," failure to pay a tax, and pauperism.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me now?

Mr. CALL. Yes.

Mr. DAWES. He has read that calculation——

Mr. CALL. Wait a moment.

By section 1, chapter 376 of the law of 1874, every male citizen twenty-one years of age and upward (except paupers, persons under guardianship, and persons excluded by "article 20 of the amendments to the constitution) who has resided in the State one year, and within the city or town in which he claims a right to vote six months next preceding any election of city, town, county, or State officers, or of Representatives to Congress, or electors of President and Vice-President, and who has paid by himself, his parent, master, or guardian, a State or county tax, assessed upon him in this State within two years next preceding such election, and every citizen exempted from taxation, but otherwise qualified, shall have a right to vote in all such elections; and no other person shall have such right to vote."

Thus it will be seen that, by the constitution and laws of Massachusetts, 105,109 persons are disfranchised, in contravention of the first section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. DAWES. Now, if the Senator will allow me, General Butler was hired to make a brief in an election case, and he made it in this way: he found a certain number of votes cast and a certain number of voters in a given year; he then calculated what would be the increase in three or four years up to the day of this election; then he found that on that year there were not cast in Massachusetts so many votes as there were in the year in which he made his calculation by one hundred and odd thousand. He then says that one hundred and odd thousand were disfranchised because of this amendment. This constitutional provision had been in force for twenty years before, and it never disfranchised in the world a man who was already a voter. So absurd was this calculation that a democratic committee, every one of the committee but one greenbacker, reported against him; and so absurd was the ground that the greenback contestant of Dr. Loring could not get the yeas and nays in the House, a democratic House, in support of it, and the House would not pay General Butler for making this brief; and the whole State of Massachusetts, including the democrats and the few greenbackers we have there, so laughed at the report and at the calculation that they never dared repeat it in the State.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts now if he thinks it fair, after he got up to make a suggestion, to make a speech? After I am done I shall be glad to hear him.

Mr. DAWES. If you will allow me here to add just a word——

Mr. CALL. I shall be glad to correct anything; but not to yield for an argument or a speech.

Mr. DAWES. I thought I ought to put in a reply to this statement.

Mr. CALL. I want to give another piece of information. The honorable Senators from Massachusetts denied on Thursday last and have denied here this morning that there were 100,000 or 139,000 adult males in the State of Massachusetts who were disfranchised and could not vote because of the State suffrage qualifications of Massachusetts. I say so far from the statement being absurd the Senators from Massachusetts cannot dispute a single instance or part of the argument in the report before me which demonstrates by comparison with the census, the result that between 130,000 and 140,000 adult males are disfranchised in Massachusetts. That is clear, and they cannot get rid of the fact.

But what does another distinguished citizen of Massachusetts who has not run away from the State prison say on the floor of the House, Hon. Eben Moody Boynton, contestant from the sixth district of Massachusetts:

I speak advisedly when I say that one-third of the citizens of Massachusetts are disfranchised, taking into consideration the votes in the last election. At that election, in New Hampshire, with as large a proportion of her people laboring in manufacturing towns and cities, such as Nashua and Manchester, adjoining Lowell, Massachusetts, the voters were as 1 in 4.15 of the population, while in Massachusetts they were as 1 in 6.35.

He puts the number at 130,000 in Massachusetts in the election of 1880 who were deprived of the ballot. What more does he say? Here we have a law of guardianship which deprives a man of his vote because he is a spendthrift and gets drunk and may at some time waste his estate. We have a law in the South which disfranchises a man when convicted of crime, and yet we must have a crusade of terror and force for "a free ballot." A man who can vote in Florida cannot vote in Massachusetts; yet the Senators must have a crusade for "a free ballot." Now let us see what Mr. Boynton says further on that subject. He says, and it is so stated in the minority report, as to the straws which they throw across the path of voters in Massachusetts:

A FAIR COUNT DENIED IN MASSACHUSETTS.

While a hundred of my nearest republican neighbors voted for me, comprising the most liberal and intelligent, yet office-seekers and some of the later converts, small and bitter politicians, turned fiercely upon me, because they said if I followed my conscience in voting I was assisting to destroy the republican party. Therefore you find that sad, that shameful testimony with regard to MacNamara and others of my neighbors disfranchised, and one of them thought himself given the option of a dungeon or a vote for the candidates of my opponents. The first signer of the Declaration of Independence lived in sight of where this deed was done. I should be untrue to his blood that runs in the veins of my children if I failed to denounce it as a wrong to man's liberty. I had rather go to prison, as did Caleb Moody, for denouncing Andre's breach of chartered freedom, than purchase peace by fawning at the feet of a few purse-proud petty tyrants who terrify the poor out of their ballot.

MacNamara had been a leader of the Irish, once a man of culture, a man of ability, who had been their leader in earlier and better days, but like many men who go into politics, when this man had been there for thirty-eight years he finally got to drinking. He lost his cigar factory; he was reduced to poverty. That was the opportunity of the opposition, bitter partisan leaders. Our laws punish a man with imprisonment in solitary confinement for the third conviction of the offense of being drunk. For the third offense of drunkenness the law punishes by six months' imprisonment in solitary confinement in a dungeon. That is the law of Massachusetts.

This man, MacNamara, finding a warrant was issued for him, happened to meet one of the most influential of the former town officers, who asked him whether the Irish were going to vote for Butler and Boynton. He said they were, and he added, "I will use my influence with my friends to vote your republican ticket if you will get that warrant quashed." He went off and said he had made the arrangement. MacNamara was in doubt that it was strictly a fact that the warrant had been returned, therefore he went to the selectmen on the morning of the election and asked them not to have him arrested and sent to the dungeon, and to purchase immunity promised to vote their ticket and use his influence with friends. They asked, "How many votes can you get?" "I may get more than I expect," said MacNamara. "Come down, and I will speak to the officer not to arrest you," said Bailey.

The honorable Senator stood up here on Thursday and he refused to acknowledge that wealth and power and corporate influence, the influence of the employer over the employé, had any effect in Massachusetts, but said that every voter was absolutely free; and here is an eminent man from the sixth congressional district, defeated by a small number of voters, and testifying to a condition of things that makes the heart of man sick as to the power of government and office and station over the voter.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator read from Mr. Boynton what purported to be the statutes of Massachusetts.

Mr. CALL. No; I read the case of MacNamara. Not the statutes of Massachusetts, but the case of MacNamara, that occurred there, where the facts were sworn to.

Mr. DAWES. But Moody Boynton said that a man is confined in solitary imprisonment in a dungeon for six months for being a common drunkard.

Mr. CALL. On the third conviction for drunkenness.

Mr. DAWES. I think Mr. Moody Boynton stated that. A man is not confined in solitary confinement in a dungeon or anywhere else for that.

Mr. CALL. If it does so confine him it is a harsh law, and if we had treated the colored people in that way and said they should be deprived of their suffrage upon conviction for being drunk, what would you have said? We should have had a war-dance here upon the subject of southern outrages.

Mr. DAWES. The difference between us is this: the black man cannot change his color, but almost anybody can stop getting drunk.

Mr. CALL. But black men and white men both get drunk sometimes.

Mr. DAWES. I know they do.

Mr. CALL. And we have not any law in our country that deprives a man of the suffrage because he gets drunk.

Mr. DAWES. There is not any in ours either; but there is a law in our State—the Senator may think it a misfortune and it may be to some politicians—that tries to restrain men from getting drunk. It does not, however, take away the right of suffrage from anybody. Even the Senator's party flourishes there just as well notwithstanding that law.

Mr. CALL. Ah, well, that won't do. They do not get drunk enough not to vote.

Mr. DAWES. Nobody gets drunk enough not to vote.

Mr. CALL. Sometimes your people take their votes away from them.

Mr. DAWES. Nobody gets drunk enough not to vote, but nobody votes there without being able to read the vote he casts. Our people think every voter ought to be able to read the vote he casts. It is a mistake, I suppose, in the eye of the Senator; but we are quite attached to the idea in Massachusetts that it is a great deal safer for a man to know enough to read the vote he casts. It may be a mistake, but that is the idea we have.

Mr. CALL. I am not questioning the propriety of your laws. I am questioning the propriety of you holding your seats here upon a suffrage which disqualifies so many, your own people say nearly one-third of your adult voters, rising here to preach a crusade of terror and force and disturbance against our people.

Mr. DAWES. My dear sir, there is not a man in Massachusetts who believes a word of that. Moody Boynton does not believe it.

Mr. CALL. Here is the record; here are the facts; here is the sworn testimony of MacNamara. It is no use to talk about his story not being true. Mr. Moody Boynton is a respectable man or he would not have got so many votes.

Mr. DAWES. A very respectable man.

Mr. CALL. Mr. Boynton says further:

Then we come to Amesbury, Massachusetts; to Amesbury, where the poet Whittier lives; to Amesbury, where Governor Josiah Bartlett, the first signer of the Declaration of Independence, was born, and there you find are mills, formerly busy with 1,500 operatives, which have been silent for four long years; there men had been driven to such misery they could not pay their taxes. It is in the evidence there were five hundred former employés still remaining; there 55 old voters' taxes were paid in one day, and then disfranchised; there Michael Kennedy, an old voter, more than half a century old, a voter who, I suppose, even under the constitutional amendment of 1857, had a right under the State laws to vote, as had others of these 55 voters, for you will notice there were many of them over twenty-one years of age when that disfranchising amendment was adopted—Michael Kennedy's was made the test case in reference to all these old voters. So swears the selectman. It is shown by the testimony in the record it was made the test case; the case of Michael Kennedy, a man over half a century old; also Thomas McCue, who had voted twenty-two years; these with 55 voters were disfranchised for illiteracy in defiance of the fourteenth constitutional amendment.

These are the sources of evidence that I have referred to. There is Dr. Loring's admission that there are large numbers disfranchised; there is the statement of the census itself, and the argument resting upon analogy which cannot be disputed; and then there is the statement of Mr. Boynton. It seems just about one-half of the persons who would be entitled to vote but for the disfranchising qualification of Massachusetts in the sixth congressional district, according to the statement of this report, are authorized to vote—just about one-half.

Mr. DAWES. Half of the 130,000?

Mr. CALL. Half the persons who would be qualified to vote in that district but for the disfranchisements are qualified now. I will read on this subject the statement of the report of Mr. Weaver, the minority of the committee in the case of Boynton vs. Loring:

Now, as the total vote of this district (23,275) is 9.08 per cent. of the total congressional vote of the State, the same percentage of the whole number of citizens disfranchised in the State, namely, 105,109, will approximate very nearly the number disfranchised in the sixth congressional district, which we find to be 1,646 for "illiteracy" and 11,475 for failure to pay a tax, making a total of 13,121—considerably more than half of the total vote thrown in the district, or 2,782 votes more than were cast for any candidate.

There is the sixth congressional district of Massachusetts, the most enlightened district in the State, as is stated by these two witnesses, containing men of the most eminent distinction, where more than one-half of her adult male population, that would be qualified to vote under the suffrage laws and the construction of those laws in every Southern State, are disfranchised; and yet gentlemen here are preaching a crusade of destruction and terror against the southern people upon the ground that they want "a free ballot and a fair count."

DIFFERENCE IN THE EXECUTION OF UNITED STATES LAWS NORTH AND SOUTH.

Well, Mr. President, let us go a little further. I wish to show the difference. Here a selectman, in this testimony, a State official of Massachusetts, was denying the ballot to one man and receiving votes which witnesses swear he knew to be illegal votes, receiving ballots which he knew to be double ballots, punishing or threatening to punish men with imprisonment unless they voted the republican ticket; and we hear of no indictment. It is left to the State law; no United States official interferes. But in my State a gentleman of high and unspotted character, a man who can compare with any man of any country in learning, in purity of character, in a lifetime of honorable public service, who has been a judge of one of our highest courts for years, is brought before the United States court, not for any criminal action as an official, but for giving his opinion as a lawyer in regard to the construction of a State law. And yet we are told you must preach a new crusade against the southern people for "a free ballot and a fair count," while here stands the law and the manner in which it is executed in Massachusetts, and there it is in my State, where a private citizen can be indicted and held up for years before a United States court. I give the name. Judge Thomas King, of Alachua County, Florida, stands to-day under an indictment, not for an official act, but for giving his opinion as a lawyer upon the construction of a State law.

Now let us go a little further——

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator from Florida permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CALL. Yes, just a question.

Mr. BLAIR. The question is whether the Senator will allow me to make a very short statement with reference to the basis of suffrage in Massachusetts?

Mr. CALL. Not now; I beg pardon. I will after a while, and shall be glad to hear the gentleman, but not now. I want to make my own statement connectedly.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator would allow me just a moment, he would see that his representation as to suffrage——

Mr. CALL. I am sorry to refuse to yield to the Senator now, and shall be very glad to do so at some other time.

Mr. BLAIR. I appreciate the Senator's courtesy. I know he dislikes to do it. I think he would find the statement troublesome to him if he would allow it to be made.

FREE BALLOT IN CONNECTICUT.

Mr. CALL. Now, Mr. President, I want to go to the State of Connecticut. The honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] in the defense of this coalition a few days ago advised us that universal suffrage was the law of the United States, and that we on this side must prepare ourselves for it; that it must be enforced; that it was back of this coalition. So I go to the State of Connecticut to see what sort of universal suffrage they have or propose to have in that State. I find that an amendment to the constitution of Connecticut provides a qualification of "good moral character." Well, if you can have a clause any more extensively disfranchising suffrage I do not know it. It depends on who may happen to construe it—"good moral character." And then it goes on to say:

Every person shall be able to read any article of the constitution or any section of the statutes of this State before being admitted as elector.

A right to prevent a man from voting without a conviction for crime because of the opinion of some persons that he may not have a good moral character is a great limitation of universal suffrage, and when you add to it an intelligence qualification of ability to read any clause in the constitution and any section of a statute to the satisfaction of a partisan inspector, you remove the suffrage as far as possible from universal suffrage, and establish a qualified and limited suffrage of the narrowest possible basis.

But, Mr. President, that is not all. If we go a little further we find that there is another and still more effective denial and limitation of a free ballot in Connecticut. A free ballot may be quite as effectually denied by any law, construction of law or rule or device which gives to one ballot a greater effect than another. Now I find that in Connecticut they have a borough representation by which the political power of the State is controlled as distinct from population and its numbers, the effect of which is to make the ballot of a person living in one place five or perhaps ten times as powerful as in another place. This will be seen from the following table:

Town.	No. of Representatives.	Population in 1880.
Hartford	2	42,553
Hartland	2	643
New Haven	2	62,882
Union	2	539
Norwich	2	21,141
Lyme	2	1,025
Bridgeport	2	29,148
Durham	2	990
Waterbury	2	20,269
Ashford	2	1,041
Meriden	2	18,340
Killingworth	2	848

Now, I say the honorable Senator from Connecticut ought in defense of his own State and State policy to abandon his theory of universal suffrage and especially this coalition, and give his voice and his vote to a proper and a just affirmation that the State laws, alike in the South and in the North, are in the discretion and in the will of their own people, and not seek to raise a public clamor of which the result may be more disastrous to the densely populated communities of the North than to the sparsely settled States of the South.

FREE BALLOT IN VERMONT, PENNSYLVANIA, AND RHODE ISLAND.

But what of the liberty-loving State of Vermont? Is the suffrage a free ballot there? Are there no limitations or qualifications in the real or supposed interest of law and order there? Is it purely a government of numbers in Vermont? Hon. Mr. Loring, of Massachusetts, a high authority, says, "a citizen who is twenty-one years of age and is of a quiet and peaceable behavior," in the State of Vermont, "may exercise the right of suffrage." As I said before, in most of our States the condition of disfranchisement is a conviction for crime; but here the judgment of the authorities is that a man shall be of "a quiet and peaceable behavior."

In Pennsylvania all State and county taxes are required to be paid; and in addition their methods of districting and the accumulation of large majorities of voters in the same district and distributing the voters of another political opinion or party practically denies a free ballot to about one-half of her adult male population. You can deny a free ballot just as effectually by so districting a county as to mass all the voters of one political opinion in certain districts as you can by a suffrage qualification; and that is the favorite mode now.

Then let us take our little friend, Rhode Island. The honorable Senator from Rhode Island, whom everybody admires, and everybody is fond of, [Mr. BURNSIDE,] and the accomplished senior Senator from that State [Mr. ANTHONY] are both sustaining this coalition; and it was but recently that the learned Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] in a speech rich in its abundance of constitutional authorities, of judicial opinions, of the expressed opinion of distinguished and leading men, vindicated the suffrage laws and qualifications of the State of Rhode Island which impose such limitations upon suffrage that not more than 40 per cent. of her male population are permitted to vote. I say, gentlemen, in all candor, you must abandon this crusade, this pretended crusade, false and hollow as it is, of "a free ballot and a fair count." You have no free ballot; you do not pretend that you have one. You dare not have one. It is impossible in your country for you to have a free ballot. In one way or another you must concentrate the control of political power, in your largely populated and dense communities, in the hands of the intelligent and the property-holding and the tax-paying classes of the people, either by district and territorial representation, by suffrage qualification, by qualifications of residence or of property, by limitations of age or sex, as Senator ANTHONY ably showed. As the Supreme Court says, there is no authority and no place in the Constitution of the United States for prescribing rules for suffrage; and if it is a question remitted entirely to the States, what do you mean by saying you are for "a free ballot?" Do you propose to change the Constitution of the United States? If you propose anything, you must propose that. Do you propose to make limitations by the power of the Federal Government; and, if so, what? You do not avow them; you will not avow them.

The Senator from Virginia and his candidate, Mr. Riddleberger, are against a suffrage-capitation tax. That excites their holy horror, and that alone, they say, has brought them into affinity with you; but the Senators from Rhode Island owe it to frankness, to justice, and to right to say that they cannot accept any affiliation upon that ground, and so of the Senators from Massachusetts.

EVIL EFFECTS OF SUBVERTING STATE AUTHORITY OVER SUFFRAGE.

Now, Mr. President, I make no question of the right of the States to prescribe conditions and qualifications on the suffrage. I am making no war on your State laws or institutions, or on the methods by which you endeavor to secure the control of intelligence, capacity, and honesty in your States over the electoral power. Right or wrong as it may be, the Constitution of the United States has given that power to the several States; but in reason and in honesty and in sincerity you cannot continue in this coalition, you cannot continue your crusade against other States and other peoples for "a free ballot," which you do not yourselves allow. You cannot seek to subvert the lawful power of other States to have a fair count made when you claim it for yourselves, and when in obtaining it you encounter in your own States the same difficulties as in other States and communities; but if you are intent on inaugurating this new crusade, in destroying State authority over this subject of "a free ballot and a fair count," you will not be as secure with your dense population, your concentrated capital, your vast wealth, your terrible poverty, your great inequality in the distribution of wealth and the means of living, as the people of the South.

The lion in your path is pestilence and famine, the cravings of unsatisfied hunger, the wail of the dying parent and the little child, victims of your tenement houses, your crowded cities, of overwork and badly paid work; victims of the economic and social conditions which belong to a dense population. Some great writers of fiction both in the English and French tongues have portrayed with fearful horror and reality that vast mass of mankind who are the discontented and oppressed victims of social and economic and political conditions which no social or political science has yet solved. These conditions, as you know, are of necessity most powerful in densely populated communities and districts, where arts and manufactures flourish, where men, women, and children live on wages, on the arbitrary will of others. They are least influential in an agricultural people whose property is equally distributed.

THE POOR AND THE SUFFRAGE IN VERMONT, NEW HAMPSHIRE, AND MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. President, I do not propose to detain the Senate for any great length of time; but I want to show a little about how this thing works among the people. Since I had the honor to deliver the few remarks I made here the other day I have received a letter, not from an anonymous witness, but from a man of respectability, from one of the people, which shows how they feel upon the subject of this false coalition for a free ballot, this new crusade against the unfortunate people of the South. I do not fear it. You cannot do it, gentlemen; you cannot have one thing in your own States and another upon this floor, and proclaim to the American people that you defy the truth, defy the open sunlight truth. Let us see what the people say. Here writes a man to me from Chester, Vermont:

> The State law [of Massachusetts] disfranchises and the poll-tax paying as a condition precedent to the right to cast a vote keeps that State in republican hands. The men at this day who cannot read to the satisfaction of a republican register—

Mark me, I am not making any party assault; I am showing how these laws must work, republican or democratic; I am showing the unfairness of this crusade. Here is one of your people in Vermont—

> The men at this day who cannot read to the satisfaction of a republican register—

He might read satisfactorily to somebody else—> are those who, when eight to ten years old, were operatives.

My learned friend the other day thought there was no proof that every operative could not go into a home of abundant comfort; he thought there was no pestilence; that none of the ills of life assailed the poor man in Massachusetts; but here this man says:

> The men at this day who cannot read to the satisfaction of a republican register are those who, when eight to ten years old, were operatives in factories and corporations in Massachusetts, and grew up without any schooling. Many are now with families growing up in the same way.
> One instance I will relate which I was an eye-witness to. Four years ago I was in Manchester, New Hampshire. When the mills shut down for the day I saw hundreds of children from eight to twelve years of age returning home carrying dinner-pails. They had left home in the morning at ringing of bell, carrying a poor bite for dinner, of both sexes. Many looked pale, haggard, and dejected, poorly clad in cheap cotton dresses. Now Senator BLAIR is talking Christianity to you and others in the Senate. These poor families live in one and two rooms, many of which are made only with boards and joists, and unplaned.
> In Massachusetts there are men who have worked all their early days in corporations in Massachusetts, and now have gone back into the country, and have children who have learned to read, and they read the papers of the day to their fathers and mothers, who are unable to read. In some rare instances, with the help of their children, they own a farm, pay largely of taxes, but cannot vote, and have as white a skin as Senator DAWES or HOAR.
> I have many relations in Lowell, Massachusetts. They tell me that the bulldozing of voters is true, and that power is used to the uttermost to make them help vote republican. They are not content that the voters stay at home, but they must vote republican.
> In my own town, last September, at the State election, this same machine was operated; and on election day two republicans sat within two feet of the ballot-box with a political check-list to check and spot voters. This I witnessed. The board was republican.

The gentlemen can have the name of that man if they want it. There is no concealment about it. I have no doubt he is a sincere sympathizer with his people. Here is his name, George L. Fletcher. Beyond all question and all doubt the ballot is limited and qualified in every Northern State.

WHAT IS A FREE BALLOT?

The President, Mr. Garfield, when a member of Congress, made a speech, which I have here, in which he makes the laws of qualification largely over fifty, I think they are about eighty-two; but the number does not matter. In every State the State law has prescribed the qualifications. What do you mean, then, when you undertake to say that you are in favor of a free ballot? Do you mean to say that the ballot shall be free without limitation? Certainly not. Do you mean to say that the person who gives it shall be free to give it as he pleases? Beyond a doubt that cannot be interfered with except by personal violence. It is no more than any other personal right. Whatever it is, it is committed by the Constitution and the laws to the States. The Constitution says in express terms that even the qualifications for voting for a Representative in Congress shall be the same as those prescribed for the largest branch of the State Legislature. The State law imposes it, and what then? Ah, gentlemen, it will not do to make these protestations to the country for the election of these proposed officers; it will not do to attempt to build up a political party or to control the offices of the Senate upon the basis of building up a political party, or as an inducement to any Senator for his political action; some Senator's vote is obliged to be either a consideration for or an inducement to or given for the purpose of building up a political party in the country without foundation in the sincere conviction and honest belief of any man upon that side.

THE COALITION AND THE RETURNING-BOARD OF LOUISIANA.

This coalition has given rise to a wide range of acrimonious debate, in which the people of the Southern States, white and colored, who have chosen to support the democratic party have been assailed as denying a free ballot and a fair count within these States. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] and other Senators have found an unnumbered army of martyrs, men, women, and children, in every Southern State who sleep the last sleep in unknown graves, victims of this fell purpose of the democrats to prevent a free ballot and a fair count. The gentleman [Mr. KELLOGG] who represents Louisiana in part on this floor as an unselfish philanthropist may well felicitate himself on the more effective method of a returning board with discretionary power to make both the ballot and the count, and bewail, as he has done here with unaffected grief, the Bourbon stupidity which prefers, according to his narrative, the assassin's knife and the murderer's deadly aim to his own humane and clement and surer methods of disfranchisement.

THE SUFFRAGE TAX, AND VIRGINIA AND RHODE ISLAND.

A free ballot. What do Senators mean by a free ballot? What does the Senator from Virginia mean by a free ballot—a priceless suffrage? What does the honorable Senator mean when he says the Bourbon democrats of Virginia accepted the amendment with mental reservation, and seek by indirect means to avoid it? Do they mean that a free ballot is necessary to a fair count?—that there can be no fair count where there is not a free ballot? If so, how far and to what extent must this freedom of the ballot go? We are not left in doubt as to the meaning of the honorable Senator from Virginia of a free ballot, for he has told us of his opposition to a suffrage capitation tax in the State of Virginia, and pointed it out as one of the mental reservations and one of the indirect means of the Bourbon democracy for avoiding the thirteenth amendment. But as under the law of compensations, which some philosophers maintain, every evil is accompanied by some corresponding and qualifying good, so the loss of the honorable Senator from this side of the Chamber will under this reasoning be compensated by the accession to this side of the Chamber of the honorable and accomplished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] and his able colleague, [Mr. BURNSIDE,] with the gallant little State of Rhode Island.

Sir, the learned and accomplished Senator from Rhode Island at the last session of Congress, with a rich abundance of argument of constitutional law and of example and learned opinion, vindicated the right and expediency of a suffrage capitation tax as a condition of voting in the State of Rhode Island. And if to maintain such a law shall in Virginia, and in the South, and in the coalition here, make a man a Bourbon democrat and an opponent of the thirteenth amendment, then must the honorable Senator from Rhode Island either come with us or abandon his Rhode Island State policy and his own learned argument, or we shall witness another strange effect of this coalition in seeing him who was from the first an advocate of emancipation exchange places with and fall behind gentlemen who were the defenders of slavery, but in one day since the 4th of March were born both into life and stalwart manhood in the party.

SUFFRAGE AND ITS LIMITATIONS.

But what, again I ask, of this free ballot—this priceless suffrage—in what respect must it be free, and by what law shall its freedom be regulated or prescribed? Shall it be free to all in respect of the right to vote without limitation of age or sex or intelligence or capacity or residence or birth or property or character? This question opens a wide range of inquiry into the subject, but it is an inquiry into a subject where the whole range of investigation has already been explored and the whole subject settled by the judicial, legislative, and executive departments both of the National Government and of the States.

The amendment of the Constitution of the United States says there shall be no discrimination because of race or color; but so long as the laws of the States are applicable to all colors and all races, then authority to prescribe conditions and limitations of suffrage is absolute and unlimited. To this effect is all opinion and all judicial authority. What, then, does this coalition mean by a free ballot? Do you mean to change the Constitution of the United States and to prescribe the same conditions of suffrage and the same limitations in every State? If so, what are these conditions and what are the limitations which you wish to establish and prescribe? Shall all men vote? Shall the children vote? Shall the women vote? Shall men of foreign birth vote? Shall intelligence qualify and ignorance disqualify? Shall virtue qualify and vice disqualify? Shall property be represented or not?

The favorite aphorism of the Senators from Massachusetts is that every man must have the right to vote. Yet this right is not granted in Massachusetts nor anywhere else. In Massachusetts the laws deny it to more than a hundred thousand adult males and to all the women and children. In all the States the suffrage is qualified by limitations of age, of sex, of intelligence and property, of payment of taxes of greater or less amount, by conditions of foreign birth and domestic residence of greater or less length, all under the authority of State laws. In Louisiana, and according to the decision of the electoral commission and the Senator from Massachusetts, by the device of returning boards, to limit or enlarge the conditions of suffrage and of counting at discretion. We are now, Mr. President, endeavoring to reason about this subject, and not to engage in vain declamations and empty words. Who will deny that manhood suffrage and a free ballot and equality before the law cannot coexist with these qualifications and limitations? I am not saying that these limitations and qualifications are wrong, or that others would not be right. I am not saying that State authority shall not decide what cumulative conditions of suffrage may best promote the good order and general welfare of the State, but I am saying that these facts determine absolutely that those who maintain these limitations on suffrage and the authority of State laws on this subject cannot with truth say that they favor manhood suffrage, equality before the law, "a priceless suffrage." Nor so long as they exclude woman suffrage can they say that they favor universal or manhood suffrage. Nor, as Senator ANTHONY ably and conclusively says in his speech, so long as they recognize State authority to impose a limit of twenty-one years on male suffrage can they deny that the State may make the limitation eighteen years or twenty-five years or seventy years or limit it both for the young and old.

The truth is, Mr. President, this assertion that the safety of the Republic and the well-being of the country depend on an absolutely free ballot, whether in the new converts to the doctrine of a "priceless suffrage" or in the old doctrinaires on this subject, is an affectation and a pretense which has its existence only in party policies and in fine words and is practically denied in all of the Northern States, and has no existence in the mind of the learned and able Senator from Massachusetts except when upon the subject of southern outrages the honorable Senator puts on his stage clothes and performs in tragedy on the Senate stage. The ballot is more nearly free in every Southern State and the suffrage more extended and the count fairer than anywhere else in the world.

These, Mr. President and Senators, are the conditions and qualifications imposed by State laws, approved by the Northern States, sustained by them in your respective States, affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

What shall we say of the free ballot, the equality before the law, the priceless suffrage as affected by the laws which apportion representation to districts by changing the lines of the districts according to population, and thus accumulate large masses of voters of the same political opinions in the same district and distribute those of another political opinion into different districts, so as to give one voter of one party or one political opinion four times more power than one voter of another party or opinion, and practically deny all force and effect to the ballots of the excess over a majority, as in the State of Pennsylvania, where under the system of disfranchisement or denial of a free ballot by districting the counties it requires in some districts four democrats to every single republican to elect a member of Congress? The ballot, therefore, is not free or equal in the sense of being universal and by virtue of manhood in respect to qualifications imposed by State laws in the Northern States.

IS THE BALLOT VOLUNTARY?

Is it free in the sense of being purely voluntary, uninfluenced by persons other than the voter from motives of fear, favor, or affection, or interest?

In what part of the Constitution of the United States is it affirmed that the voter shall be isolated from all social, commercial, and business relations and influences; and that he shall not cast his ballot influenced by fear, favor, affection, or interest?

In what part of the Constitution is it affirmed that the voter shall have intelligence and intellect enough to form an opinion on the controverted political distinctions of the day, and if it were so affirmed by what instrumentalities can government or laws so influence and control human character, capacities, and motives? But it is said the ballot must not be influenced and controlled by violence or by bribery; it must not be sold and bought for money; it must not by law be an article of merchandise. Beyond a doubt this is true to this extent and this effect, and in this sense the ballot must be free; like all personal rights it must be protected against vi et armis—force. This is one of the objects of government. The person of every man in the State, everywhere, under all law and government, is protected against unlawful force; but a man's vote cannot be influenced by violence without an assault on his person or vi et armis in some form. Under our system of government, founded for the protection of persons in their rights, the whole power of the State is pledged to this; the right, power, and duty of protecting persons in their rights is committed to and reserved by the States.

And under the forms of the Constitution, through the States' appeal in the prescribed form, the whole power of the Union is subject to the demand of the States to support their judicial and executive power in the assertion and protection of the rights of persons judicially ascertained. But how otherwise is the national Government concerned in this subject when, by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, by all practice and all settled constructions of law, and by the opinions of the republicans, the extent of the suffrage, the cumulative conditions and qualifications of suffrage, the suffrage itself in all respects, except that there shall be by law in the States no discrimination because of race or color, is prohibited to the national Government?

HOW SUFFRAGE MAY BE FREE.

But, Mr. President, if by law the suffrage was really universal and extended to every man, woman, and child of the whole population of every race, would the ballot be free, or, in the phrase of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE,] "priceless?" This question could with truth be answered in the affirmative.

Where religion, virtue, and intelligence all concurred in rightfully influencing the exercise of the electoral qualifications as against the pure and absolute force of numbers, no man of intelligence and reason will be rash enough to affirm that under the moral laws which control the people of a State and are the underlying and invisible but the absolutely certain forces which control all the social and industrial activities—no man will be so rash as to affirm that the best interests of the State will be best promoted by placing the powers of electoral control in the hands of the ignorant instead of the intelligent, in the hands of the vicious and criminal as contradistinguished from the virtuous, the honest, and the good.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to ask the learned Senators from Massachusetts a question, which I would like them to answer to themselves and to the country. These learned Senators, so intelligent and so fair generally, on the question of the southern white people, seem to be excited to a wild frenzy whenever they are brought into question. They seem to think and openly declare to the American people that we are a race of assassins and murderers, that we live on human horrors, and that the taking of human life is a matter with us of trivial concern.

I will ask these honorable Senators if, as they claim, the qualifications on the suffrage in Massachusetts and in Rhode Island and in other Northern States is not to secure the political power in those States in the hands of the virtuous and intelligent and industrious classes of the people as against the mere force of numbers? I ask them if this is not a right object for the exercise of the power of the State over this subject? I ask them if it is right that the educated and intelligent and virtuous among the people in Massachusetts and Rhode Island should control the political power of the State, why should it not be equally right in Louisiana, or Virginia, or Florida, or any other State, North or South? Again, I ask them a question which they can answer to themselves and the country. I ask if the question of the suffrage is entirely within the control of the States by legitimate means, what is the necessity, on their own hypothesis, of the southern people committing murder on men, women, and children; of their resorting to criminal means to do that which by law they can easily do? And again I ask, if intelligence, if property, if the relations of employer and employed, if the conservative and kindly influences of business and society have a proper and legitimate influence on those who have the right to vote, why deny it its proper influence in the Southern States any more than in the North? Why seek to build up a political power against all these influences? Why not seek the aid and good-will of the virtuous and intelligent?

The republican party came into power by representing in good faith a real public sentiment and objects of public policy which commended themselves to the educated and intelligent opinion of the country, to its business men and its business interests, to its religious and its social institutions, to all the influences which in a State make public opinion and influence and direct and qualify and restrain the mere force and effect of numbers and render the loose and inaccurate and false phase of a free ballot in some sense possible. Truth is the great foundation of all human action; the real as distinguished from the unreal is the only object of argument and reason. No government can be built on that which is false, that which is not true. No policy can ever permanently succeed but that founded on truth.

THE SOUTH AND THE FREE BALLOT.

A fair examination of this question will demonstrate that your position is a mere pretense by evidence better than the mere assertion of any man, by the evidence of natural and inevitable causes and effects, by the testimony of the laws and construction of laws, and of the constitutions of the Northern States and of the United States, by their practice and the decisions of their courts, by their public opinion and the expressed opinion of their leading public men, by their economical and their social and their business order and relations; all these unite in the affirmation of the entire falsity and the error of your proposition.

Mr. President, an incontestable body of proof from unimpeachable witnesses denies the statements of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] and his allies, the Senators from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and of Louisiana, [Mr. KELLOGG,] on the subject of a free ballot and a fair count, a priceless suffrage, and as to mental reservation and indirection, and crimes of the people of the Southern States respecting the thirteenth and fourteenth amendments, the treatment of the colored people, and all that is implied in the banner of the bloody shirt under which they are now fighting, including the cry of repudiation raised by the Senator from Virginia.

Let us briefly consider this. The Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] in defense of the Senator from Virginia, and of the coincidences, as Governor BROWN terms it, said last week that the people of the Southern States after the adoption of the thirteenth amendment sought to avoid it by re-establishing slavery by indirect means, by laws punishing the colored people for not having homes; selling men and women into slavery for not having homes; punishing men for associating with them. The Senator from Massachusetts seeks to sustain this statement by a reference to the laws passed, not after the thirteenth amendment, but by the provisional governments which were established under President Johnson's proclamation.

Mr. President, that statement is that the southern white people are cruel and malevolent toward the colored people; and the proofs cited are the laws referred to, the alleged massacre at Caddo, the alleged Chisolm murder. I assert that the instances cited do not sustain the statement; that, as stated, they are not true; that the laws referred to were wisely intended for the benefit of the colored people, to protect them from want—from apprehended starvation—and that they were copied from the apprentice and vagrant laws of Massachusetts and other Northern States, where substantially they now exist and are applied to the people of that and other States.

The criminal records of every Northern State, Massachusetts included, show in every year crimes of equal cruelty and depravity and of equal numbers with those of the Southern States—crimes prompted by the same motives, committed by the people of those States on each other. The criminal records of the country exhibit these facts. They therefore declare the charge of malevolence and hostility to these people in the Southern States to be false.

The statistics of the country show, as has been shown by the able and profound Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] that the rate of wages of labor compare favorably with that of every Northern State; that property in land and in personal property has been acquired and is being acquired per capita by the colored people in the Southern States more rapidly in respect to the ratio of numbers than by the people of Massachusetts and other Northern States, and that these landed purchases are being acquired by them from the southern white people and not from the Government.

But I have not time to go into this subject at large. At a proper time the facts, the undeniable facts, which demonstrate the wicked falsehood of the contrary statement, can easily be arrayed.

I am not afraid with all the proof and all the facts to meet the charges of a partisan report, and demonstrate by proofs which none can deny its wicked and malevolent falsehood, and to prove how beautiful in innocence, how lovely, and of what good report has been the conduct since the war of the millions of brave, conscientious, and religious people, to traduce and degrade whom seems to be the pleasure and delight of the coalition.

THE SOUTH AS IT IS.

Mr. President, there is no South in the sense of the past; but there is a South, panoplied in righteousness, in clemency, in all the arts of peace, with a harmonious population of both races, holding in her hands the census of 1880, taken by an honest and capable man, a great statistician, and, indeed, a learned and laborious searcher for truth—General Francis Walker, the superintendent of the census. That South, an integral part of the Union, with her hundreds of millions of annual gold exports, confronts the false representations of her condition with the great facts of industrial activity and development, of increase of population, of rates of wages, with the absence of crime, and with the facts of figures which do not lie. Thus armed, she appeals to the religion, to the education, to the business, to the laws and Constitution, and to the principles of your own social order, as stated in President Garfield's inaugural, for protection and security, and has no fear of the result, when, in the last presidential election, the people of this country stood equally divided.

THE TRUE QUESTION.

Thus standing, we say to you, gentlemen, fearlessly, you cannot cover up the present movement by denunciations of that South. You cannot meet the charge of a majority obtained by the use of the patronage of the Senate and the pledge of further aid in elections now about to take place by pleading the rights of an honest majority, uninfluenced by patronage and preferment. You cannot justify a change of political principles and relations in this Chamber, accompanied by a simultaneous bestowal of great and influential preferment and patronage, when that change transfers the political power from one side to the other, by empty declamations and false assertions of abuse of power by some of the States and a part of the people of the Union.

The honorable Senator from Ohio talks in vain of the constitutional power of a majority. Sir, there is no place in the Constitution of our fathers for a majority constituted as this has avowedly been. The Constitution makes no provision for the bestowal of office in this Chamber either as the inducement to or the reward for the action of its members. You stand here confronted by facts which you cannot deny—a bestowal of great and lucrative and influential office, a simultaneous support of your party and your party organization, a simultaneous transfer of the political power from one side to the other, a simultaneous change of political and party relations.

In our judgment, in the judgment of thirty-eight Senators here, these facts cannot innocently and rightfully coexist; and we will not be parties to it nor submit to a majority thus constituted as long as we can constitutionally avoid it. Upon this stand, and no other, we place ourselves and you before the country.

Mr. CAMDEN. Mr. President——

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator would allow me a moment, I should be obliged to him.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield?

Mr. CAMDEN. Yes, sir; I shall yield the floor to the Senator for a short speech.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] has undertaken to justify or excuse a charge which has been made that men are deprived of the right to vote in certain States who have all the qualifications which the State has seen fit to prescribe, by arraigning Northern States upon the allegation that they have prescribed qualifications which are unreasonable. I said to him on Thursday that the complaint against Southern States was not that they imposed under the Constitution prescriptions or qualifications upon voters, but that they deprived voters who were qualified by their own laws and the Constitution of the United States of the right to vote. I wish the Senator would keep that distinction in mind. The charge and the complaint is that in certain States men qualified by the State laws and the Constitution of the United States are deprived of the franchise, some of them by violence, some of them by artifice, some of them by being snowed under, as I described it, by dishonest and irresponsible pieces of paper, and some of them by forged returns, a most remarkable instance of which existing in the State the Senator himself represents on this floor. That is the complaint; the complaint on the part of the North is that men do not have their rights under the law; not that the law itself, properly administered, would not carry to each voter the participation and force in all elections of officers, but that the law is administered with the result stated. The Senator fails to meet the charge against those States and those in those States who control the ballot-box. I said to him that when every man in those States qualified by the laws of the States and by the Constitution of the United States to vote shall be permitted, without intimidation or restraint, to go to the ballot-box and deposit his ballot and have nothing counted but that ballot, no complaint will be raised against their States.

It is admitted that under the Constitution of the United States every State has the right to prescribe the qualifications of its voters, and the Constitution of the United States recognizes the fact that men shall hold their seats in the other branch of Congress who shall have received a majority of the votes cast by those qualified to vote for members of the most numerous branch of the Legislature of the State in which they reside. Until the people of the United States can come to believe and feel that each man in every State in this Union qualified under the Constitution of the United States to be a voter by the laws of the State shall have this right I have described, of going unmolested to the polls and having nothing counted but those votes—until the people of this country shall come to feel that each one of the citizens of this vast Union has secured to him that right, this question will not down, it will not cease to disturb and trouble the Republic, because the Republic can rest and rest in peace and safety upon no other foundation, and he who disturbs that disturbs the corner-stone itself.

That is why it is that the whole people of this country are aroused, awakened, apprehensive for the future of this Republic when it can be turned up on its apex rather than have the foundation upon which it rests broadened and deepened and made firmer by giving to every man entitled, under the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the State enacted in conformity to that Constitution, this right effective at all times as his shield and his protection.

Mr. President, the whole people who come to realize how much depends upon settling this question and settling it right—and it can be settled in no other way—are determined, as they love the institutions of their country, to see to it that to every citizen shall be guaranteed this right; not that they will make war upon such qualifications as each State in its discretion and wisdom under the Constitution shall see fit to require of its voters, but they will endeavor to broaden and deepen that foundation. Hence it is that the State of Massachusetts is arraigned here to-day by those who have no other answer to the charge that men in their own States are deprived of the privileges their own laws and the Constitution guarantee to them—arraigned here for the character of her own laws. Sir, she endeavors to strengthen and deepen and broaden those foundations in endeavoring to make every voter within her borders not only free to cast his vote, and not only secure in having that vote, and that alone, counted, but also in making the foundations still firmer by giving him free of cost, and inviting him and alluring him to partake of that benefit, education enough to know what is the piece of paper he puts into the ballot-box. And therefore it is, sir, that she requires of all who came within her borders after 1858, and all who have been born there since, two things, if a man desires to have a voice in the choice of her officers and in the laws made for his own protection and that of her citizens: He shall be able to read the ballot that he proposes to cast, so that he shall know what it is that he is doing when he walks up to the ballot-box to discharge the highest function of an American citizen; and then, as was well said once by my colleague on this floor, she mortgages the bottom dollar of all her wealth in a pledge to him, "If you will do this, here is the fountain free and open at which you may drink to your fill not only, but learn enough to be an intelligent American citizen, casting your ballot, knowing what that ballot means and what that ballot will accomplish, but also free to make you an American citizen, competent, armed and equipped for the great battle of life in which you are entering, so that you may go forth through these States peopling new States, carrying your intelligence and your enterprise and your capital from your mother among the children that she has helped to rear, and help to build up there institutions like those you have left behind you in your mother State of Massachusetts." This is her work; this is her ambition; this she has accomplished in the past, more according to her population and her territory and her means than any other State in this Union. In no State is property so guarded or are human rights so sacred; in no State does the humblest and the gentlest go in and out to rest in his humble cot at night more safely and rise more proudly in the morning to the work of the day than in that State of Massachusetts, arraigned here to-day because of this effort of hers to make her citizens proud sovereigns in this land of sovereigns.

Sir, the people of Massachusetts would look with ineffable contempt and disgust upon the men who thus arraign her did they not know that those who do it do it in ignorance of what she is endeavoring to do and in perfect inability to comprehend the grand and glorious attainment she is striving for; and none of her people would enter into this feeling more earnestly and more heartily than the poor democratic workingmen in Massachusetts who are there enjoying those grand advantages and opportunities and exercising those inestimable rights secured by her laws.

Why, sir, the Senator from Florida undertook to quote from a speech of my late colleague in the House, the accomplished Representative from the sixth district of that State, to show that one hundred and thirty-odd thousand otherwise legal voters of that State were disfranchised because they could not read the vote they were to cast. I showed the Senator on Thursday last that if there was any man in Massachusetts otherwise qualified to vote there who lost his opportunity because he could not read and write, he did it of his own free choice. When that state of things shall be in Florida, in Mississippi, in Louisiana, no man in Massachusetts will raise one word of complaint. If it should happen to have been, as the Senator is so mistaken in saying it is, that there are one hundred and thirty-odd thousand men in Massachusetts who cannot vote to-day because they cannot read or write, cannot tell whether the paper they put into the ballot-box is an expression of their will or a denial of that will, it is because they choose so to be. If a man shall starve himself to death when the food, free to him, is upon the table before him, he can raise no complaint against others if he declines to eat. There is no power by which you can force an education upon a man who refuses to accept it when it is freely offered to him. You may throw around him inducements; you may offer him temptations; you may give him opportunities if he will embrace them; but after all if he chooses to be ignorant and will not be enlightened, however much we may regret it we cannot cure it.

Now, sir, from the very speech of my late colleague from which the Senator got one hundred and thirty-odd thousand deprived of the right to vote because of these qualifications, allow me to read just where the Senator from Florida had marked but failed to read. I read from that speech:

> Nor does this measure of disqualification, together with all those which are by the laws of Massachusetts added to it, produce the startling effect presented by the figures of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Weaver] or convict Massachusetts of bad faith in the matter of apportionment for Representatives in Congress and presidential electors. Taking his figures, namely, 134,256, and of that number, according to his tables, 86,258 are aliens and therefore not citizens. Now, add to this last the number of paupers, idiots, criminals, and insane, namely, 9,271, and we have 95,529 disqualified for the above reasons, leaving 38,727 to be otherwise accounted for. Of these 14,691 naturalized citizens and 3,437 natives, or only 18,128, are disqualified for illiteracy.

Eighteen thousand one hundred and twenty-eight disqualified for illiteracy! Now the Senator says that a proportion quite equal to half of the voters in that district is disqualified for illiteracy. Divide the 18,128 between the eleven districts in that State (and there is no reason to suppose there are any more illiterate persons in the sixth than in any other district, not half as many as there are among the poor immigrants that come into Boston and who are otherwise qualified to vote) and it gives to each district but 1,648. Here is an arraignment of Massachusetts because 1,648 men in a district refuse according to her laws to qualify themselves without expense to themselves to be voters.

The Senator read about the condition of the operative children in the manufacturing establishments there because they come there in flocks from the Old World to find better opportunities and better wages and better schools, and everything this side of the other world better in Massachusetts than the places they left. That Massachusetts may not have growing up in her midst an increasing rather than a decreasing population of illiteracy, that Massachusetts may do everything in her power to lessen the number of those who voluntarily abstain from embracing the qualification of the voters, I hold in my hand, which I had not time to turn to before the Senator sat down, a statute which says that every man who shall employ one of those poor children coming here from where they would otherwise be beggars, and not give him every year a certain number of weeks of schooling shall be subject to indictment and punishment. This is the penalty for employing children unless the employer has a certificate from the free-school authorities in Massachusetts that they have in each one of the years between five and twenty given them thirteen weeks—I believe that is the number—of that schooling which makes them when they come to be twenty-one voters, voters who assert their conviction and right to make intelligent and honest inquiry into the meaning of the ballot they cast. We give to every parent in the State for the purpose, besides what I have said, for the expenses incidental to such an education somewhere about twenty-two dollars a year.

Now, Mr. President, I hope I shall not be called upon to detain the Senate one moment more in defense of laws which ought to commend themselves to every enlightened mind. I hope I shall not be called upon again to draw the distinction that ought to be everywhere present in the minds of earnest and anxious statesmen, between the qualifications of a voter prescribed by the laws of his State for the purpose of making him more a voter, firmer in his conviction and in that sense of duty that will make him walk through fire and blood in the assertion of his rights, and that kind of restriction which buries the voter out of sight in his grave, or under tissue ballots, or forged returns.

Mr. CAMDEN. Mr. President, in the discussions of the last few days Senators have taken occasion to refer to the relation which West Virginia sustains to the debt of Virginia. It has been charged that West Virginia has shown no disposition to ascertain or provide for the payment of her proportion of the debt, and were it not that Senators on the other side of the Chamber who evidently do not understand what has taken place in regard to this question have made statements reflecting upon West Virginia which are not sustained by the records and the facts, I should not have taken any part in discussion at this time.

In what I may say I have no purpose to criticise the action of Virginia in relation to her public debt. Those who understand the great losses and financial reverses that have come to that State by the late war and the disposition shown by her people to arrange satisfactorily with her creditors to restore her public credit must sympathize with her in her efforts to get her debt in such shape that she could meet the interest on her obligations. In her prosperity and power, as a Virginian I was proud of my nativity, and in her reverses and trials I honor and sympathize with her. But for stronger reasons I am jealous that no injustice shall be done to West Virginia.

West Virginia's relation to the public debt of Virginia is misunderstood, and has been greatly misrepresented in financial circles throughout the country. Inquiries are repeatedly made from all quarters in reference to what are often called and quoted as "West Virginia certificates," and with many persons the opinion prevails that certificates of indebtedness issued by the State of West Virginia, or by her consent, have been selling on the markets from eight to twelve cents on the dollar.

On the other hand, it has been charged that West Virginia has shown no disposition to enter into any adjustment or to make any provision to ascertain what portion of the debt she should bear. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] in this connection says—I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 31:

> Mr. President, if there is any man in the party which my colleague represents who agrees with another member of that party in Virginia as to what the debt of that State is, we have yet to find the concurrence; it is with one leader this figure, with another leader another figure; by one report of their officers one sum, and then by another report of other officers a different sum. Grant that sum to be the true one; but let the Senator state that our constitution recognized no specific sum. It says there shall first be a settlement with West Virginia, which has not yet been had, and commands payment of what Virginia shall owe. That is the language, that is the instruction of the constitution of Virginia; that, after a settlement with West Virginia, covering one-third of old Virginia's territory, shall have been arrived at by an adjustment of their relative proportions of the public debt, Virginia will provide for her share. Now I would like the Senators from West Virginia in this cry against readjusters as repudiators to tell the country what answer they have made to their obligation for one-third of the debt contracted by the old Commonwealth of Virginia. Will they tell the country where they have ever made a proposition to pay one stiver of their share of the public debt of that State to maintain the honor and the dignity of their own Commonwealth? Let them answer.

Mr. President, as it will be my object to vindicate West Virginia by stating the facts in relation to this question as they have occurred, and to avoid discussing the merits of the question or the equities between the two States, I cannot do it better than by presenting the record and history of all that has transpired between each of the States on this subject.

The ordinance of the Wheeling convention of August 20, 1861, which was the first convention held in Virginia to provide for the formation of a new State, provided that—

The new State shall take upon itself the just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the 1st day of January, 1861, to be ascertained by charging to it all State expenditures within the limits thereof, and the just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State government since any part of said debt was contracted, and deducting therefrom the moneys paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the said new State during the same period.

It will be seen by this ordinance that West Virginia undertook in the very beginning to fix and determine a basis upon which her proportion of the public debt of Virginia was to be ascertained.

But what is known as the Alexandria constitution of Virginia of 1863 did not give its consent to the basis of adjustment proposed by West Virginia, but indicated a different basis, which if carried out would result very differently from assigning one-third of the debt to West Virginia. I quote from the constitution, section 27 of article 4, in full:

The General Assembly shall provide by law for adjusting with the State of West Virginia the proportion of the public debt of Virginia proper to be borne by the States of Virginia and West Virginia respectively, and may authorize, in conjunction with the State of West Virginia, the sale of all lands and property of every description, including all the stocks and other interest owned and held by the State of Virginia in banks, works of internal improvement, and other companies, at the time of the formation of the State of West Virginia, and no ordinance passed by the convention which assembled at Wheeling on the 11th of June, 1861, adjusting the public debt, shall be binding upon this State.

The constitution of West Virginia, adopted in 1863, contains the provision that—

An equitable portion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the 1st day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by this State, and the Legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as it may be practicable and provide for the liquidation thereof.

The restored government of Virginia, known as the Pierrepont government, was removed from Alexandria to Richmond in 1865, and on the 5th day of December, 1865, the General Assembly passed an act repealing the act giving consent to the formation of the State of West Virginia, and also repealing the acts giving consent to the admission of Berkeley and other counties into the State of West Virginia. No action was taken looking to the apportionment of the debt by either State till the 28th of February, 1866, when the General Assembly of Virginia, by a joint resolution, authorized the appointment of three commissioners with the power to treat, first, for the "restoration of Virginia to its ancient jurisdiction and boundaries," and second, to treat upon the subject of the proper adjustment of the debt.

West Virginia at the next session of its Legislature passed a joint resolution on the 28th of February, 1867, declining to treat for her reunion with the old State and authorizing the appointment of commissioners to treat with the commissioners appointed by Virginia for the adjustment of the public debt so soon as the suit of Virginia against West Virginia pending in the Supreme Court of the United States to recover jurisdiction over the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson should be finally determined. Suit had been instituted by Virginia to recover back the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson in March, 1866, and no proper adjustment of the debt could be made till it was determined which State had jurisdiction over these two rich and populous counties. The suit was not finally determined until March, 1871. (Wallace Reports, page 51, Virginia vs. West Virginia.) Another cause soon followed for delaying negotiations between the two States. The reconstruction act of Congress passed on the 2d of March, 1867, remitted the State to Federal control where it remained until January, 1870, when the State government of Virginia, reorganized under its constitution, was recognized and the State restored to representation in Congress by act of January 25, 1870. This constitution contained the following section (19) in regard to the debt:

The General Assembly shall provide by law for adjusting with the State of West Virginia the proportion of the public debt of Virginia proper to be borne by the States of Virginia and West Virginia, and shall provide that such sum as shall be received from West Virginia shall be applied to the payment of the public debt of Virginia.

After the restoration of the State, Virginia again by a joint resolution passed on the 18th of February, 1870, authorized the appointment of commissioners to treat with West Virginia, and under this resolution commissioners were appointed who visited the Legislature of West Virginia, then in session, but within a few days of adjournment under constitutional limitations, and by the journals of that body it will be seen that a joint resolution was introduced and passed appointing a joint committee of the two houses to confer with these commissioners, which committee was at once appointed. This was followed in a few days by a joint resolution, passed on the last day of the session, authorizing the appointment of commissioners to treat with the authorities of Virginia. But, in the hurry of business incident to the closing hours of the session, no provision was made to defray the necessary expenses of the commissioners, and, although the commissioners were appointed by the governor, they were forced to postpone action under this resolution till the next session of the Legislature.

And I will say here in reply to a charge made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]—I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the 6th instant, and I ask the Secretary to read it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

I abhor repudiation in every fiber of my being, whether it be of national or State debt. My State knows nothing of it. I would that no State might know it. I do not say how much or how little there is of it in the Virginia campaign. I do remember, however, that the republican constitution of West Virginia, established in 1863, promised to assume an equitable share of the whole Virginia debt; I do know that republican legislation in West Virginia provided a commission to go to Richmond and see what should be assumed as West Virginia's portion of that debt; and I do know that when the democratic party got control of West Virginia, in 1872, it made a new constitution and wiped out that paragraph, and the democracy of West Virginia has never to my knowledge undertaken to carry out the pledges made by the republicans of West Virginia to take an honorable share of the debt.

Mr. CAMDEN. I will say in reply to the Senator and to other Senators on that side of the Chamber who have since repeated this charge, that this was the last action taken in West Virginia by a republican legislature in reference to this debt question.

The democrats elected a democratic governor and legislature in 1870, and the subsequent action to which I shall refer was by a democratic legislature, and under a resolution introduced by my colleague—who was then a member of the Legislature and whose democracy, I take it, will not be questioned—and commissioners appointed by a democratic governor. But I will state further that there has never been any issue between republicans and democrats in our State on this question, and as far as I know no political difference of opinion in regard to it exists, and there never has been any public action or official expression by either party in West Virginia that did not recognize her obligations to assume her equitable portion of the debt according to the constitution of 1863 when ascertained.

This democratic legislature of West Virginia, on the 15th of February, 1871, by a joint resolution authorized and directed the governor to appoint three commissioners to treat with the authorities of Virginia on this subject of the adjustment of the public debt, requiring them to make report thereof to the governor, to be by him communicated to the Legislature at the commencement of its next session, and made the necessary provisions for the payment of their expenses, which had been omitted in the resolution of the previous session. Under this resolution commissioners were appointed, and they made a very full and exhaustive report, to which I shall take occasion to refer.

But here it is proper to state in this connection that the General Assembly of Virginia, by a resolution adopted on the 11th of February, 1871, no doubt anticipating the provisions of the funding bill which was passed the following month, tendered to the State of West Virginia an arbitration of all matters touching the apportionment of the debt, thereby changing the manner of negotiations then authorized through commissioners from each State. The mode of arbitration was designated in the resolution. This was declined by the State of West Virginia by a resolution adopted on the 24th of February—the same month—less than two weeks after its passage by Virginia, for the reason that commissioners had already been empowered to act in the matter and for objections to the methods of arbitration, and the State of Virginia was again requested by this resolution to permit negotiations to proceed through the commissioners already authorized by the two States.

But Virginia, without awaiting the result of the action of the commissioners, passed the funding bill of March 30, 1871, and I desire to call attention to the fact that this act was passed by the first legislature elected under the constitution of the restored government of Virginia, and within less than a month after the suit in the Supreme Court of the United States between Virginia and West Virginia, relating to the territory in the counties of Jefferson and Berkeley, had been finally decided, and before it was possible for commissioners to act. By this bill Virginia agreed to fund two-thirds of her debt by issuing new bonds therefor, and to issue certificates for the other third, payable in accordance with such settlement as should hereafter be had between the two States.

It would follow from this that if no settlement is ever made with West Virginia, Virginia would be forever released from one-third of her debt, or so much of it as had been funded. Would it be unfair to say that Virginia was not from this time interested in making any settlement that would bring back upon her any portion of this third of the debt? But this bill, I understand, was passed with the consent of her creditors, or a majority of them, and accepted by nearly all, and therefore was a fair arrangement between debtor and creditor. If Virginia acted hastily in passing this bill, she was urged to it by strong reasons. She had been more or less complicated by embarrassments in regard to her State government from the close of the war up to this time. The interest on her debt had not been provided for. Her reputation was suffering, her creditors were urgent, and as already stated, consented, as I understand it, to the provisions of this bill. This action on her part did not change the status or affect the rights of West Virginia in regard to her proportion of the debt, although one-third was left unprovided for until a settlement was had with West Virginia. If I were to venture any criticism upon Virginia for passing this bill at that time, it would be that she did not take time to ascertain her own resources, and made mistakes which she found it necessary afterward to try to correct.

To show that it was not then seriously claimed by Virginia that West Virginia's share of the debt should be one-third, the message of the governor of Virginia of the 7th of December to the same session of the General Assembly that passed the funding bill is instructive. After quoting the constitutional provisions of Virginia in regard to the debt, the governor says:

> In advance of any settlement how can it be arbitrarily assumed that one-third of the debt is the proper portion to be paid by West Virginia? What is the basis of this assumption? Upon what principles and upon what facts is the estimate made?
> That we have a just claim against West Virginia I have no manner of doubt, and I am equally clear as to the basis upon which the settlement ought to be made. After deducting from the total debt the market or cash value of the assets and securities (bonds, stocks, &c.,) held by either State which originally belonged to the State of Virginia, the remainder of the debt should be apportioned between the two States in proportion to the population and taxable values of each. It is a plain and simple proposition not unlike the closing up of a copartnership. The assets must first be applied to the extinguishment of the liabilities, and if insufficient for this purpose the deficiency must be met by the copartners in proportion to the original interest of each respectively in the adventure. Upon these principles it appears to me the question at issue between the two States could be readily, fairly, and satisfactorily solved. Till, however, a final adjustment of this matter is reached it can only be regarded in the light of a claim or asset of uncertain value, not in any wise affecting our liability for the whole debt.

That is the language of the governor of Virginia.

The certificates issued under this bill without the consent or knowledge of West Virginia have improperly come to be known as "West Virginia certificates." To show the form and character of these certificates I submit one, and ask the Secretary to read it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

> TREASURER'S OFFICE,
> This is to certify that there is due unto —— heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns —— dollars, being one-third of bond surrendered under the provisions of an act approved March 30, 1871, entitled "An act to provide for the funding and payment of the public debt," (viz., bond No. ——, with interest amounting to —— dollars.) Payment of said one-third with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum will be provided for in accordance with such settlement as shall hereafter be had between the States of Virginia and West Virginia in regard to the public debt of the State of Virginia existing at the time of its dismemberment, and the State of Virginia holds said bonds so far as unfunded in trust for the holder hereof or his assigns.
> In testimony whereof this certificate has been signed by the treasurer and countersigned by the second auditor as provided by law.
> [SEAL.] ——— ———,
> Treasurer Commonwealth of Virginia.
> ——— ———, Second Auditor.

Mr. CAMDEN. This, Mr. President, was the end and completes, I think, the history of all legislation had by either State upon this subject, and I have recited it in detail in order to aid in a full understanding of the subject, and for the purpose of showing that West Virginia was prompt in keeping pace with every advance made by Virginia toward securing an equitable adjustment of the public debt under the constitutions of the two States.

This brings me, Mr. President, to the consideration of the report of the commissioners of West Virginia appointed under the act of February 15, 1871. The commissioners appointed were General John J. Jackson, of Parkersburgh, J. M. Bennett, of Lewis, and A. W. Campbell, of Wheeling—two democrats and one republican—all distinguished for their experience and ability. Mr. Bennett had been the auditor of the State of Virginia for eight years preceding the close of the war. Mr. Campbell, of the Wheeling Intelligencer, was one of the ablest and most prominent republicans in the State. General Jackson had been distinguished for over half a century in the public affairs of the two States.

These commissioners entered upon their duties promptly and earnestly, and judging from their report they met with but scant courtesy from the authorities of Virginia. After addressing an official communication to the governor of Virginia, dated August 9, 1871, the commissioners visited the capitol of Virginia, but they were not met by commissioners on the part of Virginia, nor did they receive any official recognition. They proceeded, nevertheless, laboriously to perform the duties assigned them and made a very full report. They ascertained—I quote from page 11 of the report—that the funded debt of Virginia on the 1st day of January, 1861, was $31,778,867.32, after all deductions; that all or nearly all of this debt was incurred and actually expended in works of public improvements, such as canals, railroads, turnpikes, plank-roads, and bridges; that of this vast sum, upward of $30,000,000 was expended for improvements in the present State of Virginia, and only about two and a half millions in the present State of West Virginia; that the present State of Virginia contains 41,352 square miles and West Virginia 20,000 square miles, or less than one-third; that the counties composing what is now Virginia contained, according to the census of 1860, a population of 1,220,829, and those composing West Virginia only a population of 374,985, or less than one-fourth. And by statement "C" of the report it was also shown that the whole revenue of the State of Virginia for the year 1860 was $3,936,873.56, of which only $647,079.96, or less than one-sixth, was assessed in the counties composing the territory of West Virginia, and $3,289,739.60 in the present territory of Virginia. It will thus be seen, Mr. President, that West Virginia would not be entitled to pay one-third of the debt of Virginia assigned by the funding bill of 1871, either upon the basis of territory, population, or revenue.

It will be observed also that all, or nearly all, of the debt was incurred and actually expended on works of public improvement, and that of the whole amount for which the debt was created only about two and a half millions was expended in the territory of West Virginia, and that chiefly in turnpike roads.

The report also shows that Virginia on the 1st day of January, 1861, held public-improvement securities to the amount of $33,131,090, and in addition thereto, as shown by the message of the governor of Virginia of March 8, 1870, there was an amount of $9,739,092.88 as lost, abandoned, surrendered, or released, and of course that portion which had been surrendered or released between 1861 and 1870 was without the consent of West Virginia.

The aggregate amount of securities was as great as the public debt of Virginia, and this debt created to pay for railroads and other public improvements within the present territory of Virginia, for which she was receiving the consequential benefits and from which West Virginia could derive no benefit.

The commissioners, after reviewing at length the principles of law and the authorities cited in the case of Hartman vs. Greenhow, referred to by the senior Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] assumed that West Virginia should bear her equitable proportion of the debt of Virginia, as provided by her constitution of 1863; that this equitable proportion should not be ascertained from the basis of territory, because one division of the territory might contain all the works of internal improvement, the more important cities and harbors on the seaboard, the fertile and improved lands, the public buildings, and other sources of wealth for which the debt had been created and expended, while the other division might be undeveloped and comparatively destitute of values and resources. They further concluded that the public improvements lying within the territory of Virginia, and for which Virginia holds the securities, are worth their cost to that Commonwealth; that these improvements cannot be enjoyed in common by West Virginia, as contemplated by the rule laid down by Kent, that "if a State should be divided in respect to territory its rights and obligations are not impaired, and if they have not been apportioned by special agreement their rights are to be enjoyed and their obligations fulfilled by all the parts in common," because the territories of the two States have nothing in common, are separated by mountains, with the navigable streams of each State running in opposite directions, the improvements for which the debt was created do not reach into the territory of West Virginia, and are therefore of no value to that State; and that Virginia, by selling, donating, and disposing of these works as her own property, without consulting West Virginia, must be treated as having accepted them upon that basis.

The commissioners therefore assume that the benefits conferred should be taken into consideration in arriving at an equitable adjustment, and conclude their report by charging to West Virginia all the money expended within her territory and crediting her with her estimated share of the public property and assets of Virginia not embraced in the debt, and upon this basis ascertained the amount due as West Virginia's proportion of the debt on January 1, 1861, to be $953,360.23.

This report was communicated by the governor to the Legislature of West Virginia on the 16th of January, 1872, and has remained unchallenged. The governor in presenting it to the Legislature used the following language:

> It will demand your serious consideration whether you will now proceed to assume what you may conceive to be the equitable proportion of the public debt of Virginia prior to the 1st of January, 1861, or whether you will in the light of past events await further action on the part of Virginia.

No further action has been taken on the part of either State, and there the matter rests.

Now, sir, there is one more criticism that deserves attention. It has been directly charged more than once by Senators during this discussion that because the formal recognition of the obligation of West Virginia to pay her equitable proportion of the debt of Virginia contained in the constitution of 1863 does not appear in the constitution of 1872, that the democratic party, as soon as it obtained ascendency in the State, repudiated this obligation.

A few words of explanation will make this plain. The constitutional convention of 1872 had before it the report of the commissioners to which I have been referring. West Virginia has no bonded debt, and never had, and both constitutions contained provisions prohibiting her from making any except for certain specified purposes; and in leaving out section 8 of article 8 of the constitution of 1863, which provided for assuming an equitable proportion of the debt of Virginia, provision was made in the constitution of 1872, in section 5 of article 10, to the extent of providing, in connection with section 4 of the same article, for the payment of the debt when ascertained.

Section 4 provides that no debt shall be contracted by the State except, among other things, "to redeem a previous liability of the State."

Section 5 provides "that the power of taxation of the Legislature shall extend to provisions for the payment of the State debt and the interest thereon;" so that the constitution of 1872, instead of recog nizing the obligation to assume an equitable proportion of the debt, provides for its payment when ascertained.

And now, Mr. President, having presented in full the record on the subject of the debt between the two Virginias, I shall leave the question on this record without any further remarks.

Mr. VEST obtained the floor.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to ask the Senator from West Virginia a question as to an item of fact. I did not quite understand what had become of the securities which Virginia held on account of the public improvements of which the Senator spoke. Has she still those securities?

Mr. CAMDEN. She has.

Mr. BLAIR. The whole amount

Mr. CAMDEN. The whole amount.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that, so far as my knowledge is concerned, in no way has West Virginia received benefit for any of the moneys spent in the territory of the old State. My colleague has said that about thirty million dollars of the debt as it stood in 1861 had been expended in the old State and about two million five hundred thousand dollars in the new State.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY in the chair.) The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has the floor; does he yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. VEST. I do not understand the purpose of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I wish to make a few remarks that will not occupy more than two minutes, if the Senator will permit me to do so.

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course, with the understanding that I can take the floor afterward, I will yield.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to make a correction of something which was said by the Senator from Florida?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. During the remarks of the honorable Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] he stated that spendthrifts under guardianship were disqualified from voting by the constitution and laws of Massachusetts, a statement which I challenged; but on pointing out to me the clause in the constitution which disqualifies all persons under guardianship I became satisfied that I was in error, and that the original statement of the Senator from Florida was correct; and, as I said then, that is a provision of law which I do not suppose is resorted to in the whole State ten times in a year; it is a very rare provision of law under which if a person is a spendthrift a guardian of his estate may be appointed. I desire simply to have the clause of the Massachusetts statute read, which will show the exact condition of the law on that subject. I ask the Chief Clerk to read the ninth section on page 544 of the general statutes of Massachusetts.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

When a person by excessive drinking, gaming, idleness, or debauchery of any kind, so spends, wastes, or lessens his estate, as to expose himself or his family to want or suffering, or any place to charge or expense for the support of himself or his family, the mayor and aldermen or selectmen of the city or town of which such spendthrift is an inhabitant or resident, or upon which he is or may become chargeable, may present a complaint to the probate court, setting forth the facts and circumstances of the case, and praying to have a guardian appointed. The court shall cause notice of not less than fourteen days to be given to the supposed spendthrift, of the time and place appointed for the hearing; and if after a full hearing it appears that he comes within the above description, the court shall appoint a guardian of his person and estate.

Mr. HOAR. That jurisdiction is lodged in the court of probate, from all whose decrees an appeal lies as a matter of course to the supreme court of the Commonwealth; and that any use of that could possibly be made by mechanism or contrivance for disfranchising voters is utterly without foundation.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I do not care about occupying the time of the Senate any longer than to refer to what occurred a few days ago on this floor. The honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] for whom no one has a higher regard than I, taunted me with the fact that the Legislature of my State had refused to sustain the course which its Senators had taken in this controversy. To understand the matter fully I will read from the RECORD of April 6 what actually took place:

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator allow me to suggest another fact, that in the Legislature of Pennsylvania yesterday an endeavor was made to secure an indorsement for the combination you have just made; and they were glad to lay it on the table.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. How does the gentleman know they were glad to lay it on the table? My own impression is that the body is sorry for its action to-day, and that before long it will indorse every act of both its Senators in this body.

Mr. BECK. It did not do so yesterday.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. They will do it in the future.

Mr. BECK. After you get there you may make them do it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. No.

Mr. BECK. They will not do it without.

The Senator says: "After you get there you may make them do it." I beg to inform him that there is no man living who has the power to make the Legislature of Pennsylvania do anything that they do not believe to be right and proper, and I certainly would not arrogate to myself the power to make them do anything against their own free will. The man who undertakes to do that will very soon find himself in the position of the shearer who came back shorn. I think I am personally acquainted with nearly all of the members of our Legislature and I can therefore speak from personal knowledge when I say that a better, nobler and more patriotic body of men never existed.

Since the debate which I have just quoted took place the Legislature of Pennsylvania, believing in the sacred principles of right and justice, have passed a resolution indorsing the action of the republican Senators on this floor. I send to the Clerk's desk a certified copy of that resolution and ask to have it read for the especial information of the Senator from Kentucky. I have no doubt but that all the other States of the North will follow this patriotic example of the Legislature of Pennsylvania in due course.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE, April 7, 1881.

Resolved, (if the house concur,) That the Legislature of Pennsylvania regards with approval the attitude taken by the republican members of the United States Senate in insisting upon the right of the majority to control the organization of that body, and hopes that the unanimity which has thus far characterized their proceedings will be maintained.

[Extract from the Journal.]

THOS. B. COCHRAN,
Chief Clerk Senate.

In the House of Representatives, April 7, 1881: The foregoing resolution concurred in.

HENRY HUHN,
Chief Clerk House of Representatives.

Approved the 8th day of April, 1881.

HENRY M. HOYT,
Governor.

Mr. BECK. May I say one word?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. BECK. That is as mild a type of indorsement as I ever read or heard read. I saw that some proceedings were had in the Legislature where the names of some distinguished gentlemen from Virginia appeared. They do not seem to appear in that resolution. Why they are omitted I do not know.

I presume that the Senator from Pennsylvania is sincere in his belief that the Legislature of Pennsylvania is the most patriotic body of men upon earth. I have always thought the people who agreed with me were the most patriotic. The highest evidence of their integrity in the mind of the Senator from Pennsylvania is that they generally do what he thinks is right, and nobody can make them do anything but what he does think is right; but they are careful to think that is right which he thinks is right. The Senator only exhibited more power than I thought he had when he could do by a telegram what I thought would take a personal visit to accomplish.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I congratulate the democratic party and the country upon the fact that at last the issue between the two parties in the present remarkable contest is distinctly and sharply and unmistakably defined. The democratic party have never been actuated in this conflict by the desire simply to attain possession of the offices of the Senate. If such had been the case two years ago, with an absolute majority and absolute control, the democratic party would have taken every office in the Senate without question or debate. With that absolute power in our hands the pay-rolls of the Senate do-day develop the fact that within a very few hundred dollars of one-half of the patronage of the Senate is in the control of the republican party. My own State of Missouri, giving to the democratic party the largest electoral vote of any State in the Union, received out of the patronage of the Senate the miserable pittance of two messenger places amounting together to $2,000.

Sir, the offices of the Senate constitute not the issue between these parties. The issue is defined and well known to the Senate and to the country. It was read to us by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON;] it was declaimed to us by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] in a campaign speech, during the delivery of which I could almost smell the barbecued meat and hear the shouts of the approving multitude. It has been shrieked and yelled at us by the Senators from Massachusetts. Finally, in the grave and deliberate accents of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] we have had laid down with emphatic precision the object of his party and the question between us.

That object, in so many words and stripped of all rhetoric and all surplusage, is simply this: the national republican party of the United States proposes, with its vast prestige, its great influence, its patronage in the Senate, and its Federal and executive patronage, to throw itself into the contest in the State of Virginia between the two factions of the democratic party, and to crush out with this unequal aid the real and true democracy of that glorious old Commonwealth. The democrats in the Senate are called upon in the name of the Constitution and under penalty of being denounced as revolutionists and traitors to sit supinely here and see this monstrous outrage perpetrated upon that gallant democracy in the State of Virginia. If democrats in the Senate should sit here supinely and submit to any such thing as that they would deserve to be branded as dishonored men. Every consideration of principle, every consideration of honor, every instinct of chivalry, calls upon us to stand by our brethren in the State of Virginia in making their last great contest, after everything else is lost save honor, for the historic glory of that Commonwealth, the mother of States and statesmen and of the democratic party.

I tell the gentlemen now, in no spirit of bravado, that, rather than submit to this interference by the national republican party in that contest, and rather than see the real democracy of Virginia stricken down after this fashion, we will stay here, God willing, until the ice again gorges the Potomac and the snows of December wreath these hills in their winding-sheet.

Mr. President, because the democratic party in the Senate have taken this position, we are denounced as guilty of revolution and of treason. The Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who, I am glad to see, is entering the Chamber, announced to us but the other day the monstrous doctrine that the only rights of the minority here are to debate, and when the debate has closed the majority vote, and the voice of the majority is the voice of God. Sir, it is a monstrous doctrine; it is parliamentary absolutism.

The Senator from Massachusetts in eloquent tones told us the other day that a Senator of the United States was responsible alone to his conscience and to his God. What becomes of individual responsibility? What becomes of the answer that every honest man must make in his official capacity to his own judgment and to his own conscience if the doctrine of the Senator from Ohio is true, that the only right given to a minority is the right of debate, and that the voice of the majority is then the voice of God?

Sir, it is not true that the voice of the majority is the supreme law in the United States. A President of the United States may be elected by a minority of the votes of the people. General Garfield received 59 majority in the electoral college and 3,700 and odd plurality of the popular vote. The Presidents of the United States have been elected by a minority of the popular vote of this Union. The Constitution of the United States is the supreme law. The majority must act and wield their power under the Constitution and the laws made in pursuance thereof.

What is revolution? It is action outside of a legally organized government. What is treason? It is levying war against the government or giving aid and comfort to its enemies. Does the Senator from Ohio mean that fifteen Senators, acting under their oaths, shall sit here supinely and passively and allow a law to be enacted which tears down the Government, which subverts the liberties of the people, which destroys their best interests? Yet, according to the Senator, they must bow to the will of the majority as the will of God.

The grandest triumphs in the parliamentary history of England have been by minorities using parliamentary means to defeat the oppressive will of a majority which they considered detrimental to public interest. It is the duty of the minority to use every parliamentary method under the Constitution or known to the law to defeat what they conceive to be an outrage upon the liberties or interests of the people.

What has been the practice of the republican party whose leader reads us a lecture upon this floor in regard to treason and revolution? During the two years that I have sat in this Chamber I have seen the minority upon that side of this Hall violate the Constitution, trample upon the rules of the Senate, sit here supinely and placidly and destroy a quorum by refusing to vote, and when the rule of the Senate requiring them to give their reasons for not voting has been read to them they would receive it with derision and with sneers. But the Senator from Ohio says that he is not responsible for this; he was not then a member of the Senate. But the Senator came into this Hall and filibustered for two weeks to prevent the will of the majority.

The Constitution of the United States provides that a quorum of this body can organize and proceed to business. We met here at the commencement of this executive session, organized, sent a committee to the President, proceeded to the enactment of business, and confirmed some twenty-five or thirty nominations in executive session. This Senate was as much a Senate then as if every member had been in his seat. We heard the argument the other day that one majority is as good as a hundred. When the Senate was organized and the President was informed of that fact, was it not the Senate of the United States? Ought not a majority of the Senate then to have prevailed? I ask the Senator from Ohio why did he filibuster against that majority? Oh, he says, for delay until the seats upon that side of the Chamber had been filled up. Suppose it had taken two months, three months, four months, to have filled up those seats, how long would the Senator have waited? Did he not wait for a partisan advantage? Did he not wait after the Senate had been organized under the Constitution? Did he not then wait for the organization by the republican party, and for that alone? I want to know where was the voice of God then?

Sir, the voice of God upon the democratic side of this Chamber is a very different intonation from the voice of God upon the republican side. The Deity shifts. The majority that existed here then for two weeks was a constitutional majority, and no Senator upon that side of the Chamber will deny it. If you can filibuster for two weeks the principle allows you to filibuster for two months or for two years; but you assert it to suit your own convenience and your own party policy, and when democrats assert it it is treason and revolution.

Mr. President, in what interest and for what purpose are these charges made against the democratic party in the Senate? I am not here to attack and assail motives. I care nothing about motives. I am here to discuss political actions and political sequences.

A coalition exists here, open, notorious, and unblushing. A coalition based upon community of principle and mutuality of opinion is legitimate. Parties based upon mutuality of opinion and of principle between their members are legitimate parties, and command the respect, if not the admiration, of mankind; but a coalition without mutuality of opinion or principle is contrary to public morality, and should be denounced by every fair-minded and right-thinking man. Where a coalition is made simply for power, for office, without community or mutuality of opinion or of interest it verges upon a corrupt coalition, if it is not actually one. When the younger Pitt stood upon the floor of the House of Commons and denounced the coalition between Lord North and Charles James Fox as a damnable and incestuous union, and said, "In the name of the people of Great Britain I forbid the bans," the whole civilized world said "amen" to that denunciation, and the people of Great Britain did forbid the bans. They stamped that damnable and incestuous union under their feet. North and Fox went into retirement, and Pitt assumed the control of the government. Of all the statesmen, in my judgment, whose names emblazon with glory the pages of English history, the name of Charles James Fox is the first. But he, advocate of human rights, hero of the truth, orator, statesman, and soldier in civil warfare, ever at the front, even he, with his great name and talents, was stricken down by that fair-minded instinct for consistency and fair play which courses in the blood of all Anglo-Saxon peoples.

In our own political history a suspicion was raised in regard to that great commoner, Henry Clay, and Adams. Of that coalition, denounced by John Randolph of Roanoke as the union of Puritan and black-leg, a coalition in my judgment never based upon any corrupt motive, the bare suspicion terminated the public career of one man and haunted the death-bed of another.

Mr. President, what is this coalition? Is there any mutuality of opinion or principle between the republican party and the Senator from Virginia? Where is it? Does the republican party in the Senate Chamber sympathize with the opinions of the Senator from Virginia in regard to readjusting the State debt of that Commonwealth? When did the republican party, the great party of public credit and national faith, the party that says "an honest dollar for an honest day's work," the party that says "no discount in the way of silver or greenbacks or legal tenders but gold"—when did that party become the ally, the sympathizer, with gentlemen who propose not to repudiate but to eliminate a portion of their State debt? "Eliminate;" a good word, a word very much like "occupy," which Doll Tear-sheet said "was an excellent good word before it was ill-sorted;" a good word, but "most damnably abused." Eliminate a portion of the State debt!

The Senator from Ohio stands here to-day as the advocate and defender of the Senator from Virginia. He says both parties in Virginia are seeking to avoid the payment of an honest State obligation. What would the Senate think if I should say but eighteen months have elapsed since the Senator from Ohio as Secretary of the Treasury threatened with removal a Federal official in that State because he belonged to the readjuster party, or, as it was termed in the correspondence, the party of repudiation? What would the country say if it should turn out to be true, as it is true, that the Secretary of the Treasury, now the Senator from Ohio, gave it to be understood officially that if any Federal official in that State joined the readjuster party "off goes his head?" There was a Mr. Van Auken, tobacco inspector at the city of Petersburgh, that historic city which is the residence of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE.] In October, 1879, news was brought to the Department of the Treasury that this man had dared to join the readjuster party in Virginia. Immediately a correspondence ensued, which I shall ask the Clerk to read. I desire to make contributions to the literature of this debate, and I think that is monstrous good reading.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, October 16, 1879.

SIR: This office is informed that you are exerting your influence for the readjustment, and thereby the repudiation, of the State debt of Virginia. This is looked upon by thinking men as immoral, and therefore inconsistent with the dignity of an official. Please inform this office upon receipt of this letter whether this be true or not, and, if true, accompany your statement with your resignation.

Respectfully,

GREEN B. RAUM, Commissioner.

J. H. VAN AUKEN, Esq.,
Tobacco Inspector, Petersburgh, Virginia.

UNITED STATES INTERNAL REVENUE,
COLLECTOR'S OFFICE, DISTRICT VIRGINIA,
Petersburgh, October 17, 1879.

SIR: Your communication of the 16th instant was received by me to-day with infinite amazement, and I was at first inclined to think it a huge joke, but remembering that the perpetration of official jokes is not usual, the succeeding thought and desire was to know the name of your informant, which I earnestly beg you to furnish me.

My position upon this debt question was publicly and decisively taken long since and I do not suppose there is a citizen of this city, or scarcely in the State, who does not know what that position is.

I am the only republican in the city that has made public speeches urging the honest payment of the State's obligations. I inclose you a copy of resolutions written by myself and supported in a speech before an audience of over five hundred people at the Harrison Street Baptist Church in this city some three weeks since. Myself and Colonel Brady went to Washington on Sunday last as a committee to secure the presence of Hon. Frederick Douglass in our city to address the colored people upon this question, which is the all-engrossing one here. Failing to secure Douglass a letter was secured which I send you, as published in the Richmond Dispatch, from a copy furnished by me.

I must again beg you to give me the source of your information. By my position I have incurred the active hostility of the old "ring" of ballot-box stuffers and "bulldozers" here and of such colored people as they have been able to delude by their specious, plausible arguments, and I am confident that they are the inspiration, to say the least, of your information.

Very respectfully, yours,

J. H. VAN AUKEN,
Tobacco Inspector, Petersburgh, Virginia.

Hon. GREEN B. RAUM,
Commissioner Internal Revenue, Washington, D. C.

Resolutions sustaining the public debt.

Whereas the national republican party has ever firmly set its face against repudiation in all its forms, against the scaling of honest obligations, honestly incurred, and has ever believed in carrying out in letter and in spirit every agreement, or contract, whether referring to the debts of the nation, States, cities, or individuals, and through this highly honorable and moral position it has managed the finances of the nation with a success hitherto unparalleled in the history of nations and has placed them on the highest plane of honesty, morality, and success, and thus, in spite of warring and factious opposition, made the credit of this Government equal to that of the proudest on the globe:

1. Resolved, That the republicans of the city of Petersburgh, feeling an honest pride in the glorious record of that grand old party of which we feel it a supreme honor to be deemed a part and parcel, do hereby make its creed our creed, its faith our faith, and emulating its glorious example, we do hereby pledge our honor to use every effort to maintain the honor, the credit, and the good faith of the State of Virginia.

2. Resolved, That "the honest payment of an honest debt" is a cardinal principle of the republican creed, and that we will consent to no departures therefrom, nor countenance any action that will bring further ruin and disgrace to the State of Virginia, and that we will do no act that will cast a stain on the hitherto untarnished escutcheon of the republican party.

3. Resolved, That the history of the world teaches that the maintenance of public and private credit has been in all ages and in all lands the foundation of individual progress, prosperity, and happiness, while repudiation has brought universal, moral, political, and financial degradation, poverty and ruin in its train.

4. Resolved, That the fund set apart by the constitution for the maintenance of the public free schools must be kept sacred and inviolate, for upon the education and intelligence of our youth rest the future glory, the grandeur, the prosperity, and happiness of our State and country.

5. Resolved, That as our motto in the last campaign was "An honest dollar for an honest day's work," so now it shall be: "Let Virginia honestly pay, in honest money, what she honestly owes; an honest ballot, an honest count." On this broad republican platform we earnestly invite all men, of whatever political faith, to aid us in delivering the old State from the evils of forcible readjusting, which means repudiation with all its terrible consequences.

6. Resolved, That we regard the triumph of republican principles as vital to the prosperity and salvation of the State, and to this end we pledge our most earnest endeavors.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, October 18, 1879.

SIR: This office is in receipt of yours of the 17th instant, together with communications from J. L. Waterman and Collector Brady in reply to office letter of the 16th instant, in which I informed you that you had been charged with advocating the readjustment or repudiation of the Virginia State debt. In reply I would state that your statements as well as those of the gentlemen above referred to, in relation to your position in this matter, are entirely satisfactory to this office, and the correspondence has this day been referred to the Secretary with the information that you have been so advised. You desire the name of the informant. In reply I would say that the information was forwarded in a letter written by the Postmaster-General to the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, the name of the informant not being given. Coming from such a source I was greatly surprised, well knowing, or believing at least, that such action upon your part would not be in accordance with your political or private feelings.

Respectfully,

GREEN B. RAUM, Commissioner.

J. H. VAN AUKEN, Esq.,
Tobacco Inspector, Petersburgh, Virginia.

Mr. VEST. So it seems that this subordinate officer, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, acted under the advice and by the direction of the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, who acted upon information given to him by the Postmaster-General, who had just before that been engaged in the campaign in Virginia attempting to persuade the colored troops to desert the Mahone banner and rally to the regular republican standard, which was so eminently successful that about ninety-nine out of every hundred voted the readjuster ticket. The Secretary of the Treasury, it seems, if that correspondence is true, in October, 1879, thought that Mr. Van Auken ought to be removed from the position of tobacco inspector because he belonged to this highly immoral organization, this repudiating readjuster party of Virginia; but a change has come over the honorable Senator, as sudden and miraculous as that which fell upon Saul of Tarsus when he journeyed from Jerusalem to Damascus "breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord." A voice from heaven or some other direction has reached the honorable Senator, and now instead of removing an official he wants to put Mr. Riddleberger, the author of the repudiating readjusting scheme in Virginia, into an office of the Senate, although he is an unrepentant confederate cavalry captain.

Sir, how is it that to-day the honorable Senator from Ohio himself, with the Senator from Virginia, is engaged in such amorous dalliance as has never been seen outside of a bridal chamber where Hymen throws his mystic veil over the rites of love? How is it to-day that this inordinate passion has absorbed the Senator from Ohio, when barely eighteen months ago he thought the honor of the Government and of the republican party demanded that any man who dared to become a readjuster should immediately leave his official position?

Mr. President, that is not all. The Senator from Ohio the other day made this declaration to the Senate in answer to the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD:]

Now what is the fourth reason he gives? Oh! my friend goes into very eloquent—I am sorry I cannot follow him—tropes and figures to denounce repudiation; repudiation is the evil that threatens our national credit. So it is, but yet he is one of the honored members of a party that has had control in every State of the Union where repudiation has been proposed or has been adopted. If the republican party as it is now organized ever proposed repudiation in any State or community, when or where?

"Now, by my troth, these be gallant words." When or where, says the Senator from Ohio, did any community ever repudiate when under the control of the republican party? The Senator read here from a book prepared by a Federal official, one Mr. Porter, that $130,000,000 of State debt had been repudiated in the South. Why, Mr. President, does he not well know, do not the records of the Federal courts show, that in the Northwestern States over $100,000,000 of municipal securities have been repudiated and are to-day repudiated? Who does not know that the most terrible financial conflict that ever came off upon this continent was in the State of Iowa between the people who repudiated their obligations there and the Federal tribunals, and that struggle at last came even to the climax that General Grant, then President of the United States, threatened to use the Army of the Union in order to enforce the mandates of the Federal tribunals. Has the Senator never heard of the Macoupin County bonds of Illinois, the Otoe bonds of Nebraska, the Clarke County bonds of Iowa, the bonds in my own State of Missouri, amounting to over $30,000,000? Over $100,000,000 of securities in Illinois, in Iowa, in Nebraska, in Minnesota, in Missouri, in Kansas have been repudiated, and to-day the struggle is going on between the bondholders in the East and the people of those municipalities in regard to the payment of those debts; and yet the distinguished Senator stands here and says no republican community ever repudiated! Has he read the history of the State debt of Minnesota? Has the Senator never heard of the repudiation of $5,000,000, the entire debt of that State, which exports in one single year eighty million bushels of wheat?

Mr. MCMILLAN rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. VEST. Yes.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Did I understand the Senator from Missouri to say that the entire State debt of Minnesota, amounting to $5,000,000, had been repudiated?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from Missouri is mistaken in his statement. The bonds the Senator refers to were a portion of an authorized issue of bonds as guarantor by the State for the indebtedness of certain railroad companies. That indebtedness was contracted under a democratic administration, the only democratic administration the State of Minnesota has ever had.

The Senator from Kentucky the other day referred to a democratic contestant for a seat in the Congress of the United States against a republican, Mr. Donnelly contesting the seat of Mr. Washburne. He has opposed the payment of this debt constantly and determinedly, and the matter has been submitted by the Legislature of Minnesota to the people of Minnesota. They, believing that there was no consideration for the bonds, that they were issued fraudulently, have never yet voted for the payment of the amount of bonds issued, which was but half the original loan. But if the Senator is aware of the state of affairs there, the Legislature of Minnesota at its present session passed an act for the payment of those bonds upon a proposition of the holders of the bonds, and that legislation now is in process of being carried into execution.

I will not interrupt the Senator further at present, but may take occasion hereafter to state the facts more fully.

Mr. VEST. A commission was appointed at the last session of the Legislature, which, I understand, refused to act; but I do not want to do the State any injustice. I think I am familiar with the history of that indebtedness and its present condition, and I will read from the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, which ought to be good authority with the republican party, constituted as it is, a history of that indebtedness.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Before the Senator reads that opinion I trust he will allow me to say that that issue has never been involved in any action before the Supreme Court of the United States; and any reference to it is merely incidental.

Mr. VEST. Very good; we will see. I have taken the trouble, anticipating the denial of the Senator from Minnesota, to epitomize the facts in regard to the State debt of Minnesota. I say it is as clear a case of repudiation as can be conceived by the imagination of mortal man, and is without excuse, for the State was never ravaged by war; its virgin soil has never been scarred except by the plowshare of the agriculturist—not like the Southern States, torn and ravaged by infantry, artillery, and cavalry, and then given over bound to the mercy of the rabid wolves, the carpet-baggers, who followed the South as the coyote does the wounded deer.

Now, sir, what are the facts in regard to this matter? By act of March 3, 1857, Congress gave to the Territory of Minnesota 6,000,000 acres of land to aid in the construction of certain railroads. The first Legislature of the State enacted an amendment to the constitution loaning the State credit to the roads to the amount of $5,000,000, and the people ratified the amendment by a vote of 27,023 yeas to 733 nays. The bonds of the State were issued as the work on the roads progressed. And the opinion of the court goes on and gives the proportion in which they were issued; and $2,275,000 of State bonds were issued and sold by the contractors in New York and other cities. Not one cent upon them, principal or interest, has ever been paid.

Mr. McMILLAN. The bonds were issued upon a mandamus issued by the supreme court of Minnesota to the executive of that State.

Mr. VEST. They were issued under the law, and it does not lie in the mouth of the morality party to say anything against authority like that, the party which pretends that the democratic party are the revolutionary and treasonable party of this country, and they par excellence are the party of law, order, morality, and eternal salvation. They were issued according to law, and were put in the hands of innocent purchasers before maturity, I suppose, for a valuable consideration. Nobody has ever heard of a man who was not an innocent purchaser before maturity and for a valuable consideration.

The State held a mortgage on all the property of the railroad companies to secure it against loss by reason of any default by the roads in the payment of interest on their bonds; and in 1858, such default being made, the State promptly foreclosed the mortgage and purchased the property, and got the whole of it; cars, railroad tracks, lands, everything that these companies had, passed into the hands of the State government of Minnesota.

Notwithstanding this, when they had all the assets, the republican State convention of 1859 passed a resolution opposing the payment of the interest, for which the State was solemnly bound; and the democratic State convention, the party of repudiation, according to the Senator from Ohio, of the same year, passed a resolution in favor of paying the interest, and preserving the good faith and honor of the State.

In 1860 the republican legislature, by a vote of both houses, passed a resolution virtually repealing what was known as the loan amendment, and also submitted to the people a resolution prohibiting the Legislature from paying any portion of the railroad bonds without first submitting the question to the people. This was adopted by the usual republican majority. This an interpellation of my own, not in the opinion of the Supreme Court. In 1878 a compromise of fifty cents on the dollar was submitted to the people and voted down; they were not even willing to pay one-half of the debt; and last winter another act was passed by the Legislature to the same effect, but the commission, as is reported, refused to act, and the debt remains unpaid, principal and interest.

If that is not repudiation, I should like to know what it is. Every dollar of that debt, principal and interest, remains unpaid. But I do not choose that this shall stand upon my own declaration in the Senate. What says the Supreme Court of the United States? The Senator says this is obiter dictum; the Supreme Court had no right to say it. It is your own court organized by your party, put in existence for your own partisan purposes, to bring about what you thought was your interest on the legal-tender question. You cannot go back upon the voice of your own creatures, your own inspiration. It came from you; the court belongs to you.

After the State of Minnesota had bought in all the assets of these railroads under the foreclosure of the mortgage, the republican legislature then gave these assets away to other corporations. Selah Chamberlain, of the city of Chicago, held $500,000 of these Minnesota repudiated bonds. He could not sue the State; and the late lamented Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. Carpenter, I believe, advised him to sue the railroad companies that had received these assets from the State. He brought a suit which was tried in the district and circuit courts and finally came to the Supreme Court of the United States; and here is what the court say, after stating the facts which I have given taken from their decision:

> Pending these proceedings the bonds of the State in the hands of the complainant remained unpaid, and they are still unpaid. The faith of the State, solemnly pledged for the payment of both principal and interest, has never been kept. So far from keeping it, the State, as early as November, 1860, adopted an amendment to its constitution prohibiting any law which levied a tax or made other provision for such payment from taking effect until the same had been submitted to a vote of the people and been adopted by them. This prohibition, if not a violation of the State's pledge, conflicts with its spirit. The bonds issued are legal obligations. The State is bound by every consideration of honor and good faith to pay them. Were she amenable to the tribunals of the country as private individuals are, no court of justice would withhold its judgment against her in an action for their enforcement.
> The complainant, under these circumstances, finding no relief from the pledged faith of the State, and unable to pursue any remedies at law against her on the bonds, seeks to charge with their payment the two hundred and forty sections mortgaged by the company under the amendment of 1858 and purchased by the State under the foreclosure of the mortgage, and now held by the defendant railroad companies.

That is the solemn adjudication and decision of the highest judicial tribunal under the Constitution, and yet the Senator from Ohio stands here and asks me and asks the democratic party to point out a republican community in which there has been repudiation of an honest debt.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President——

Mr. VEST. I prefer that the Senator should answer me afterward.

Mr. McMILLAN. I will take another occasion, then, to respond to the Senator's statement. There are many of the facts stated by the Senator that I do not believe are correctly stated. So far as that indebtedness is concerned it is but a single issue of the bonds. The bonds for State indebtedness in Minnesota have always commanded a premium in the New York market. This issue of bonds has always been contested, as I remarked to the Senator, upon the ground that the bonds were not issued for a consideration and that they were fraudulently issued.

As for myself, in regard to the payment of this debt, I should be glad to see every dollar of the indebtedness paid; but as between the parties in the State of Minnesota the Senator cannot stand up there and advise his partisan friends to vote in favor of the payment of these bonds. It has never been a party question. The party friends of the Senator have been decidedly opposed to the payment of these bonds, and the parties in that State upon the payment of these bonds have never taken a position antagonistic to each other. There are leading members of both parties who have been laboring to have that debt extinguished, and they would gladly see it done, but it was an inheritance from a democratic administration which we have never been able yet to relieve ourselves of.

Mr. VEST. It is useless to spend words about it. The State of Minnesota gives two republican votes to one democratic. Who is responsible for the condition of that State financially and otherwise? Who is responsible by every fair and just rule of political responsibility? Sir, the Senators on the other side stand here and assail the Southern States, they call them the solid democratic South and the repudiating South, and assuming that we are so ignorant that we know not the truth or dare not state it, they defy us to point to a republican community that has engaged in repudiation. I point the Senator to five hundred. The records of the Federal courts are full all over the Northwest of suits on repudiated municipal obligations. I speak of it the more freely because my own State has $30,000,000 or more of such bonds outstanding. Unjust as they are, unjust as the bonds the thieving carpet-bag governments put upon the people of the South, unjust, iniquitous, unholy, branded with fraud and corruption all over as is the history of this bonded indebtedness in the State of Missouri, it came from the republican party; it came in that dark era of proscription and disfranchisement when the intelligence and the property of the State stood by the side of the ballot-box and saw the pauperism, the ignorance, the fraud, the vice, the iniquity of the State taking possession of her revenues and squandering them for their own party purposes. For five years I stood an unwilling but not disinterested spectator and saw my property voted away by irresponsible vagabonds. I saw ministers of the Gospel driven from the pulpit and forbidden to preach the religion of Christ; teachers expelled from the schools; even those blessed women, the Sisters of Charity, who know no nationality or color or clime or sex in the administration of relief, were forbidden to go to the bedside of the dying. For five long years this was done in the name of republicanism. I saw men who had carried their muskets in the war of 1812, who had never even sympathized with the South in her revolt against the Union, who came on their tottering limbs to the polls to put in their ballots in regard to the destiny of the land for the mastery of which they had fought against the Indians and the wild beasts, when with rifle in one hand and plow in the other they had blazed the pathway of civilization—I saw those men driven away in the name of republicanism. All this was done under the Drake constitution, the author of which lately figured in the papers of this city as a most orthodox Christian gentleman who proposed to drive a clergyman from the ministry because he had married a Catholic woman.

In Missouri the county courts in those days were bought and sold like sheep in the shambles. We who owned the property in the State were forced to be silent. Unscrupulous militia roamed through the borders of Missouri, pistol in hand, and whenever a man declared himself a democrat he was disloyal to the Union and disfranchised at once. Why, sir, in a county adjacent to the one in which I lived three judges of the county court, composing that tribunal and having the power to issue bonds, issued $100,000 of fraudulent bonds at the dead hour of midnight, and they were thrown upon Wall street and there sold to innocent purchasers for a valuable consideration! One of the county-court judges, a shining and leading member of an orthodox church, being attacked by that dread disease, typhoid fever, as his feet touched the cold waters of the Jordan of death his conscience awakened, and he sent for the minister of his church. With his relatives around him, weeping children, and sorrowing friends, he confessed that in a certain stable at a certain hour he got $5,000 from a certain leading republican for issuing those bonds. That confession was made at eleven o'clock at night. At three o'clock in the morning the crisis of the disease came and to the wonder of the community he recovered. He immediately swore that his confession was the raving of delirium! He was re-elected by the republican party and was vindicated at the polls. The disfranchised democracy proceeded to pay the bonds under the mandate of the Federal tribunal. My friend from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] suggests that he could be received with Riddleberger. He would have been received by the republican party of this Senate with avidity and gulped down without a single word of protest or question.

One hundred million dollars of such securities were repudiated in those States; and yet the Senator from Ohio tells us that no republican community was ever known to repudiate any obligation at all! I have no doubt many of the bonds repudiated are fraudulent, but so were the bonds of the Southern States, and all I ask is that even-handed justice may be done to both sections.

But, Mr. President, the great, overwhelming, stupendous argument of gentlemen on the other side in favor of this coalition, a coalition without congeniality of principle or opinion, is an honest ballot and a fair count! They can swallow repudiation, they can take down elimination, they can lunch on readjustment, if you will just give them a fair ballot and an honest count! Now, Mr. President, let us look at that for a moment. If there was one issue in the last presidential election which overshadowed all others, it was "the solid South," the tissue ballot, the ghastly and ghostly night-rider of that ill-fated region. From the speech of the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] at the Academy of Music down to the merest rant at a township gathering there was not a campaign speech made by a republican from the beginning to the end of the canvass that did not have in it "Hancock and intimidation at the South, tissue ballots, rifle clubs, night-riders, and the ghostly Ku Klux Klan." There was not a man in the United States so ignorant that he did not know the issue; it was placarded on the walls; it was put in double-leaded editorials at the head of your papers; it was preached from the sacred pulpit in the name of Christ, "vote for Hancock and you vote for oppressing the negro; vote for Garfield and you vote for the party of progress and liberty, a free ballot, and an honest count." Before the Senator from Virginia that proposition was distinctly and emphatically made. The Senator from Virginia was no unsophisticated country gentleman to be caught by a flaming editorial. He is an old politician trained to the harness. He was at the head of a party in the State of Virginia which had elected him to the Senate, and here was the great issue put before him. Hancock and the solid South, tissue ballots, rifle-clubs, Ku Klux Klan; Garfield, and a free ballot and an honest count. Which did he take? Where did he go? There was a chance for the Senator from Virginia to show his devotion to a free ballot and an honest count. With all these magnificent orations resounding around him, with all these editorials he deliberately cast his lot in with the tissue-ballot party, as the republicans called it, of the solid South, and not only that but in his superserviceable zeal he telegraphed to Hancock, "My party, the readjusters of Virginia, will give you 30,000 majority over the grip-sack and the funder parties put together." If the Senator from Virginia could take the democratic party then, what has come over that party since November that he cannot take it now?

Oh, the Senator from Ohio apologizes and says he had a platform of his own. This was a little side arrangement known only to the Senator from Virginia and his party. Will the Senator from Ohio pretend to tell an intelligent audience that any voter can manufacture his own platform and hold the candidate responsible for it who has never heard of it or stood upon it. If the Senator from Virginia was able to manufacture his own platform and hold Hancock responsible for it, who stood alone and entirely upon the Cincinnati platform, then the socialist could do the same, the greenbacker could do the same. There is no doctrine so monstrous as that which allows a man to manufacture a platform and put it in his pocket, vote for a democrat or a republican, and afterward pull it out and say, "I hold you responsible for that." It is like the distinguished gentleman, also from Virginia, who once became a bankrupt by standing beside a popular game known as faro and betting in his mind with just as much satisfaction to him as if he put up the money. [Laughter.] At the end of two hours of violent and unrestrained mental effort he did not have a dollar in the world. [Laughter.] That is the argument of the Senator from Ohio. He says the Senator from Virginia voted for Hancock, but he did it on his own domestic manufactured platform. [Laughter.] Why, sir, General Hancock stood on the Cincinnati platform; he stood on none other. How could he be responsible for what the Senator from Virginia made in Virginia for his own domestic use and consumption?

But more than that. I want the Senator from Ohio to point me out in that domestic platform of the Senator from Virginia one single sentence stronger in favor of an honest ballot and an honest count than was contained in the democratic platform at Cincinnati, upon which General Hancock stood. The Senator from Ohio said the democratic party makes one platform and stands on another. Then what is the use of making platforms at all?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to disturb my friend, but I desire to say that it was not the democratic platform that the republicans objected to; it was the democratic practice under it.

Mr. VEST. Ah! Mr. President, the voter who took Hancock took him practice and all, and he knew it. When he voted for Hancock he knew all about democratic practices, for the republican party had made it resound from one end of this Union to the other that Hancock was backed by the solid South; and we know that the distinguished Senator from New York brought down the applause of the whole party when in the Academy of Music speech he said: "They tell us that Hancock is a man of nerve and will not be controlled by the solid South when he is elected. Fellow-citizens, the lion and the lamb may lie down together, but the lamb will always lie on the inside." The whole country heard this. And yet the Senator from Virginia deliberately threw his great weight as a political leader and the electoral vote of his State in favor not only of the principles but the practices of the democratic party. If he took one he took the other. He knew that Hancock was a Bourbon democrat; and yet to-day we are told it amounted to nothing. The Senator from Virginia had a platform of his own, peculiar to himself and the eliminating readjuster party of Virginia.

We are told by the Senator from Ohio and other Senators that we have groveled at the feet of the Senator from Virginia. Mr. President, it is not true. I deny it emphatically and distinctly. The Senator from Virginia said in his opening address here at the commencement of this session that he had been invited to our little tea party. If invited, it was unofficially; if invited, it was not by the democratic caucus. I state here, without divulging any secrets of the party, that I for one, with certain other gentlemen that I see around me, persistently opposed any invitation to the Senator from Virginia, and I denounced it from the beginning; I denounced it in caucus and out of caucus. I say if that Senator was invited to a democratic caucus it was done by an individual and not by the official action of the caucus to which I belong. No, sir; he was never invited there by the authoritative action of the democratic caucus—never.

Mr. President, we have witnessed remarkable scenes in this Chamber. Eighteen months ago the President of the United States declared in a speech in the State of Ohio that he would never, so help him God, extend his hand in friendship across the bloody chasm to any man who had been engaged in rebellion who did not openly express his repentance for it; never would he grasp in friendship the hand of any man that struck at the life of the nation until he publicly and openly declared his repentance for that great crime. The Senator from Massachusetts has rung the changes on it here over and over again—the junior Senator. When did the Senator from Virginia repent? The other day we saw the Senator from Virginia stand in the midst of the republican Senators and in emphatic accents declare that for his part in that struggle he had no repentance to express, no apology to make. I have no apology, he said, to make to any man for my participation in that struggle, and then after this heroic declaration he fell back into the amorous embrace of the junior Senator from Massachusetts, and they billed and cooed together while the air was heavy with the fragrance of flowers sent here from the executive conservatory to grace the wedding feast.

Two years ago almost I said on this floor that there was not a confederate brigadier, reeking as they called it with loyal blood, spotted and stained with treason, that the republican party would not take into its embrace if he would only agree to vote the radical ticket and give power to the radical party. Sir, the waters of the Jordan, all the medicinal springs from the days of Hippocrates down to this, have not the healing virtue of one single republican ballot; it covers all sin, hides all iniquity. The chief recommendation the Senator from Virginia gives to your candidate for Sergeant-at-Arms is that he was a full-fledged traitor before he was eighteen years old, and commanded a company in the confederate army. That is his chief recommendation; yet to-day all is forgotten; you take him into full fellowship and communion without any examination by church or session. He is ready for the New Jerusalem, the temple not made with hands, "eternal in the heavens."

Mr. President, where is the consistency of this great party that controls the Government? Gentlemen, you have to-day, by an accident, control of the organization of this Senate; you have planted the flag of democratic Virginia in the midst of its hereditary foes. Sir, there is a legend among the Northmen of the olden time of a Danish king whose banner had waved in triumph over a hundred stricken fields, till at last he fell in defense of it with his fierce warriors around him. His hereditary foemen seized that battle-flag and bore it off in triumph, and at night, with wine and wassail, his foes celebrated their unexpected victory. The wine flowed red and the song rose high around the flag that hung mournfully and sullenly in their midst. Suddenly a hush came over that band of revelers. In their midst stood the form of the dead king, and his spirit hand seized that flag and tore it away from his hereditary foes forever. Sir, if the gallant living of Virginia (and she has thousands as brave as any that ever rode through shot and shell and saber-stroke) do not in the coming fall redeem this flag, dear to me as my own honor, because in Virginia rest the ashes of my fathers—if her gallant living redeem not this flag from where it stands to-day, polluted by the grasp of those who have always traduced and slandered it, I would expect, under God, that the awful majesty of Jefferson himself, father of the democratic party, would darken this Hall and with spirit hand would wrest that banner from those who have always hated it and give it to loving hands. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to postpone the resolution indefinitely, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. HARRIS and others. Yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this and all political questions with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) I am paired upon all questions with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CAMDEN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. FARLEY, (when Mr. FAIR's name was called.) I have been requested by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. FAIR] to announce that he is paired with his colleague, [Mr. JONES.] I make that announcement now, as the pair will probably continue for several days.

Mr. FRYE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.]

Mr. GROVER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

Mr. JACKSON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.]

Mr. JONAS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. EDGERTON.]

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MITCHELL, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.]

Mr. SEWELL, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. MCPHERSON.]

Mr. BECK, (when Mr. WILLIAMS's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] is still absent and paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GEORGE. My colleague [Mr. LAMAR] is unavoidably absent to-day and is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

The result of the roll-call was announced—yeas 18, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Brown,	Farley,	Johnston,	Vance,
Butler,	George,	Morgan,	Vest,
Call,	Gorman,	Pendleton,	Walker.

Edmunds,	Jonas,	Ransom,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is not a quorum voting. The Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, would it not be better to adjourn? There is no quorum present, and we cannot do any business. But I see the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is about to take the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not desire to take the floor for any special purpose. I only wanted to say one word in response to the——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is out of order unless by unanimous consent. If there be no objection, the Senator from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. ALLISON. My purpose in rising was simply to say a word in response to the allusion made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] to the conduct of some of the municipalities of Iowa with reference to their local debts. I think the Senator from Missouri has failed to examine carefully what was done by several counties and municipalities of my State if he has not observed that in every single instance where those debts were contested they were either settled to the satisfaction of the creditor or paid in full. There has been in the State of Iowa no such thing as repudiation of State, county, or municipal obligations.

In 1855 and 1856 there were a large number of county bonds and municipal bonds issued to aid in the construction of railways which were never constructed. The supreme court of our State in a single case decided that cities and counties had the right to issue bonds in aid of the construction of railways. After that decision a number of counties issued bonds and a number of cities issued bonds for such purposes. Afterward the case was again taken to the supreme court of our State, and the supreme court decided that under our constitution those municipalities and county organizations had no authority to issue those bonds, whereupon the cases, or several of them, were appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States. That court decided that, inasmuch as these bonds were issued upon the faith of a decision of the supreme court of the State, they were valid and binding obligations against those communities in the hands of innocent holders. And in every instance the counties and municipalities of the State of Iowa have satisfactorily paid those bonds or made arrangements for their payment. It is true in some instances the bonds were compromised at seventy-five and at sixty cents on the dollar, but they were compromised by an amicable adjustment between the creditor and the debtor, and taxes have been levied, in many cases placing heavy burdens on the communities, for the payment of those bonds.

Mr. VEST. Just a question.

Mr. ALLISON. One moment further.

Mr. VEST. One question.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. VEST. On the basis of this compromise in all the Northwestern States the creditors have taken what they could get; but I will ask the Senator this: Did not the people of Iowa refuse to pay the taxes until there was a threat by military force on the part of this Government to enforce the mandates of the Federal courts?

Mr. ALLISON. That occured in one single county, I believe; but I want to call the attention of the Senator to a fact, and that is that when the Supreme Court of the United States and the State courts of Iowa decided that these local communities were bound to pay these bonds, mandates were issued to the proper authorities compelling them to levy taxes and pay the bonds; and these taxes were so levied in very many counties, and were so levied as to pay off the bonds in every instance except where a fair compromise and adjustment was made between the creditor and the debtor rather than pursue the litigation.

But I want to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the marked difference between these local community cases and the cases that have been discussed in the Senate. A city or a county can be sued in the courts of a State as an individual can be sued, and when the rights are settled by the decisions of the courts the communities and the individuals are bound to abide by those decisions. A State of this Union, however, cannot be sued, so that if a creditor holds a bond of the State of Virginia he has no other reliance except the good faith of that Commonwealth for his payment; there is no court in the United States that can take jurisdiction of the question of the State debt of Virginia or of North Carolina or of any other State, and therefore the whole debt of a State, as the debt of the United States, rests upon the good faith of the people and rulers of those States. It is because those people refuse to consider the question of an adjustment of their debt that we denominate them repudiators. Will the Senator from Missouri place a county or a municipality in Iowa that can be sued in the courts, that is amenable to the jurisdiction of the courts to the extent of levying execution and judgment upon the property, in the same category with a State, a sovereign State so called, that cannot be sued in the courts, that cannot be pursued in any way for any purpose except as it sees proper to allow itself to be pursued by the voluntary action of its Legislature?

Mr. VEST. The intent to repudiate is just the same.

Mr. ALLISON. If they have that intent. I say that in Iowa no such intent has ever been disclosed. The questions before those courts were questions as to the validity of the bonds, and in hundreds of cases no consideration passed between those who issued the bonds and those who first received them; but in every instance, even in that extreme case, the people have paid these burdens by the levying of taxes and by other methods, so that to-day there is no municipality in the State of Iowa that does not stand up to the very letter and spirit of its obligation created fifteen or twenty years ago in an era of speculation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will proceed with the call of the roll.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I suggested that the Senate had better adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not hear the Senator make such a motion.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I made it and withdrew it for the Senator from Iowa to make his remarks. However, I give way to the Senator from Massachusetts if he prefers making the motion. I ask the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts for a moment. The roll was called a few moments ago on going into executive session, and there was no quorum voting. I suggested that we had better adjourn, but I thought I would leave the motion to my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. I will say to the Senator that it may be desirable to meet here in the morning in a condition to proceed with business, and I should like to be out of the dilemma of being without a quorum. I think some Senator may be authorized to cast his vote to make a quorum.

Mr. BECK. I desire to be heard a little while to-morrow, but not without a quorum. Unless the Senator from Massachusetts desires to press us a good while longer to-night, I should rather go on in the morning than now.

Mr. DAWES. If we get out of this dilemma we are in, I am ready to yield to the Senator's wishes.

Mr. HARRIS. What dilemma does the Senator refer to?

Mr. DAWES. Some Senator may be authorized to cast his vote to make up a quorum. There are two lacking, I understand.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is altogether competent to adjourn without a quorum, as the Senator knows very well.

Mr. DAWES. I know it is competent to adjourn without a quorum; but the anxiety of the Senator from West Virginia to proceed immediately in the morning to the pending business makes it desirable to get out of this dilemma to-night.

Mr. MITCHELL. I was paired with the distinct understanding that I might vote to make a quorum. I am ready to do so.

Mr. HOAR. Has the——

Mr. HARRIS. I demand the regular order.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Has the vote been announced?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote having been announced, the roll-call will proceed. It is the duty of the Chair to require the roll of the Senate to be called.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. To see whether or not a quorum is present?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the purpose.

Mr. DAWES. I supposed, if I may interrupt the call, that there were Senators paired who were at liberty under their pairs to vote to make a quorum, and we could get along without this roll-call. If I am mistaken——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent that can be done.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent that Senators who are so situated may be allowed to vote——

Mr. HARRIS. I demand the regular order. I thought the Senator from Massachusetts would have moved an adjournment; but as he sees proper not to do so, we will proceed in order.

Mr. DAWES. I am sorry to disagree with the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll-call will proceed.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. VANCE, (when Mr. RANSOM'S name was called.) I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. RANSOM] was called home suddenly by illness in his family. I expected him to arrive back this morning, but he has not done so.

The roll-call having been concluded, the following Senators had answered to their names:

Allison,	Dawes,	Ingalls,	Platt of N. Y.,
Anthony,	Farley,	Jackson,	Plumb,
Beck,	Ferry,	Johnston,	Saunders,
Blair,	Frye,	Jonas,	Sawyer,
Brown,	George,	Kellogg,	Sewell,
Burnside,	Gorman,	McDill,	Sherman,
Butler,	Groome,	McMillan,	Slater,
Call,	Grover,	Mahone,	Vance,
Camden,	Hampton,	Miller,	Vest,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harris,	Mitchell,	Walker.
Coke,	Harrison,	Morgan,
Conger,	Hill of Colorado,	Morrill,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hoar,	Pendleton,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present. The Secretary will proceed with the call on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. FRYE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.]

Mr. GROOME, (when his name was called.) Upon this and similar questions I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.]

Mr. GROVER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

Mr. JONAS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. EDGERTON.]

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. ANTHONY, (when Mr. LAMAR'S name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

Mr. MITCHELL, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] with the express understanding that I may vote if it is necessary to make a quorum. I shall not vote at present.

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) I am paired on political questions with the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS;] but I do not consider that that pair is binding on me if my vote is needed to make a quorum. I shall not vote at present, but if it requires my vote to make a quorum, then I shall ask the right to vote.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish again to announce the fact that I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY,] and therefore I decline to vote.

Mr. GROVER. My pair has been transferred to the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM,] and to make a quorum I vote "yea."

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. ROLLINS] is paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. MITCHELL. I vote to make a quorum.

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Brown,	Farley,	Harris,	Slater,
Butler,	George,	Johnston,	Vance,
Call,	Gorman,	Morgan,	Vest,
Coke,	Grover,	Pendleton,	Walker.
Davis of W. Va.,	Hampton,	Pugh,

NAYS—20.

Allison,	Dawes,	Ingalls,	Mitchell,
Blair,	Ferry,	McDill,	Morrill,
Burnside,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill of Colorado,	Mahone,	Plumb,
Conger,	Hoar,	Miller,	Sawyer.

ABSENT—37.

Anthony,	Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,
Bayard,	Frye,	Kellogg,	Sewell,
Beck,	Garland,	Lamar,	Sherman,
Camden,	Groome,	Logan,	Teller,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hale,	McPherson,	Van Wyck,
Cockrell,	Hawley,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Conkling,	Hill of Georgia,	Platt of Conn.,	Williams.
Davis of Illinois,	Jackson,	Ransom,
Edgerton,	Jonas,	Rollins,
Edmunds,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,

So the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BECK and Mr. DAWES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BECK. I desired to take the floor to make a few remarks in the morning. I would rather not do so now.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will give way, he holding the floor, I will move to adjourn.

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Kentucky has the floor and yields to the Senator from Massachusetts to move an adjournment. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 12, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

RANK OF NAVAL GRADUATES.

Mr. VANCE submitted the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to inform the Senate what alteration, if any, has been made in the relative rank of graduates of the Naval Academy as originally established at graduation under the provisions of sections 1483 and 1521 of the Revised Statutes in any classes graduating since the year 1870; and, if so, under the provisions of what act the said alteration or rearrangement of rank was made.

Mr. DAWES. The phraseology should be "directed" instead of "requested." We direct the Departments and request the President.

Mr. VANCE. Let it be modified in that way; and I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and, as modified, agreed to.

MICHAEL BOYTON.

Mr. BURNSIDE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be respectfully requested, if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate any information in possession of the Government touching the alleged arrest and imprisonment of Michael Boyton, who claims to be a citizen of the United States, by the authorities of Great Britain.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] providing for the election of certain officers of the Senate, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone the resolution indefinitely, on which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

Mr. PENDLETON. If the Senator will give way I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield the floor?

Mr. BECK. I have no objection to that motion.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAWES. After the arrangement and understanding with the Senator from Kentucky last night, I hardly supposed that he would yield for such a motion this morning when the Senate is so thin.

Mr. HOAR. The motion does not seem to be fair just now.

Mr. PENDLETON. At the request of the two Senators from Massachusetts, who indicate that their side of the House is unexpectedly thin, and that the motion was not expected this morning, I withdraw it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio withdraws the motion; and the Senator from Kentucky will proceed.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I shall occupy the attention of the Senate but a short time this morning. I had at one time intended to follow somewhat in the line of debate which has been indulged in pretty freely on both sides, and I had especially stated to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] that at some time this week I should endeavor to reply to the speech he made the other day; but as there has been a good deal of—I will not say crimination and recrimination on both sides, but a good many attacks by gentlemen on one side of this Chamber on the question of the repudiation of the debts of the South, tissue-ballots, bulldozing, and other things, and as within the last day or two "the wind has shifted," and there have been a good many serious attacks made on the States of New England, Iowa, Minnesota, and other States in the North and West which seem to be in the same category, I shall endeavor to confine myself pretty much this morning to giving to the country and to the Senate the reasons why I am here and why I intend to adhere to our position, and why I think the democratic party expect to stay here a good while longer if the present course is persisted in by the republican caucus. The much-abused caucus, when democrats were supposed to be influenced by it, is now the law and the gospel to all the members of the republican party, whether they like it or not.

It is known, Mr. President, that we have been nearly forty days in special session called for executive business. We were detained here by a republican President to attend to matters of public importance relating to executive business which he said he would communicate to us from time to time. We found an anomalous condition of affairs. The last Senate had adjourned leaving I believe about one hundred and thirty nominations unacted upon; they had all died with the Congress; and all, I may say certainly nearly all, of that large number were nominations of republicans, were sent here by a republican President in order to enable him to carry on the business of the country in a proper manner.

Therefore we had not only to deal with all that was left undone by the last Congress, but with all new matters which the President deemed important; all that was left undone by the last Congress was so left because the republicans had filibustered day after day and night after night; they had sat in their places refusing to vote to carry out the orders of their own President who sought to fill the places then vacant.

When the present President of the United States called us together under those circumstances the democrats were in a majority. We confirmed his Cabinet promptly, without the intervention of committees. We confirmed every man any republican Senator asked us to confirm, without waiting for committees. When any gentleman on the other side said the good of the public service required prompt action, we took his word and confirmed the nominees. We proposed in an orderly way to proceed with the appointment of committees, which could under the rules only last during the session. We did not propose that they should extend during the Congress, but only for the executive session which had been called. If our suggestions had been adopted all the executive business might have been attended to long ago, and we should now have been at home attending to our respective private duties and interests.

The filibustering commenced at once on the other side, led by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] for two weeks. We were told, and told defiantly, that although we had a majority of four or five, we should not organize until it suited their convenience. We acquiesced in that, and after two weeks spent in organizing the committees of the Senate so that they were ready to go to work under republican control, with their chairmen and clerks duly installed, we at once proceeded to executive business. All that they asked us to do was done; no democrat complained or held back, no democrat created either delay or presented any difficulty, nobody opposed the orderly and decent transaction of public business except the gentlemen on the other side.

What then happened? After we had an executive session or two, after the new committees had taken possession of all the committee-rooms, after they had installed their clerks and messengers and turned us all out, after every convenience that any democratic Senator could have desired to retain had been surrendered to the gentlemen on the other side, surrendered cheerfully and without delay and we had shown that we were willing they should proceed with their work without delay, what then transpired? They said, "You shall not proceed with executive business because we have held a republican caucus and have determined in secret conclave that we will turn out the officers who are now holding positions in the Senate and install others in their places; we will first disorganize the present organization of the Senate and organize it to suit ourselves; and we will denounce you as guilty of treason, revolution, and everything that is vile if you oppose us; we will hold you up to the country as disloyal conspirators unless you acquiesce in all that we require you to do." We said to them, "Gentlemen of the republican party, you have an organized Senate; you have absolute control of all the committees; we have surrendered to you everything that you have demanded or suggested, everything that tends to the convenience and comfort of Senators or to the power over the business of this body; but when you present us a list of men, and among them a man from Virginia who is the head and front of the repudiating element in that State, a man who carried a repudiating bill through the Legislature of Virginia that was only prevented from becoming a law by the veto of a democratic governor, and all the principles of which have been condemned by the supreme court of the State—when you present us with that name we do not propose to go any further."

I am not going to say that you did this because of a corrupt bargain. I do not intend to make the Senate Chamber a bear-garden or to have crimination or recrimination between myself and other Senators by reason of charges that I might make on this floor; but it is both parliamentary and just to say that the country at large has a strong suspicion that the alliance is a foul one, and even the republican press of the country has charged it in forms so offensive that when a democratic Senator caused one of the leading articles to be read from that desk, he was asked if he avowed it as his, and dangers at least of personal responsibility were threatened; he was told that he must stop. He did not stop, I admit. However, I say I am not going to charge anything; but I have a right to say that it is seriously believed in the country that the bargain was a foul one. Many respectable people believe it, many of my constituents believe it, and I am advised by them every day that they believe it. They know the facts; it will be difficult to answer or explain them away when they come to be discussed upon the stump; these admitted facts constitute the basis of their belief.

The committees were agreed upon and organized in a caucus; that is conceded. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] introduced them before the Senate as the leader of the party by order of the caucus, and what did they do? Five distinguished members of the republican party, some of them old and tried members, with two of whom I served in the House of Representatives, have no chairmanship at all. Judge MCDILL, of Iowa, who sits before me, served with me in the other House; and Mr. VAN WYCK served with me there also many years ago. Other distinguished gentlemen were unprovided for. What else do we find? The Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE,] who had never served in either House of Congress, who so far as I know had never served in any legislative body, (he may have done so,) was made chairman of the Committee on Agriculture. I am not charging him with having demanded it, but the fact is (and I am now stating the facts) he was made chairman of the Committee on Agriculture. What is the meaning of that? What do the old republican politicians on this floor understand that to mean? What did they intend it to effect? The chairman of that committee is assumed by the people all over the country, by all the farmers of Virginia particularly, to have the control of all the patronage, the appointments, and everything that can be had from that great Agricultural Department, and the farmers of Virginia are expected to look to the chairman of that committee for all the favors they can get from or through that Department of the Government. Of course they will be deceived and disappointed. That is a small matter if the deception can be made available till after the Virginia election.

What next? That Senator was constituted by the caucus a member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads; that committee is supposed to control the patronage of the Post-Office Department, which reaches every hamlet, every village, every town, and every city in the land; and the men of Virginia are to be deluded into the belief, "If you expect anything from that Department, there is a member of the committee from your own State who can reject or who can confirm the appointment of any postmaster, who can govern and control everything connected with the patronage of that great Department of the Government." That, too, will prove a fraud.

What next? He is placed upon the Committee on Naval Affairs. Why? The shrewd politicians on the republican side know why. The Norfolk navy-yard has been one of the great sources of republican corruption in the politics of Virginia. The House has had contest after contest over the frauds committed there. The records of the other House in the contested election of my friend, John Goode, show that over three hundred men were at one time marched from that navy-yard to the polls in line, that ballots were placed in their hands, and they were required to hold their hands up showing those ballots as they went to the polls for fear that they might have democratic ballots in their vest pockets which they would, if not watched, take out and deposit. An officer from the navy-yard came with them and took their names down, handing them the ballot as they went into a narrow aisle near the voting place, and watching them with their hands up until the ballots were deposited, to see that there should be no cheating, (so called,) and they dismissed all who refused to obey their orders. The Senator from Virginia is placed on the naval committee, and with that record before them the people of the country will understand why the republican party put him there. Those ballots were as bad or worse than tissue-ballots or anything else that I know of. I hope Senators will read the record of the contested election of Goode, as I have merely indicated some of the frauds it shows, and I have not stated the worst of them. I do not think the present Secretary will allow a repetition of these offenses. That, too, will prove a delusion as a means of catching votes.

What else? The Senator from Virginia has been placed on the Committee on Education and Labor. All the colored people of the country have been made to believe that the Committee on Education and Labor has their interests under especial charge, and all the colored men of Virginia it is expected will have to run to the Senator from Virginia as their special advocate and champion on the Committee on Education and Labor for all the favors which pertain to all that is to be done in regard to those things about which they are so much concerned.

Their experience in regard to the Freedman's Bank may make them careful as to the promises or baits held out by republican leaders.

Those are wonderful assignments for a man who had never held a place in either House of Congress—chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, a member of the Naval Committee, the Post-Office Committee, the Committee on Education and Labor; if they had been selected in order to give that Senator absolute power over all the arrangements necessary to draw to his support whatever could be drawn to the support of anybody in Virginia there could have been no other committees so well and so carefully selected to give him all that power.

Do you think the people of the country fail to understand the meaning of that? They may not reason out all the details of it, but when they see a mule they know there has been an alliance between two distinct classes of animals. When they see political miscegenation like this they understand that it is for a purpose. They understand it, too, when you go a step further as is now proposed and say, "That is not pay enough; there are only thirty-seven of us republicans here who voted for Mr. Garfield; there are thirty-nine Senators who voted for General Hancock; but we have managed, although there are only thirty-seven of us, to organize the Senate and turn you all out of your committee-rooms, to take your clerks from you, to take control of all the business machinery of the Senate; we could not do it ourselves without this help, and we intend to pay the man well who gave us this assistance."

The republican leaders know also, if they do not say it, "We have our part of the bargain in our pockets. We have the committee-rooms; we have the clerks; we have all the machinery of the Senate. We cannot afford to stop short of delivering all that we agreed to deliver as a consideration for what we have got." I tell you the country is saying your ballots are not free, gentlemen. You have received your part of the bargain, (so the people of the country will say,) and you are now determined to do whatever remains unsettled in the agreement before you will even proceed to public business. And what is that other business, or residuum of purchase, as plain people will call it? You have named as Sergeant-at-Arms a Mr. Riddleberger, of Virginia. The Senator from Virginia said in his speech the other day:

> Mr. President, I must beg the indulgence of this Senate for a few minutes longer to do justice by one for the introduction of whose name here I am responsible.

He then vindicates that man, Mr. Riddleberger, and adds:

> They can yield a complete republican organization, but cannot accept this Virginia readjuster. I note with astonishment the reasons assigned, but discern very clearly the real and underlying ones. Say they, he is of the repudiating party. If so, Mr. President, I, too, am of that party.

And again:

> Mr. President, it is the coming contest in Virginia which makes this opposition to Mr. Riddleberger. His enemies and those of his party know his power, his influence, and his courage.

The Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] the other day, made a remarkable statement in the face of that speech of Mr. MAHONE, which I will call attention to. The Senator from Ohio, interrupting the Senator from Florida, [Mr. CALL,] who was then holding the floor, used this language:

> Long ago it was manifest by the drift of events that the Senator from Virginia had no stopping-place short of the republican party—

The Senator from Virginia will not indorse that. If he does, the readjusting party of Virginia will perhaps not be as large as it is—> because we know, by the discipline exercised by the democratic party upon every man in the South who differs with them on any question whatever, that there is, to use the language of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, no half-way house; and I expected before I came here that the Senator from Virginia, although he never has participated in our caucus, never has gone into our conferences, never has made any promises to us, that "the logic of events" would drive him into the ranks of the great party to which I belong.

Now, if the Senator from Virginia was never in any conference, was never in any caucus, had never made any promise, how does he (to use his own language) become responsible for the name of Mr. Riddleberger being introduced here, as he says he is, when that name comes from the chairman of the republican caucus and is held here so persistently by that caucus? The Senator from Ohio can perhaps explain how that is. The Senator from Virginia says he is responsible for Riddleberger, but the Senator from Ohio says he has had nothing to do with their consultations.

What do the republicans in caucus propose to do in addition to all that they have given to the Senator from Virginia in his own right? They propose to place his friend, Mr. Riddleberger, in the position of Sergeant-at-Arms of this Senate. I hold the pay-roll and the number of employés under him in my hand. The total is one hundred and thirty-seven men and boys, including one-half the Capitol police, sixteen in number, and the pay-roll is $149,219.50, by far the largest portion of all the expenditures of the Senate. One hundred and thirty-seven employés and $149,219.50 of a pay-roll constitute the patronage of the Sergeant-at-Arms; and we are told that we shall not be allowed to go into executive business until all this power and all this patronage is placed in the hands of Mr. Riddleberger, whose name Mr. MAHONE says he is responsible for placing before the Senate, although the Senator from Ohio says he was in no caucus, in no conference, and had no understanding in regard to it. The republican party in this case does not propose to repudiate its debts; we do not propose to sanction such contracts.

When you put these facts together, I assure you the people of the country will understand, as the republican press has expressed itself over and over, that there was a bargain, a bargain we will not allow you to consummate; and I desire to say to my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] here and now, that while I avoid expressing any opinion about these transactions here, when the Virginia election upon which all these matters bear comes on, as he says he is going to keep us in session until next December and that election comes on early in the fall, instead of talking about repudiation in Massachusetts, and exclusion of a third of her population and other things that annoy him, I invite him now to pair with me and go to the State of Virginia during the months of September and October, and then I will tell that people, what I cannot decorously do in this Senate, what I think was the true meaning, intent, and purpose of all these combinations, appointments, and disposition of patronage. We may as well spend our time canvassing Virginia as to spend it in the Senate quarreling with each other about whether our States have repudiated this, that, or the other, or whether or not we can change their constitutions, which at an executive session we know we cannot do, even if they were not absolutely beyond our control at any time.

All this struggle, it has been admitted and asserted on the other side, grows out of the Virginia election next fall, and the meaning, purpose, and intent of it all is to influence that election before that people. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] has avowed it; the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] himself avowed it; all the other Senators who have ventured to speak of it avow that that is the fact; of course we all know that a great election is to be held there soon for governor of the State, lieutenant-governor, the State officers, the Legislature, and that Legislature is expected, if the repudiationists win, to appoint a supreme court in place of the one now there known to be against them, who will declare the Riddleberger bill and all the repudiation of the Virginia readjusters to be legal and constitutional, and a United States Senator is to be elected by that Legislature to come to this Chamber in the place of my honorable friend the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.] The republican party has attempted to place all the machinery that it can control, both in the appointments of committees and in the efforts it is making now to bestow the patronage of the Senate into the hands of the readjusters, repudiationists, call them what you will, who are seeking to destroy the good name, the good faith, the integrity (heretofore untarnished) of the old State of Virginia.

It is in the canvass in Virginia, Senators, if you desire to be heard and if you desire to have told you precisely what a good many of us think this arrangement means, that you can hear it by going to that canvass with us. I have no doubt that you will find a democratic Senator to pair with every one of you who desires to go. I can pick out pairs for you now. I want to go, if he will allow me, with my distinguished friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Yet, in the face of these facts which I have stated, we have been told by the Senator from Massachusetts, we have been told over and over again by the Senator from Ohio, that our action in delaying the republicans from carrying out all these arrangements, and in preventing them from giving all this power and all this patronage to Mr. Riddleberger, is treasonable, revolutionary, destructive of all the best interests of the Government. The Senator from Ohio has repeated that over and over. I will read a few lines from his speech the other day:

> Now, sir, resume the argument, look over it all. Here is a proceeding that is admitted to be, if carried to an extreme extent, revolutionary and dangerous, which blocks the wheels of government, prevents our discharge of the public business, prevent our going into executive session unless, forsooth, the majority will yield to the minority in regard to the order of business. Suppose, gentlemen, you should drive us to go into executive session; suppose you should control our action so far as to say we shall not do what the majority desire to do; you have the power to do it; no one questions that. Fifteen of you, if you have made up your minds to that dangerous expedient, can do it. It will not be long before the public attention of this country is called to that dangerous revolution.

Again he said:

> This example is dangerous, it is revolutionary; it is like many good things which taken in moderation do very well. These dilatory motions to accomplish a wise purpose will always be acceded to and justified by the people; but when they go beyond reason they travel upon revolution, and I believe that the good sense of the people of this country will see this controversy in that light.

Now, Mr. President, whether our action is revolutionary or not depends upon this fact: If we believe—and no man has a right to question us as to what we believe—that you have entered into and made a corrupt bargain, and you are seeking to carry it out by making these appointments and distributing this patronage, ought we not to resist the consummation of that bargain by every means in our power? Will not the country demand that we should? Can anything be more dangerous than legislation organized by corruption? Does not fraud vitiate everything? No, it did not vitiate one thing; we know the fraud of 1876 was a success; I admit that. But when you speak of revolution it all depends upon one of two things. Are we right in assuming, if we do assume, that your bargain is a corrupt one? If so, we can go before any community in America and say that we did refuse to allow you to consummate it and they will say, "Well done, good and faithful servants." If, on the contrary, they believe that what you have done is right, then they will hold us responsible and keep us at home hereafter. We will take that risk upon the facts I have stated and we will discuss them anywhere with you, either in Virginia or anywhere else.

The Senator from Ohio is right when he says we have the power to prevent you from electing Mr. Riddleberger. You know we have.

You have talked learnedly about your "constitutional majority." Let me put a case to you: Suppose, after we have stayed here forty days longer and you have trifled with all the recommendations of the President—for he has never asked you to disorganize this Senate in order to put Mr. Riddleberger or anybody in position here; he knows that the public business can be done as well without them as with them; old, well-tried officers are here now, admitted to be honest, competent, and efficient—suppose, after you have gone on forty days longer, and you still refuse to transact any public business, we respectfully notify the President that we have from the 4th of March, day in and day out, sought to go into executive session and have faithfully tried to do all that he asked us to do; that we have endeavored to consider the treaties that were before us; to confirm or reject, at least to act upon, the nominations that he had sent us; if the Supreme Court is blocked, as it can be now by the sickness of one judge, we are willing to furnish another there; Louisiana has now no circuit court since Judge Woods's appointment to the Supreme Court; we are willing to send some proper officer there; we are willing to do all that we think ought to be done; and after we have waited, as I say, some time longer, until you are as full as you can get, until you have notified all your partisans to be here, and we say to the President it is obvious that the men of your own party do not propose to attend to the business for which the Senate was convened, but they require us to carry out before they will do it what we regard as an improper thing to do, because we do not believe it was fairly brought about, we now propose to retire from this Chamber unless you have something else for us to do; and we leave you here. How many have you? Thirty-eight, with the Senator from Virginia; thirty-nine is a constitutional quorum of this body. The Vice-President cannot give a casting vote to make the constitutional quorum. I know of no constitutional majority without a constitutional quorum. Do any of you know how to constitute a majority without a quorum?

So, then, after you have refused every reasonable proposition, if we leave your "constitutional majority," of which you have boasted so much, with all the thirty-eight, embracing Mr. MAHONE, in your seats, what are you going to do about it? You have no constitutional majority; you never have had. You have half the Senate with the aid of the Senator from Virginia, and when a question arises in such a form that the Senate is equally divided we concede that the Vice-President can give the casting vote in your favor; but when it comes to the question of a constitutional quorum you have not got it, you have never had it, and we can leave here to-day and retire to these cloak-rooms after you have every man who belongs to you in his seat, and you are not a majority of the Senate.

So you have to rely at last upon the fact that we are going to help you out of your difficulty, and you pretend that you are going to force us to consummate what I believe the country understands to be a corrupt bargain, or at least many people in the country, before you will even allow us the privilege of transacting the business for which the President called us together.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I should like to remind the Senator from Kentucky of a little circumstance that happened here, if he has no objection.

Mr. BECK. Certainly; state it.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] voted with us on the consideration of this resolution, and told you you ought to consider it.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Illinois has voted with us to go into executive session upon every occasion.

Mr. BURNSIDE. He has; but on the question of the consideration of this resolution he has told you that you ought to have yielded it with the committees; and therefore we have a constitutional quorum in favor of the resolution.

Mr. BECK. It was announced yesterday that he was paired upon these subjects with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. KELLOGG.]

Mr. BURNSIDE. Only upon executive session.

Mr. BECK. Be it so.

Mr. BURNSIDE. He took particular pains not to pair upon this question.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me a moment?

Mr. BECK. I do not propose to discuss——

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator from Kentucky will allow me a moment——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky consent to be interrupted?

Mr. BECK. I always yield to the Senator from Massachusetts. I have yielded to him so long.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Kentucky is never backward in courtesy to me. The Senator will recollect that the Senator from Illinois the moment these resolutions came up for consideration declared in a written speech that these offices belonged to the side that had the committees, and that nothing on his part would delay their going there as speedily as possible. Now, why does the Senator say that the Senator from Illinois is opposed to our organizing this Senate in the way proposed? The Senator from Illinois is desirous of going to business in executive session, as I am, and he does nothing to prevent that, but he says the quicker we elect these officers the better, and nothing on his part shall obstruct that.

Mr. BECK. I have said nothing about the Senator from Illinois. He has gone—I suppose likely gone for this session. I supposed that he would perhaps vote to take up the resolution, but he surely never would vote for it; he is not one of that side.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to ask him a question? I am rather delighted to hear the programme presented by the Senator from Kentucky. I desire to ask him whether he presents that in behalf of every member on the democratic side, from a caucus, or whether it is only of his own motion that he assumes that after this side of the Senate is full then the other side will all vacate their seats?

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I hope the Reporter will carefully note what I say. I not only did not lay down such a programme for this side, nor did I pretend to say that I would do it myself. I said that if this side did retire and saw fit to do so, your "constitutional majority" would find itself not to be a constitutional majority, for you have but thirty-eight, and the Vice-President cannot make a constitutional quorum of thirty-nine for you.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Kentucky said we should be a minority.

Mr. BECK. It would be a tie; in other words, I was seeking to illustrate that there could be no constitutional majority without a constitutional quorum; and I never have said nor intimated that I or any man on this side was about to adopt any such programme, but I desired to make it very plain to your own minds that your claim of a constitutional majority was false, as the illustration I have given showed.

Mr. DAWES. In order that it may be plain to my mind, I should like to ask the Senator a question, if it will not interrupt him too much. The Senator said that if his side should go into the cloak-room and our side should stay here, our side would be in a minority. I suppose he meant by that that there would be more in the cloak-room than there would be here.

Mr. BECK. No; I meant to say that you had no constitutional quorum of the Senate without the aid of gentlemen on this side. That is all I have said, and the Reporter I think has got it correctly, and the country will understand it.

Mr. DAWES. Then the Senator was unfortunate in the use of phraseology. He said we should be in a minority.

Mr. BECK. Now, Mr. President, I have used that illustration as I have others. It is true, and, Senators, you all know it. I have shown that we rely for our vindication upon the facts which I have stated as a justification before our constituents for the course we have pursued; and I repeat that if it was conceded that the organization of the Senate, the placing of majorities on committees, all the machinery which they have taken now six weeks to obtain, and then do nothing, was the result of a corrupt bargain, there is not a republican in the country who would not say we did right in resisting it. I do not say positively that it is so; I have never said that it was. I have said that I will make no attack upon this floor that will call for crimination or recrimination or that will render necessary or proper any scenes here unbecoming the American Senate; but I will lay the facts before the country so that the people can judge whether we are right or not, and they will surely judge what we believe by the votes we give and by the persistency with which we adhere to them, and by the further assurance that if we did not think we had good reason for the course we have taken we would not obstruct public business which was legitimate and proper. Perhaps they can guess from that what I think about the performances of the last few weeks, and I do not propose to go any further in that direction.

Mr. President, I stated that what I rose to speak for was to tell my people why I am here, and why I believe the democratic party is here. It is because we are not going to allow, if we can help it, the worst elements of Virginia society to control that State, for I have no hesitation in saying that, from all the information I have, nine-tenths of the property-holders, of the best men in the State, are against this repudiation and readjuster doctrine of Mr. MAHONE and Mr. Riddleberger. The honor of that old State is involved. The contest next November will determine whether or not a republican Senate can bring together all the bad elements of white society there and throw in the colored vote, most of it honest but ignorant, because when it is backed by the republican party it will think that it is right to follow in the lead of that great party organization, and thus adding the ignorant and misguided portion of the republican party to the worst elements of the democratic party in their efforts at the destruction of the credit of that old Commonwealth. In that contest I will leave nothing undone to defeat you that the rules will allow, because I and my fellow-democrats believe that you are seeking to degrade and disgrace one of the grandest and noblest States in the American Union, and the democratic party does not intend, if it can help it, to allow you to do it.

You talk about "a free ballot and a fair count." The men who have gone off in that repudiating party in Virginia are the men who above all others were the disorganizers, the guerrillas, the men who have no respect for free, fair votes or counts, or for the integrity or character of the State, or for the right of the people, while the men who are the debt-payers, the democrats, the funders, the gentlemen of Virginia who are resisting it are the men who are standing up for a free vote and a fair count and the honest payment of all obligations in Virginia and everywhere else. The pretext now that you are picking up a body of men in Virginia who seek to give "a free ballot and a fair count" because we oppose it, is a pretense that this country will never accept as true. Your motto is, "Anything to beat the democracy." You do not care where your support comes from.

You heard yesterday the letters written by order of the Secretary of the Treasury. The Senator from Ohio, when he was not engaged in a political contest of this sort, but occupied the high position of Secretary of the Treasury, told Mr. Raum when he received the information, even anonymously, which proved to be a lie, as most anonymous communications are—the Senator from Massachusetts ought to take warning about anonymous communications where the name is concealed, as in the one he held up the other day, of the fate that befell this anonymous communication that the Secretary of the Treasury caused Mr. Raum to advise Mr. Van Auken about. Then, however, he suspected an official as guilty of readjusting repudiation; he promptly demanded his resignation, if the man belonged to the party of Mr. MAHONE. Now he thanks God that he has got an accession from those ranks, and a chairmanship and clerk in the Senate; he is willing to give to the gentleman from Virginia who joins him all the positions on the committees that will enable him to control the State of Virginia in the interest of the repudiationists or readjusters, call them what you will; now he will not go into executive session even to confirm necessary nominations of the Administration until he has put Mr. Riddleberger, the head and front of the repudiating movement, in high position here as Sergeant-at-Arms, with one hundred and thirty-seven employés under him and a payroll of $150,000. Oh, he is so gracious! he says he will do what is right by us, and allow our clerks pay till December if we will only quit revolutionizing.

I have seen old foxes before, but I think the Senator from Ohio showed more of foxy sagacity the other day than I have seen anywhere else. I wish I could lay my hand on his speech; it is here somewhere; but this is the burden of it; I can state it. In answer to the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] the Senator from Ohio said, "We will not be hard on you; we know that these men who are going out have borne the heat and burden of the day, and ought to receive their pay from now until next December; we will arrange that satisfactorily;" out of the public money, of course—"any appeal that you may make to us in a kind way will be considered." And I suppose he would be willing, he would be glad, to modify the resolution so that the election of these officers should take effect in December next. Of course he would. Why? Because the moment Mr. Riddleberger appoints his one hundred and thirty-seven he disappoints three thousand seven hundred who expect to get places; but if you will just elect him now and not let him fill these places until December, until after the Virginia election is over, he can promise those one hundred and thirty-seven places to three thousand seven hundred repudiating readjusters in Virginia, and hold them all in his hands from now until then to work for the election of a repudiating legislature that will elect him to the United States Senate, and next December he will be sorry that he could not do for them what he promised to do! I believe it was Artemus Ward who, when A. Johnson, as he called him, was swinging around the circle, said that when he got to some place in Pennsylvania in the morning there were one hundred people waving their hats and shouting, and inquiry was made, "What is all this shouting about?" The answer was, "We are all candidates for the post-office at this place." The next place he reached he found one fellow waving his hat. "Why are you here alone?" "I am the man that A. Johnson appointed last week." One was shouting then where one hundred were shouting who expected appointment. In posse is better than in esse.

The shrewd politician from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] who spoke the other day, while he was so generous, knew he could use the patronage that was rendered sure to come in December in the election next fall in Virginia far better and make it far more available than he could use the one hundred and thirty-seven Mr. Riddleberger could put here now, even if the republicans gave them all to him, which they would be sure not to do; hence the great generosity of the Senator from Ohio. The veil was too thin. We do not propose to walk into an open trap.

I fear the Greeks and their proffered gifts. Whenever I feel sure that my enemy wants me to do a certain thing, I take care not to do it. That is a good rule in politics and in war. When the other side want us to help them out of the dilemma they are in, then I do not propose to do it; just as I would not consent the other day when the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. SAUNDERS] undertook to pair my colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE.] I protested, and refused to allow it. "Why?" was the question. I replied, My colleague is a democrat; the Senator from Virginia has risen in his place and said on this floor that he is a democrat, a better democrat than the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.] I decline to pair my colleague with a democrat. I said, Let the Senator from Virginia avow himself to be a republican; let him say he has gone into the camp of the radicals; let him tell the democratic readjusters of Virginia that he is a republican, and that he has abandoned them and gone into the republican camp, as the Senator from Ohio said he knew he would have to do, and then we will talk about pairing with him. Let him take the responsibility of being a republican, a stalwart, as my friend from Massachusetts is, but do not let him play democrat here and go away and avoid casting votes, being paired with another democrat, and still tell the people of Virginia that he is a better democrat than the democrat Mr. HILL, of Georgia, or the democrat he pairs with! He will get no pair, in my opinion, on the democratic side, if this session lasts until December, until he avows himself as good a republican as the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from Ohio. That done, then he is on an equal footing with the rest of them.

The Senator from Ohio seemed to think that when he said he was a democrat he meant a democrat in what he called the broad sense. I am a republican in the same broad sense; you are a democrat, Mr. President, if you like, in the broad sense. He said he was a party democrat. I hold in my hand his organ, the Richmond Whig, or rather extracts carefully copied from it in the Dispatch of Sunday, April 10, 1881—numbers of them. I will not take time to read all of them, but the Dispatch said:

> They induced us to overhaul the files of the Whig, wherein we found a bonanza.

The Whig is General MAHONE'S leading and able organ, and they give such extracts just before the election of General Hancock. Here is what the Whig said, the organ of Mr. MAHONE; I believe he is a large owner of the paper, at least it has been so stated on this floor:

> The Whig, on the 18th of October, 1880, ten months after General MAHONE'S election to the United States Senate, said—

Although the Senator from Ohio said he saw before he was elected and ever since he was elected that it would degrade him and disgrace him if he continued to be a democrat, ten months after he was elected on the 18th October, 1880, the Whig said:

> The Dispatch quotes foolish or malignant paragraphs questioning General MAHONE'S democracy, and then adds: "Yet we have always classed him with the democrats." The Dispatch knows very well that as readjustment is more democratic than funderism, so is General MAHONE more of a democrat than Echols or any other of the funder crew. He is no funder; and if he has given ample testimony of that, his no less determined fight against the republican party and its leaders, State and national, as fully attests that he is no republican. There is no funder in Virginia who has fought the republican party with half the vigor and effect with which General MAHONE has; there is no conservative in Virginia who has done more to save the State from radical rule; and there is no democrat within our borders whose long record of brilliant service for democracy so elevates him above all suspicion. There is no suspicion of his democracy anywhere.

That was party democracy in earnest advocacy of Hancock and English. This was on the 18th of October, 1880, and the Dispatch is full of just such statements. What has the democratic party done since that time to make him change? What is there in their platform, what is there in their record that induces Senators to say or intimate that new issues have sprung up since then, that lights now appear to Mr. MAHONE different from what they appeared at the time he voted for Hancock? The only excuse I can find is that the Senator from Ohio gave, which was this:

> I will say that although the Senator from Virginia voted for an electoral ticket pledged to vote for General Hancock he did not do what I would do. He was willing to vote for General Hancock upon the platform that he, the Senator from Virginia, framed, taking General Hancock's promises to be true; but if he had known what I knew, or what I believed, that the democratic party could not be trusted to carry out the promises made by General Hancock, the candidate for whom the Senator from Virginia was willing to vote, he, I think, would have come over a little sooner and a little more rapidly.

The Senator from Ohio undertakes to tell us that we are not to be trusted, that all our statements and avowals of principles are false, that we do not believe or regard what we say, and that if the Senator from Virginia had known what he knew or believed what he believed he would have joined the republicans sooner than he did. Who makes the Senator from Ohio our censor? What is there in his course or in his consistency to entitle him to talk of the democratic party in that way, and to tell us that we are not to be trusted? Are you to be trusted if we are not? Are we to go to you and take your words when one of your leaders, the late Secretary of the Treasury, rises in his place and gives as an excuse that the democratic party cannot be trusted, that he knows it, or at least believes it?

Mr. President, perhaps I ought not to criticise too much the scolding of that Senator. You, Mr. President, were not in this Chamber when some pretty severe scoldings were given to you, sir, in communications since made public from that distinguished officer, then the Secretary of the Treasury; but it did not take him long to get on his knees and go to New York and beg your pardon in a very public way; and when he scolds the whole democratic party in the same excessive way, I suppose that, too, is in a Pickwickian sense; I am willing to let it pass as though it was.

The democratic party had a platform in the late contest, and all democrats insist that they made it honestly and stand by it faithfully, and Mr. MAHONE was fully advised of that platform when he accepted it, and we had a candidate who accepted that platform. Among the planks in it that every democrat stood by and maintained and every democrat in this Senate will stand by and maintain to-day as long and as honesty as the Senator from Ohio will maintain any position he has taken, were these:

> The subordination of the military to the civil power, and a genuine and thorough reform of the civil service.
> The right to a free ballot is a right preservative of all rights, and must and shall be maintained in every part of the United States.

And when we sent that platform to our candidate he said in acceptance of it:

> It is a vital principle in our system that neither fraud nor force must be allowed to subvert the rights of the people. When fraud, violence, or incompetence controls, the noblest constitutions and wisest laws are useless. The bayonet is not a fit instrument for collecting the votes of freemen. It is only by a full vote, free ballot, and fair count that the people can rule in fact as required by the theory of our Government. Take this foundation away, and the whole structure falls.

That was our platform, sir; these were the terms of acceptance of our candidate for President; these principles we maintained everywhere; we maintain them now, and neither in Rhode Island, where they can buy voters like sheep, as it is said by their own people, nor in Massachusetts, where it is said by General Butler and other distinguished citizens that they exclude one-third of the people from voting, will we be driven from them, but everywhere, North and South, we will endeavor to remove the shackles from the right of all men to a free vote and an honest count, and Mr. MAHONE and the party that is leaving the democrats in Virginia, when these gentlemen go down to that canvass and see them, read their past history, know their antecedents, look at the men, and then look at the funder democrats, the men who are standing by the democracy, and they will not hesitate long in deciding that the men for a free ballot and a fair count, who have the honor of the State and its property and prosperity at heart, are on our side, and the men who have formed that alliance are not the men whom they would trust to carry out these great principles of justice and human liberty. Senators, if you have made the bargain the country thinks you have, it is a bad one, and we will not allow you to consummate it, if, as you admit we can, we can prevent it under the rules. You may as well understand it.

Mr. President, I have spoken longer than I intended. I did think at one time, as I said the other day, that I would answer the speech of the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. BLAIR,] made last week on republican rule in the South, but after I read it I determined that I would not. The Senator from New Hampshire said in regard to carpet-bag governments:

> But, Mr. President, the carpet-bag governments were the best governments the South ever had; and the common school and the principles of universal liberty which prevail there now and which are the basis of your rising prosperity, all those great ideas of genuine liberty extended to all men which are the basis of your prosperity and of your future happiness, and which will make you the crowning glory of our great Union of States, come to you by virtue of these same carpet-bag governments which you curse.

When I read that I thought if there is a man, woman, or child anywhere who will indorse that statement, I never have seen or heard of him or her, and I do not believe the Senator from New Hampshire, if he will look over the history of those times, will do it himself. It was in the heat of debate that he indulged in a statement of that sort. Why, sir, on the opposite page of the same RECORD in the speech of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] is the answer to it all. No man under the reconstruction acts who had been a justice of the peace or a constable forty years before the war, who may have been as loyal to the Government of the United States as any man in New Hampshire, who had resisted secession in every form, and, if you please, had gone to jail because of his resistance, whose son, perhaps, equally unwilling to go into the confederate army, had been conscripted and taken there—if that man, thus loyal, thus resisting, had given a pair of shoes to that son when he was barefooted in the snow, he was disfranchised by those reconstruction acts.

If the Senator will read the great case of Milligan and Bowles, which made Judge DAVIS a democrat, if he was not before, for he rendered a decision which will go down to history and make him a great character, in which all the principles of the reconstruction acts were denounced and exposed as things not to be thought of by a people hoping to remain free; if he will read the veto messages of Andrew Johnson, for which perhaps he was impeached, he will see that every republican and democratic principle was invaded. If he will read The Prostrate State, by a distinguished and honored citizen of Maine, referring to the State of South Carolina, or if he will read the report of the majority of the Ku Klux committee, fourteen republican Senators and Members, he will not make a statement like that again.

I was reminded, too, of the folly of going into all these old troubles by a very wise remark made by the present President of the United States in his place in the House of Representatives some two years ago. This is an extract taken from those remarks of his:

> The man who attempts to get up a political excitement in this country on the old sectional issues will find himself without a party and without support. The man who wants to serve his country must put himself in the line of its leading thought, and that is the restoration of business, trade, commerce, industry, sound political economy, hard money, and honest payment of all obligations.

Believing that to be the duty of the Senate, and believing that the machinery necessary to enable the President to carry on the Government in regard to the great measures of which he speaks should be furnished, and believing especially that at an executive session, where there is no power to legislate, all attacks made by republicans of the North against the South because of supposed past delinquencies, or the democrats of the South against the North because of peculiarities in the management of their affairs, are not what the country expects us to consider or argue now, I decline to proceed to the consideration of any of them; and having stated the reasons why I think the country expects us to insist upon attending to executive business and expects us not to go into the question of the election of officers, about which there is, to say the least, grave doubts, both as to the integrity and honesty, I shall not trouble the Senate any further.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, the resolution before the Senate in its recitals is plain and simple in meaning and perfectly constitutional in its objects. Because it is obvious in meaning, and constitutional, an equal number of republican Senators demand of an equal number of democratic Senators that the Vice-President shall be allowed to pass the resolution by his casting vote. These democratic Senators say no; while the resolution is unmistakable in its own recitals of its meaning, and perfectly constitutional on its face, yet it is untimely, against the custom of the Senate made by long usage and acquiescence, and a hardship on the incumbents, who are admitted to be qualified and worthy; and there is no public reason, necessity, or convenience requiring the Senate to make this resolution an exception by untimely, unusual, and harsh action. If the resolution was left by itself to define its own face meaning and objects, and to stand on its own merits, I hazard nothing in saying that the dead-lock it has produced would not last twenty-four hours.

Why do I say so? Because the able and distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] announced that so far as the resolution itself was concerned he would not give the snap of his finger to secure its passage; and the able and distinguished Senators from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] and Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] with equal emphasis declared that the change of officers sought by the resolution was immaterial and without any public importance. Then, it is not the resolution itself, or any object recited on its face, that has caused the dead-lock. What is it that has broken up the intellectual foundations of this Senate and turned them loose to meet in irreconcilable antagonism? It is the authoritative announcement by representative republican Senators that the resolution had its origin in what I call a coalition of persons never before members of the same political party, by which these persons are to meet together in the republican party without regard to past differences on any questions growing out of principles, measures, or policies, however important or irreconcilable; and all these are to be buried and forgotten in the initiation, organization, and success of a new movement under the auspices of the republican party, aimed at the disintegration of the "solid South" and the defeat of the democratic party in the Southern States. It must be admitted that this purpose, declared to be so important as to justify unyielding determination, is wholly outside of, foreign to, and independent of any of the lawful and legitimate objects set forth in the resolution, or any of the effects fairly within the scope of its constitutional operation.

Then, what is the reason given, what is the foundation of the right claimed for the persistent and unchanging determination of republican Senators to pass the resolution for the consummation of the coalition to produce results purely political and partisan, and that neither the Senate nor all the departments of the Government combined have any constitutional power to aid by legislation? None other than that the republicans have the constitutional power, made up of an equal number of Senators and the casting vote of the Vice-President, to pass the resolution.

I do not deny the existence of the constitutional power. It is misleading to say that democratic Senators resist the constitutional power on account of its existence. The existence of constitutional power is not always the test of duty to submit to its exercise. It may, and frequently does, happen that results are produced by the exercise of unquestioned constitutional power that are fatal to the integrity and benefits, if not to the existence, of government. Democratic Senators resist the exercise of the admitted power of the majority because the resolution is believed to have had its origin solely in a coalition of questionable propriety between the beneficiaries of the resolution and those who have the majority power to pass it, to make patronage, secured by the organization of Senate committees and the election of Senate officers, the inducement, the reward for the agreement to unite and make common cause in the movement to dissolve "the solid South" as a support of the democratic party and thereby insure the supremacy of the republican party in State and Federal Government.

My deliberate conviction is that if democratic Senators were to submit to the passage of the resolution in the face of the announcement by its authors of the sole object sought to be accomplished by it, when they had the constitutional power secured to minorities to defeat it, they would dishonor themselves and forfeit the respect and confidence of their constituents. Democratic Senators are the representatives of the unity of the democratic party, believing as they do that the principles, purposes, and policies of that party are essential to preserve the character of our system of general and local government, and to insure honest and beneficial civil administration. With these convictions, whether well or ill founded, what is our plain duty? Is it fair, just, or reasonable for brother Senators to press action when submission to it would in our judgment forfeit our integrity as representatives, not to say anything about the accuracy of our opinion that submission would seriously affect the integrity of this body?

But you answer perhaps that your integrity as Senators and representatives of the republican party would be forfeited if you were to yield the exercise of your majority power to pass the resolution now and here; that it is your duty as republicans to do everything you have the constitutional power to accomplish, to divide the South, and re-establish republican rule there, so as to insure good, honest, and wise government to those benighted, evil-minded, misguided, and unteachable people; that however distasteful, offensive, or disreputable the methods, they are the only means now in your sight that promise any success, and the democratic party being in such bad repute with republicans of the North on the currency, tariff for protection, Government credit, and aid to associated capital in corporations, you will have the indorsement of your party in anything you do for success in breaking the solidity of the South; that "nothing succeeds like success."

As to the question of your duty to press and of our duty to submit because the resolution on its face is constitutional and you have the constitutional power to pass it, I beg republican Senators to test by reason and their own committals the validity of such a claim.

Republican Senators have declared without contradiction that so far as the resolution itself is concerned, and the objects recited on its face, its passage is wholly unimportant and not worth the snap of senatorial fingers. Then it is plain that an unyielding determination to pass the resolution is sought to be justified, and must stand, alone, on the ground that the resolution becomes and is material enough to delay all public business in executive session, on account of purposes and objects outside of its legitimate scope and meaning and constitutional operation.

Another illustration will add to the absurdity of the republican justification. Suppose each one of the four officers proposed to be elected by the resolution were proven to have been convicted in a judicial proceeding of bribery, forgery, embezzlement, or larceny; there would be just as much constitutional power of the present or any other majority to elect them by the resolution as though they were, as I have no doubt they are, personally honest and honorable men. But certainly no Senator will say it would ever be the duty of the minority to yield to the exercise of the majority power to elect such felons, even though there were no persons filling the offices and qualified to discharge their duties. Then it is manifest that the great argument of my friend the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] is unanswerable, that justification for a resort to dilatory motions secured to small minorities in the Constitution must in the nature of things be found and allowed to remain in the individual conscience and judgment of each Senator; that the propriety, justice, wisdom, and safety of the exercise of majority power must necessarily be left to the honest decision of each Senator, who is alone responsible for his vote, and who is made by the Constitution the custodian of the power vested in minorities for the sole purpose of defeating any majority action not sustained by his judgment as to time, circumstances, subject-matter, object, or purpose. Exercising this undoubted constitutional power of minorities, each democratic Senator for himself has decided, and will adhere to the decision, that the attempt, in the mode announced, and by the means and agents to be employed, to disintegrate what is called the solid South, to destroy the unity of the democratic party, and thereby perpetuate the domination of the republican party, would be a consummation a thousandfold more disastrous to the country and its government than the election of a regiment of convicted felons to Senate and Federal offices.

But let us strip to the naked body the great issue upon which the coalition of elements, antagonistic heretofore upon all other questions, now comes together in harmonious brotherhood, to park their batteries for a bombardment of "the solid South." The phraseology of the platform on which recruits are to be mustered into service is high-sounding and full of music, and when "the bloody shirt" floats at the head of the column of colored voters and white office-seekers, commanded by United States republican marshals, the republican bugles will be sounded along the whole line by a band led by a confederate brigadier, to roll out the key-notes of the platform, "an honest vote, a priceless ballot, and a fair count." I protest against interrupting the entertainment and the joyous expectations of this mixed brotherhood by any inquisitive people, who may be disposed to follow where there is to be honest voting and fair counting, making inquiry "whether the new movement had its beginning or was honestly started by a priceless vote," or "whether it is possible that what the newspapers say can be true, that the new movement to secure priceless ballots got all its existence and strength from a bought vote." But what is the motive and merit of this new movement? It is founded on the charge that the organized democratic party of the South preserves its solidity and secures its continued supremacy in the Southern States on a denial of the success of universal suffrage, and the fraudulent practice in violation of law of not allowing "an honest vote and a fair count."

What suffrage is it that is denied, and what votes are claimed not to be honestly cast and fairly counted? Manifestly these charges are intended to cover only negro suffrage and negro votes in the Southern States. What is the highest republican information and authority as to the character of this suffrage and of these votes?

President Garfield in his inaugural address used this language:

> The danger which arises from ignorance in the voter cannot be denied. It covers a field far wider than that of negro suffrage and the present condition of the race. It is a danger that lurks and hides in the sources and fountains of power in every State. We have no standard by which to measure the disaster that may be brought upon us by ignorance and vice in the citizens when joined to corruption and fraud in the suffrage. The voters of the Union who make and unmake constitutions, and upon whose wills hang the destinies of our governments, can transmit their supreme authority to no successors save the coming generation of voters, who are the sole heirs of sovereign power. If that generation comes to its inheritance blinded by ignorance and corrupted by vice, the fall of the Republic will be certain and remediless.
> The census has already sounded the alarm in the appalling figures which mark how dangerously high the tide of illiteracy has risen among our voters and their children.
> To the South this question is of supreme importance, but the responsibility for the existence of slavery did not rest upon the South alone. The nation itself is responsible for the extension of the suffrage, and is under special obligations to aid in removing the illiteracy which it has added to the voting population.

But the most frank and valuable statement for my purpose I find in the brief and important speech of the able and distinguished Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.] He says:

> The practical declaration of the entire democratic party of the South to-day is that universal suffrage is a failure. They say that the great mass of freedmen are unfit to vote and cannot have their votes counted arithmetically; they shall not have the weight that the arithmetical count of those votes entitles them to. They say those men are not intelligent, they are led away by corrupt men, and all that. Yes, sir, I admit whatever of truth there may be in that; I admit there is weight; I admit that the South is involved in great and painful difficulties upon that question; but I claim that the difficulties are not all on one side in this country. I assert that in many of our large cities we are confronted by some of the most painful problems of civil government.

I emphasize and amplify the statement of the honorable Senator by declaring here upon personal knowledge that nine-tenths of the negro voters in the Southern States, without their fault, are wholly illiterate, and incapable of casting or counting their votes with any will, understanding, or comprehension of the objects, value, benefits, duties, or responsibilities of suffrage or citizenship. Such a thing as an honest vote and a fair count by the negro voters themselves, according to their will and understanding, is a patent impossibility in the present illiterate condition of that population. There can be no vote cast according to honest will and understanding when the voter is destitute of any will or understanding of his own in the exercise of his right to vote. If left to themselves, the casting of their votes would be purely physical and mechanical, unmixed with any intellectual operations or processes of will and understanding. The correctness of my statement will be admitted by all northern republicans who will go through one general canvass and election in the Southern States and discover for themselves what the truth is in relation to the character of negro suffrage. If I have correctly represented the present unfitness and incapacity of the negroes of the South to cast their votes and to count them with any will or understanding of their own, then what follows as an inevitable and unavoidable consequence? The necessary result is that the negroes must vote, if at all, according to the will and understanding of somebody else to whose capacity and influence they submit the control of their ballots.

Then the important inquiry is forced upon the people of all sections and all parties, Who shall it be, what power, or influence, or agency shall be allowed to take charge of and control and direct negro suffrage in the Southern States? No graver or more important question, the answer to which can be more far-reaching in its consequences, affecting all classes and conditions, and the destiny of our country and its government, ever confronted the American people for solution. What safe and adequate remedy can be provided and enforced that can coexist with our theory of free representative government founded on universal suffrage? President Garfield answers this question in its future aspects as follows:

> For the North and South alike there is but one remedy. All the constitutional power of the nation, and of the States, and all the volunteer forces of the people should be surrendered to meet this danger by the saving influence of universal education.
> It is the high privilege and sacred duty of those now living to educate their successors and fit them by intelligence and virtue for the inheritance which awaits them.
> In this beneficent work sections and races should be forgotton and partisanship should be unknown.

But what shall be done with the frightful mass of illiteracy now seated like a nightmare upon the vitals of society and local government in the South? The answer to this question, of so much present and vital importance, is furnished by the patriotic and wise Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] in the same speech from which I have quoted, and I join the southern democracy in offering him our hearty concurrence. The Senator says:

> I admit all the difficulties concerning it, (universal suffrage,) but I assert that when it is once made the law, the eternal law of the Republic, as it is, it is the business of every intelligent and educated and honorable, not to say Christian, man to accept as a great and Heaven-imposed trust the care over the weaker, the inferior, if you choose, also the corrupt elements of this population, and to govern and control and lead them on the better side; and I affirm that the intelligence and morality of this country is perfectly capable of dealing with the whole great question of impartial suffrage.

Where, then, will you find the greatest amount and in fact nearly all the intelligence and morality, and the capacity and experience qualifying a people for discharging "the great and Heaven-imposed trust, the care over the weaker, the inferior, if you choose, also the corrupt elements of this [the negro] population, and to govern and control and lead them on the better side?" I affirm what is known of all men, that nine-tenths of the capacity, intelligence, morality, experience, and of all the other essential elements of fitness for civil government of a free people, are to be found alone with the white people of the Southern States.

Why is it, then, that the intelligence, virtue, morality, and experience of the white people of the South should not be let alone in discharging "the great and Heaven-imposed trust, the care over the weaker, the inferior, also the corrupt elements of this negro population, and to govern and control and lead them on the better way?"

Never was mortal man more mistaken than the distinguished Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] and all other republicans, when they answer this question as follows:

I tell you, sir, what the whole country knows and what the evidence proves, that the declaration of the democratic party, especially of the South, known as "the solid South," is that universal suffrage is a failure, and therefore they are determined that a minority there, as in this Chamber, shall take upon itself the absolute government of that section and govern it as a solid section.

* * * * * * * *

The South, "the solid South," declares that the fifteenth amendment is a failure; that it cannot be executed in letter and spirit.

The South declares no such thing. The South only declares what the Senator himself admits in the speech from which I have quoted in relation to the character and perils of universal suffrage when he says:

I admit that the South is involved in great and painful difficulties upon that question; but I claim that the difficulties are not all on one side in this country. I assert that in many of our large cities we are confronted by some of the most painful problems of civil government.

How does the Senator propose to solve them in the large cities of the North? He answers:

And I affirm that the intelligence and morality of this country is perfectly capable of dealing with the whole great question of impartial suffrage.

What the Senator affirms of the capability of "intelligence and morality to deal with the whole great question of impartial suffrage" the South affirms in reference to the capabilities and willingness of its intelligence and morality to deal with the question of negro suffrage and the execution of the fifteenth amendment in letter and spirit. How is it that the efficacious, healthful, and rightful influence of northern intelligence and morality in dealing with the great question of impartial suffrage in the large cities of the North should be greater and allowed any more sway in the North than in the South in discharging "the great and Heaven-imposed trust, the care over the weaker, the inferior, if you choose, also the corrupt elements of the negro population, and to govern and control and lead them on the better side?" Why is it that the claim of the intelligence and morality of the North and its exercise in solving the "painful problems of civil government in its large cities" by "governing and controlling and leading on the better side" the "weaker and the inferior and the corrupt elements of their population" is all right and patriotic and national at the North while at the South the same claim of the same agencies over the same weaker, inferior, and corrupt negro population is a declaration that "universal suffrage is a failure;" that "the fifteenth amendment cannot and shall not be executed in letter and spirit," and shows a "determination that a minority shall take upon itself the absolute government of that section, and to govern it as a solid section?" As I have already suggested, not only is the "intelligence and morality" of the South capable, but willing and anxious to secure the benefit of a free and unpurchased ballot to all qualified by law to exercise it.

But, Mr. President and Senators, in the language of the same distinguished Senator, "there is no use in beating about the bush or attempting to disguise it;" it is perfectly understood by the people that when intelligence and morality at the North "deals with the great question of universal suffrage" so as to "govern and control and lead the weaker, inferior, and corrupt elements in the population of their large cities" on the side of the republican party, it is all right, patriotic, and national, although northern intelligence and morality employ in their work United States marshals and Federal supervisors of elections, who are skilled and unscrupulous agents, appointed by republicans, to employ all the money, intimidation, trickery, and falsehood necessary to insure "honest ballots and priceless ballots and a fair count of the votes" for republican candidates. But when "the intelligence and morality" of the white people of the South deal with the "great and painful difficulties" with which negro suffrage has involved the South and undertake to discharge "the great and Heaven-imposed trust, the care over the weaker, the inferior, and corrupt elements" in the negro population of the South, so as to govern and control and lead them to vote for the candidate of the democratic party, it is all wrong and sectional, and amounts to a declaration "that universal suffrage is a failure," and that "the fifteenth amendment cannot" and shall not "be executed in letter and spirit."

But the honorable Senator from Connecticut in furnishing reasons for his condemnation of the "solid South" has made a contribution to the prejudices of the people of the North that is not characteristic of him, according to the estimate the people of the South have made of his sense of justice and fairness and freedom from the arts and appliances of the ordinary politician. He says that the reason why the South is solid and defies the fifteenth amendment, to govern the South absolutely as a section, is found in the fact that "the majesty of that mysterious divinity called 'the South' is composed of the former confederate and slaveholding element;" and "from that inevitable compactness of organization and will and despotic power that the great slave system imposed upon them." This is a great and mischievous mistake. The South has been made solid for reasons and causes that have never been known to produce any other effect upon the minds, feelings, instincts, prejudices, and actions of any other people in the world's history.

I shall not go into the history of these reasons and causes. It has filled the newspaper press, and furnished the material for stump speeches North and South for the last twelve years. And enough of it has been reproduced in this debate to satisfy all the fondness for repetition.

But, dealing with the present "painful difficulties of negro suffrage that involve the South," what is the great unsettled question that has no pity for the repose of this nation; "the danger which arises from ignorance in the voter that cannot be denied;" that covers a field far wider than that of "negro suffrage and the present condition of the race"—a "danger that lurks and hides in the sources and fountains of power in every State?"

Disguise it as you may, I affirm that every intelligent and educated and honorable and Christian man in the Southern States asks nothing else, claims nothing else, declares nothing else, than that the intelligence and morality and virtue and patriotism and honesty and experience of the populations interested in their governments, State and Federal, wherever found, shall dominate in civil rule and civil administration.

I further declare that in every State, county, and town in the South, where governments are in the possession and under the control of the intelligence and morality of the voting population, you find honest and competent officials, representatives in State and Federal Legislatures of character and ability, enjoying the confidence and respect of their constituents of both races, and peace, good order, contentment, and prosperity abound in the land. When these beneficent results have been produced by the agencies I have mentioned, why not let us alone? You will not for no other reason than that the intelligence and morality of the South governs in the interest of the democratic instead of the republican party. You impeach the fitness and fidelity of southern intelligence and morality for the sole reason that it refuses to exert itself to secure the ascendency of the republican party. And what penalty do you propose to inflict upon that mysterious divinity called "the South" on account of the "compactness of our organization" and determination to employ all our brain power and intelligence and morality and energy and experience in preserving the supremacy of the democratic party? Your proposition, "pure and simple," is to take away from the people of the South who have the capacity, intelligence, and morality that qualify them for regulating their own affairs through home officials elected by themselves, and to organize a "new movement" to divide and capture Southern States for the republican party.

What is the plan of the new campaign to carry out an old purpose? You start out by seducing with Federal patronage and promise of distinction office-seeking democrats who have failed to have their ambition gratified by the organized democracy. And then comes your great bond of union with high hopes of success and many spoils to your southern followers. Your war cry is "an honest vote and a priceless ballot and a fair count;" that these inestimable rights must be secured at all hazards to every sovereign; that they have been denied by the intelligence and morality of the South, three-fourths of which have been absorbed by the democratic party, under the ostracism and despotism of the slave oligarchy; and it will never do to allow such intelligence and morality to rule except in favor of republican candidates; and all that is left us is to take the chances of buying or seducing from the democratic party as many ambitious and disappointed malcontents as possible, by the use of Federal patronage and the hope of office and honor in the republican party; and on the platform of "an honest vote, a priceless ballot, and a fair count" we can turn over the solid negro vote of the South through the agency of the United States marshals and Federal election officers appointed by republican officials on account of their skill in the use of money, intimidation, falsehood, or any other means, in massing negro votes and seeing to it that they are really cast and certainly counted for republican candidates; and then we shall know, and the country will know, that the fifteenth amendment has been executed in letter and spirit, and the promise in your platform to have "an honest vote, a priceless ballot, and a fair count" will have been redeemed.

Such are your declarations. I inform you that the white people of the South are wide awake to all your practices and purposes. They have passed through the cruel and merciless ordeal of reconstruction and suffered the pains and penalties of corrupt carpet-bag governments; they have endured and survived your persistent and malignant effort to degrade them by parading in your partisan press and speeches false reports by unscrupulous political tramps of southern outrages; and you have tried and condemned the population of whole States by their corrupt and criminal classes, and by such foul means you have obtained the support of the northern masses on the basis of hate and distrust of the white people of the South. Your new movement to revive old agencies and instrumentalities and policies and practices to re-establish your domination in the Southern States will only crystallize our solidity by purging it of traitors to their race and people, and make us more vigilant and determined to frustrate all your plans and disappoint your expectations.

I tell you frankly and with no intention to mislead you that you can never disintegrate the solid South and separate the intelligent and honest white people of the South from the democratic party by any movement or policy founded on distrust and hate of the whites, and dependent for success upon making the negroes the dominant element in your southern party organization. We know that the negroes of the South are incapable of organizing themselves or of preserving their organization, and when left to themselves they will fall under the control and submit to the control of the intelligent, moral, educated, Christian people of the South, and all that has or can separate them from such control is the work of bad men and unprincipled political adventurers and speculators for the spoils of office, who come clothed with the authority of the Federal Government to manage elections for republican candidates.

We know from long association and experience with the negroes of the South that they are easily controlled by appeals to their ignorant race fears and prejudices; and when they are told by republican candidates and stump speakers that the white people held them in slavery and opposed their emancipation and would re-enslave them if they had the power, and that the whites of the South are their enemies and oppressors, the necessary and unavoidable effect of such appeals is to band them together as a race; and when the whites see this mass of illiteracy thus organized and controlled by wicked men for evil and ruinous purposes, the natural and inevitable counter effect is to force the white people together as a race for self-preservation. For these reasons and causes the presence of this frightful mass of illiteracy in a distinct race, whose ignorant prejudices are easily inflamed against the whites, is the source of all our troubles and a standing menace to our society, peace, good order, industries, and local governments. The highest interests and welfare of both races demand that their relations shall be friendly, and the whites recognize the fact that the negro, in his present condition of illiteracy, is the helpless victim of wicked men, and every intelligent, honest, Christian man feels the obligations of a great Heaven-imposed trust to take care of this weaker and defenseless population, and to govern and control them in the right way, so as to prevent their ignorance from causing them to be converted into enemies of peace, society, property, and civil government. If trusted with the discharge of this high public duty, according to our best ability and judgment, it would be but a few years before all these race troubles and difficulties involving the South on account of negro suffrage would forever disappear; and then "the solid South" would cease to be a standing menace to the republican party, and intelligent, moral, honest, Christian white people at the South would divide on governmental theories and principles, and questions of tariffs for revenue and protection, and currency and finance, and internal improvements and civil reform and administration, and array themselves in different parties.

But when the ignorance and prejudices of races and classes are inflamed and appropriated by politicians and demagogues for party success, you will find dangerous men like Kearney increasing your troubles in civil government by inflaming the prejudices of the laboring classes in your large cities, and the safety of your wealth and society and civil government will be endangered by the domination of agrarianism and communism. And when the crusade is opened on wealth because it is wealth, and on your property because it is property, and on your capital because it is associated in corporations, then you will understand what it is to be threatened with the domination of ignorance, venality, and corruption in society and civil government. And then your wealth, your property, your corporations will strike for self-defense in the only way left them, by bribing your officials and representatives and buying and intimidating your illiterate dependent suffrage. Remember, Senators, that when you inaugurate your crusade on southern society, property, and civil government, through United States marshals and Federal election officers appointed by republican officials to marshal the black mass of ignorance and vote it and count it for venal and corrupt place-hunters because they act with or claim to be republicans, then we warn you that the white people of the South will strike back for self-preservation in all the ways and with all the means left them and leave the consequences to God and their country.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. President, if I thought that the reorganization of the Senate at this time had no other significance, or no higher reason to support it than the simple matter of changing a few offices which are under the control of this body, I would not trespass upon the time of the Senate long enough to say one word. But, sir, looking as I do upon the settlement of this question as one of the highest importance to the future welfare of the body-politic of the whole nation, I cannot well afford to let the opportunity pass without stating a few of the reasons which induce me to aid, at least by my vote, in sustaining the question now before the Senate.

We have done without having our political friends in these offices more than two years, and, if necessary, could do without them there for two years more, or indeed for ten times two, but then if the republican party, being in the majority, desires a reorganization of the Senate, extending to both committees and officers, I see no constitutional or other reason why it should not avail itself of its right. Two years ago, or up to the 4th of March, 1879, the republican party held the Senate organization, but upon the advent of the democratic majority, and almost immediately after the first meeting of Congress, a movement was made to reorganize the Senate so as to turn out the republican officers and put in their places an equal number of democrats. The energy and persistence with which the question was then pushed by the democrats was in wide contrast with the holy horror which is now expressed on that side of the Chamber at the proposed change. There seems to be a great difference with them as to whose ox is gored.

Let us turn for a few moments to see how many good arguments were put forth in favor of a change of officers two years ago, on the advent of the democratic majority in the Senate, and let us see if sauce served by them at that time may not be just as good for the republicans now.

The Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES,] and whom I regret I do not now see in his seat, then made use of the following language, which was given to us in his usual graceful and pleasant manner:

I desire in a very few words to place this question before the Senate as it occurs to my mind. I have no assault to make on any outgoing officer, and I have no excuse to make for voting against him. By the will of the American people the Senate has come to have a majority on the democratic side, and in my judgment the officers of this body ought to be in substantial harmony with the majority of it. The majority of this body will be held responsible before the people of this country for its management. We shall be held responsible for what occurs in the office of our Secretary. We shall be held, and justly held, responsible for what takes place in the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms, for the management and secrecy of our executive sessions; and I for one say, without a moment's hesitation, that when I have to choose between my political friends and my political enemies for places of trust, honor, and profit, I stand by my friends, as I have always asked them to stand by me.

And in saying that I mean no reflection upon gentlemen of different political opinions from myself; I mean no reflection upon the outgoing Secretary of this body. A partisan politician of course he is, and he uses one of the keenest blades in the United States. I would not vote to turn him out merely on that account, but because he is not of my political faith and I am not of his.

These cries and lamentations that have been set up here to-day by the Senators on the opposite side will not deceive anybody. No sensible people throughout the United States expected this body to do otherwise than what has now been proposed. The funeral wails that have been heard are mere mockeries and lost time on the mind of the country.

Where in all the history of the world has there been a more proscriptive, hungry, and voracious party than that which is heard from now in these obituary notices of those who are about to die? [Laughter.] With nearly one hundred thousand offices to fill and more created from time to time to appease the hungry, gaping mouths of the crowds that have come around this Capitol, it has been impossible for me to listen to this appeal with entire patience and composure. I did not intend to utter a single word; but this attempt to insnare the public mind into the belief that some injury is being done, some outrage committed which the Senators over there themselves would not do under like circumstances, is a little too much for human endurance. In the last eighteen years what have we seen? Droves, gangs, brigades, and squadrons of office-seekers coming here; and when the limit was exhausted by the number of offices all being filled, we have seen more created from time to time to satisfy the demand for them.

I did not want to say this. I had hoped there would be no debate on this question and that we would proceed to do our duty in order, as we intend to do and as the country expected us to do, and fill these places with men whose political principles are in harmony with the majority on this side, and for whose official conduct we have to be responsible before the country.

I shall part from every outgoing official here with nothing but kindness, good wishes, and a hope for his prosperity during life in the future; but who does not know the diversities, the vicissitudes of political fortune? Who does not know that the heart of my excellent friend, the present Secretary, would have been rejoiced if, through his indefatigable efforts in raising money and in every other way, my term should have been limited to the 4th of last March? Who does not know how gladly he would have hailed my defeat in the hard-fought battle of last year in Indiana? I blame him not at all. I wish him well here and elsewhere. So with our Sergeant-at-Arms. But this is one of the changes of political life that come some time to us all. Some of us are here to-day and may be gone to-morrow. I have seen men go out from this body from the great position of Senator itself within the last few days, with deep regret and sorrow on my part, sorrow to part from them and because they sorrowed over it themselves; but this is the fate of political warfare, and the fewer lamentations now and the fewer unnecessary tears that are shed on the other side of the Chamber on the subject, the better will the American people like the Senate.

I wonder if the language that applied to a majority then cannot be applied with the same force and effect to the majority now. What is sauce for the goose ought to be sauce for the gander also, and whatever applied to rights of a majority then ought certainly to be equally applicable to the majority now.

The Senator from Connecticut, Mr. Eaton, not now a member of the Senate, indulged in the discussion of the same subject in the following language:

A great party have come into power. We are responsible and able to be responsible for the carrying on of the legislation of forty or fifty million people, and we intend to do it with our own servants. That is the way to tell it and to talk it. We propose to elect our own officers. We do not propose to remove all these people, not everybody here. I can name a dozen men, sound, stalwart republicans, whom I desire to have remain in their offices, but not these gentlemen; and I know none of them will bear me any ill-will for what I say. It is no clean sweep, to use an Anglo-Saxon term, but we propose to take the heads off three or four of these gentlemen and put democratic heads upon their shoulders.

Well, if democratic heads were in order to be served up then, I cannot see why republican heads should not win now when we have a majority of the Senate. When we look back to the days in which these things transpired and see how the republicans were treated by the majority, we might well be excused if on the matter of change of officers only we should show some anxiety.

But, Mr. President, there is so much significance to this question above and beyond all these minor considerations that I feel we should be justified, if necessary to success, in spending a whole season in its consideration and in bringing it to a final issue. For years and years the republican party has been engaged in the work of reconstructing the political situation in the Southern States—the intention being, as I understood it, and understand it now, to continue this laudable work until every legal voter in the South, be he black, white, or red, should have the same chance to cast his ballot at any and all legal elections and to have it counted just as it was given and deposited in the ballot-box as is extended, rather guaranteed, to the voters in other States. In other words, we have had the desire to break, politically speaking, the "solid South." There is no more reason for a solid South than there is for a solid North, and the fact is there is no reason for either; but every man, every voter, should have the free right to cast his ballot just as he pleases, whether he resides in the East, West, North, or South. Every one was conscious of the fact that whenever this solid South should be broken up somebody or the people of some one or more States must move in the matter. We have all been looking for it to come, but where it would begin or by whom it would be championed we knew not. It, however, was finally discovered, and very properly, too, I think, that the people of the "Old Dominion," the State which has been proudly called "the Mother of Presidents," proposed to lead in this work. She elected her legislators, who in turn elected a representative man to introduce to the Senate of the United States their wishes and their sentiments. That man is here, and he speaks for himself. With whatever he says or may have to say about the finances or the financial condition of his State we have nothing to do—that belongs to the people of Virginia to settle and not to the Congress of the United States. But whatever he may say for himself or his people on the subject of legal or universal suffrage, every good citizen is interested in, and it becomes a proper subject for consideration here. The Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE,] in his great speech, delivered before the Senate on the 28th day of March last, while speaking on the subject of suffrage, alluding especially to Virginians, said:

> For one I want no political serfs in Virginia; I want no longer any condition of personal servitude. I desire not only in theory the right secured to all men of a free, untrammeled ballot, a priceless ballot, but I desire that there shall be secured an honest count. Whatever may be the professions of gentlemen on that side, I stand for that in fact, and I stand prepared here on this floor, by the courage of the men who are behind me at home, to assure the country that in Virginia at least there shall be a free suffrage, a full vote, and an honest count. [Applause.] I stand here to guarantee the enforcement of the laws by the brave men who stand at my back in the cause of freedom.

Mr. President, to any man, and especially to any Senator, be he from the South or from elsewhere, who proposes to stand on the platform laid down by the Senator from Virginia, I heartily extend the right hand of fellowship, and bid him God speed. That he is not alone in the position he has taken is proven by the fact that already a large number of the newspapers of Virginia have indorsed the position he has taken and among them that old-time paper, the Richmond Whig, a paper that has been a leading organ in Virginia politics for more than fifty years. The breaking up of the political solid South means, as I believe, the dawn of a brighter day for the Southern States, not only politically but financially, than they have seen for many years.

But, Mr. President, to return again to the immediate precedent which is attempted to be set, I fear it may, if carried too far, prove a bad one for the principle which lies at the very foundation of our system of government, whether called republican or democratic. This system can only be sustained by the minority submitting to be governed by the majority. Whenever the people of this nation refuse or decline to be governed by the expression of a clearly defined majority, then what better will our Government be than the monarchies of the Old World, or any other form of government where the few rule the many. I do not condemn a minority for taking all advantage it can to defer action in cases where their number is not complete, whether through absence or any other reasonable cause, but here the Senate is virtually full, absolutely full, except where pairs are agreed upon. In this case there is no good or valid reason why the minority should take further advantage of the liberal rules which govern the Senate and delay the business proposed by the majority.

Mr. President, it is no proper answer to this complaint to say that one member of the Senate is supposed to have voted for General Hancock, and that therefore he has no right to vote with the republicans. Every Senator here knows that it was heralded all over the country, previous to the election of last fall, that Virginians were divided on the questions of finance and the right of their voters to have a free and untrammeled ballot. We know also that it was then fully understood that the late Senator from Virginia, Mr. Withers, was the candidate for the Senate on the stalwart or Bourbon democratic ticket, and the present Senator [Mr. MAHONE] was the candidate of the opposition, which included the republican members of the Legislature and the readjusting democrats, and no democrat here, so far as I know, ever claimed the present junior Senator as being their candidate. But now since it is found the Bourbons could not succeed, it is presto, change! All at once it is discovered that whether elected by their class of democrats or not, he is required by them to do their bidding and vote as they may dictate on peril of being charged with being anything but an honest man.

This, Mr. President, is not in accord with my idea of human and political independence, and I am glad to see that the Senator from Virginia has taken the same view of the subject, and is disposed to vote as his friends, who elected him, desire he should, and not according to the wishes of his enemies. I have never before since I have been in the Senate seen the spirit of the doctrine of "rule or ruin" so prominently brought before this body as is manifested in this case. So long as there was any hope of using the Senator to carry out the object and desire of the democratic party, the Senator was feasted and féted and coaxed on all sides; but as soon as he asserted his right and determination to truthfully and fairly represent the principles upon which he was elected, and to carry out the pledges he had made to his friends in the late canvass, curses both deep and loud were heaped upon his head without stint, and the cry ever since has been "crucify him, crucify him."

And why is all this? Is it because of any personal prejudice or hatred of the Senator? By no means. But, Mr. President, it is because the Senators on the other side of the Chamber fear that if this resolution is adopted by the aid of that Senator, that the southern charm will be broken, and that this independent movement will take root and finally overshadow and drive from existence all the evil effects that have been hidden under what is called the solid South.

Mr. President, there is no good citizen of the North who does not deplore the financial condition of the South as well as its political condition. The citizens of the Northern States know full well that if one portion of our country should suffer all other portions must suffer too to some extent. If one member of the body suffers the whole body suffers with it. This is as true of our Union as it is of the human system. So far as the free untrammeled enjoyment of the right of suffrage is concerned, and so far as the general financial business of the people of the United States is concerned, we should know no distinction; but all should be equal and have equal advantages. When that day comes, and not till then, will these United States be absolutely prosperous and the people contented.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to indefinitely postpone the resolution.

Mr. PENDLETON. I suggest to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] that inasmuch as the debate is evidently lagging a little we should go into executive session and attend to the duties there and resume the debate perhaps to-morrow morning. If it will suit the Senator's purposes I will invite the Senate again to go into executive session, or I will give way with pleasure for him to make the motion.

Mr. DAWES. I am obliged to the Senator for the suggestion, and it leads me to make one to him. If the Senator will make a motion to go into executive session and submit to the result, I will cheerfully submit to what the majority shall say on that subject. If the majority say "Go into executive session," I have not a word to say, if the Senator will agree to keep still when the majority say they will not. The difference between the Senator and myself is, I am anxious to submit to the will of the majority and he is just as anxious not to do so.

Mr. PENDLETON. In accordance with the invitation of the Senator from Massachusetts, I move——

Mr. DAWES. I want the Senator to understand that he takes it on the condition suggested.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] I do not see him in his seat and therefore decline to vote.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, (when Mr. CAMDEN'S name was called.) I wish to announce now, once for all, that my colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. SAWYER.] Were my colleague here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when his name was called.) On this subject I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. MCMILLAN, (when Mr. EDGERTON'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. EDGERTON] is absent from the city to-day, and is paired with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. JONAS.] My colleague would vote "nay" if he were here.

Mr. GORMAN, (when Mr. GROOME'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. GROOME] is paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.]

Mr. GROVER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

Mr. HARRIS, (when his name was called.) I agreed to pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] who is now absent. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] is also absent, and I have transferred the pair with the Senator from New York to the Senator from Indiana. I vote "yea," and make the announcement of the pair of the Senator from New York with the Senator from Indiana for the day.

Mr. JACKSON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] and I announce that pair for the day.

Mr. JONAS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. EDGERTON.]

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] on all motions to go into executive session. On motions to adjourn, to postpone indefinitely, and like motions, I am not paired with any one.

Mr. VEST. I neglected, when the name of the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] was called, to state by request that he is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. ROLLINS.] That pair will stand during the absence of both Senators.

Mr. MCPHERSON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. SEWELL.]

Mr. COKE, (when Mr. MAXEY's name was called.) I desire to announce for the day that my colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.]

Mr. SAWYER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. CAMDEN.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BROWN. I was out of the Hall and do not know whether the pair of my colleague [Mr. HILL] has been announced. My colleague [Mr. HILL] I understand is paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.]

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SHERMAN] is paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] I make the announcement for the day.

Mr. FRYE, (after having voted in the negative.) I understand that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] has announced that I am paired with his colleague, [Mr. HILL.] I did not know that the pair extended to to-day and voted. If the pair has been extended, I will regard the pair and withdraw my vote.

Mr. BROWN. I will state to the Senator from Maine that I had a letter this morning from my colleague saying that he would not be able to return for a day or two, and asking that the pair might be extended. I announced the pair on the supposition that it had been extended.

Mr. FRYE. I knew nothing relative to it, but I will consider the pair as existing and withdraw my vote.

Mr. BUTLER, (after having voted in the affirmative.) May I inquire if the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. BUTLER. I withdraw my vote. I am paired with him. I was under the impression that he had voted.

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Bayard,	Farley,	Johnston,	Ransom,
Brown,	George,	Lamar,	Slater,
Call,	Gorman,	Morgan,	Vance,
Coke,	Hampton,	Pendleton,	Vest,
Davis of W. Va.,	Harris,	Pugh,	Walker.

NAYS—20.

Allison,	Dawes,	Ingalls,	Mitchell,
Anthony,	Ferry,	McDill,	Morrill,
Blair,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Platt of Conn.,
Burnside,	Hill of Colorado,	Mahone,	Platt of New York,
Conger,	Hoar,	Miller,	Plumb.

ABSENT—36.

Beck,	Edmunds,	Jackson,	Saulsbury,
Butler,	Fair,	Jonas,	Saunders,
Camden,	Frye,	Jones of Florida,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Pa.,	Garland,	Jones of Nevada,	Sewell,
Cameron of Wis.,	Groome,	Kellogg,	Sherman,
Cockrell,	Grover,	Logan,	Teller,
Conkling,	Hale,	McPherson,	Van Wyck,
Davis of Illinois,	Hawley,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Edgerton,	Hill of Georgia,	Rollins,	Williams.

So the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion to indefinitely postpone the resolution.

Mr. DAWES. Now, the Senator from Ohio having appealed to the Senate and having failed to get a majority, I trust we shall proceed to act on the resolution.

Mr. PENDLETON. I think the Senator failed to get a majority also, as there was an equality, and only under a technical rule was the motion lost.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator had the affirmative and made his motion, and he failed to carry it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. We had better test it, I think, by making another motion.

Mr. DAWES. If you will let us have a vote on the resolution, which is an affirmative proposition, we will take the result.

Mr. HARRIS. I had risen to say that we have progressed so slowly, have done so little within the last three weeks, that I think it probable we could accomplish more if we met earlier and sat later; in view of which fact I want to submit a motion that when the Senate adjourns to-day, if it shall consent to do so, it will be to meet at ten o'clock to-morrow. We are meeting too late; and I submit that motion.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator not put it at eight, so that we can get on with the business?

Mr. HARRIS. I readily adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, if he prefers eight o'clock. The earlier the hour, the better for me.

Mr. DAWES. I prefer that those who vote for it should come here at eight.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator desire that I shall modify the motion?

Mr. DAWES. Most certainly. I prefer that the Senators who vote for it shall come here at eight.

Mr. HARRIS. I will compromise with the Senator, then, by putting it at nine o'clock instead of ten.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee modifies his motion and moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it meet at nine o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. PENDLETON. I cannot consent to meet at an hour as early as my friend indicates, and I move to amend his motion by making it ten o'clock.

Mr. HARRIS. I demand the yeas and nays, if the Senator from Ohio insists upon putting it off as late as ten o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves to amend by inserting ten o'clock instead of nine; on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I like twelve o'clock a good deal better than either of the motions of my friends, and to give time, I believe——

Mr. HOAR. I object to debate. The Senator from West Virginia is wholly out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to debate on a motion to adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If I am out of order, the Senator from Massachusetts is out of order.

Mr. HOAR. No; I rise to a question of order.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator is doubly out of order, because I am on my feet and the Senator is in his seat.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But the Senator from West Virginia is out of order on his feet.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand that I am not out of order in making the motion I rose to make. I move that the Senate do now adjourn. That motion is always in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) I desire to say that I am paired upon all questions with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] I shall not announce the pair again, as the Senator from Maine may not be here during the remainder of the day.

Mr. FARLEY, (when Mr. FAIR's name was called.) I wish to make the announcement now for the rest of the week that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. FAIR] is paired with his colleague, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. FRYE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.]

Mr. GROVER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

Mr. JONAS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. EDGERTON.] I announce the pair for the day.

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) I again announce my pair with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] I will probably not announce it again to-day.

Mr. SAWYER, (when is name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. CAMDEN.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 20, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Bayard,	Farley,	Johnston,	Ransom,
Brown,	George,	Lamar,	Slater,
Call,	Gorman,	McPherson,	Vance,
Coke,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Vest,
Davis of W. Va.,	Harris,	Pendleton,	Walker.

NAYS—22.

Allison,	Ferry,	McDill,	Platt of Conn.,
Anthony,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Blair,	Hill of Colorado,	Mahone,	Plumb,
Burnside,	Hoar,	Miller,	Sewell.
Conger,	Ingalls,	Mitchell,
Dawes,	Kellogg,	Morrill,

ABSENT—34.

Beck,	Edmunds,	Jackson,	Saunders,
Butler,	Fair,	Jonas,	Sawyer,
Camden,	Frye,	Jones of Florida,	Sherman,
Cameron of Pa.,	Garland.	Jones of Nevada,	Teller,
Cameron of Wis.,	Groome,	Logan,	Van Wyck,
Cockrell,	Grover,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Conkling,	Hale,	Pugh,	Williams.
Davis of Illinois,	Hawley,	Rollins,
Edgerton,	Hill of Georgia,	Saulsbury,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to make the hour of meeting ten o'clock to-morrow, instead of nine as proposed in the original motion, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary called the roll.

Mr. SAWYER. I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. CAMDEN.]

Mr. BUTLER. I again announce my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Bayard,	Farley,	Lamar,	Slater,
Brown,	George,	McPherson,	Vance,
Call,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Vest,
Coke,	Harris,	Pendleton,	Walker.
Davis of W. Va.,	Johnston,	Ransom,

NAYS—22.

Allison,	Ferry,	McDill,	Platt of Conn.,
Anthony,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Blair,	Hill of Colorado,	Mahone,	Plumb,
Burnside,	Hoar,	Miller,	Sewell.
Conger,	Ingalls,	Mitchell,
Dawes,	Kellogg,	Morrill,

ABSENT—35.

Beck,	Edmunds,	Hill of Georgia,	Saulsbury,
Butler,	Fair,	Jackson,	Saunders,
Camden,	Frye,	Jonas,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Pa.,	Garland,	Jones of Florida,	Sherman,
Cameron of Wis.,	Gorman,	Jones of Nevada,	Teller,
Cockrell,	Groome,	Logan,	Van Wyck,
Conkling,	Grover,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Davis of Illinois,	Hale,	Pugh,	Williams.
Edgerton,	Hawley,	Rollins,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at nine o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. HARRIS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I believe it would be better to go into executive session and attend to the business we came here for than to adjourn to nine o'clock to-morrow morning, and I think by the consent of the Senator I will make that motion. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, and ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. INGALLS. Can that motion be made pending a motion to adjourn?

Mr. DAWES. I raise the point of order that the pending motion being to adjourn——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is not a motion to adjourn. It is a motion that when the Senate do adjourn, it be to meet at a particular hour.

Mr. DAWES. I was not aware of that.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I would advise my friend to look at the rule——

Mr. INGALLS. By Rule 43 motions relating to adjournment take precedence.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] that when the Senate adjourns it be to meet at nine o'clock to-morrow morning, on which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GROVER, (when his name was called.) I beg to announce for the day that I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. ROLLINS] with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES,] my colleague having been called away from the city for a few days by reason of the destruction of his property by fire.

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Bayard,	Farley,	Johnston,	Ransom,
Brown,	George,	Lamar,	Slater,
Call,	Gorman,	McPherson,	Vance,
Coke,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Vest,
Davis of W. Va.	Harris,	Pendleton,	Walker.

NAYS—21.

Allison,	Ferry,	McDill,	Platt of N. Y.,
Anthony,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Plumb,
Blair,	Hill of Colorado,	Mahone,	Sewell.
Burnside,	Hoar,	Mitchell,
Conger,	Ingalls,	Morrill,
Dawes,	Kellogg,	Platt of Conn.,

ABSENT—35.

Beck,	Edmunds,	Jackson,	Saulsbury,
Butler,	Fair,	Jonas,	Saunders,
Camden,	Frye,	Jones of Florida,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Pa.,	Garland,	Jones of Nevada,	Sherman,
Cameron of Wis.,	Groome,	Logan,	Teller,
Cockrell,	Grover,	Maxey,	Van Wyck,
Conkling,	Hale,	Miller,	Voorhees,
Davis of Illinois,	Hawley,	Pugh,	Williams.
Edgerton,	Hill of Georgia,	Rollins,

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, that the resolution be indefinitely postponed, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I intended to submit a few remarks to the Senate upon the resolution before it; but the speeches made by the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Alabama anticipated so much that I had to say that I feel very ready to yield to my friend from Massachusetts if he desires to go into executive session or even if he desires to do no business and adjourn.

Mr. HOAR, (in his seat.) We would rather hear your speech.

Mr. PENDLETON. The junior Senator from Massachusetts is extremely polite and I am obliged to him for the suggestion; but just at that particular moment I was addressing myself to the senior Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I trespassed on the courtesy of my colleague to express my very great desire to hear the speech of the honorable Senator from Ohio. I hope he will not disappoint us.

Mr. PENDLETON. Well, I will not disappoint you; but I should prefer to gratify you to-morrow.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator suggest that he would desire to proceed to-morrow?

Mr. PENDLETON. It would be rather more agreeable to me to go on to-morrow morning, but I have no disposition to trespass too much on either the courtesy of the Senator from Massachusetts, from whom I always receive a full measure of it, or upon the courtesy of the gentlemen on the other side, and while it would be convenient to me to go on to-morrow, I am prepared to go on now.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator from Ohio cannot reconcile it to his duty to proceed with the public business this afternoon, I cannot refuse to yield to his appeal for an adjournment, he holding the floor for to-morrow morning. Therefore, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at two o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, April 13, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] providing for the election of certain officers of the Senate, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone the resolution indefinitely, on which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PENDLETON. I should be very glad to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business so that what I may have to say shall not detain the Senate one moment from the consideration of its legitimate duty, if such a course would be agreeable to my friend from Massachusetts who has charge of the debate.

Mr. DAWES. I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not hear him.

Mr. PENDLETON. I said I should be very glad to move that the Senate proceed immediately to the consideration of executive business in order that what I may have to say shall not detain it a moment from the business for which we have been called, if such a course would be agreeable to my friend, the Senator from Massachusetts, who has charge of the debate.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator desire to submit his remarks in executive session?

Mr. PENDLETON. I shall be very willing to do so.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will only consent to proceed at once to the disposition of the pending resolution we shall be delighted to hear his remarks in ten minutes. It will not take ten minutes to pass the resolution. Otherwise I think the Senator will have to overcome his modesty and make his remarks in public.

Mr. PENDLETON. I rather think, from the experience we have had, that it will take more than ten minutes to pass the resolution.

Mr. DAWES. The difficulty is that the Senator will not submit to the majority. That is the only difficulty in getting at it.

Mr. PENDLETON. Oh, "the majority" is but one-half, aided by a constitutional contrivance to get us out of a dilemma.

Mr. DAWES. However, I will not interfere with the Senator's choice. If the Senator prefers to reserve his speech until we get into executive session, if he thinks it will keep, I hope we shall proceed to act on the resolution.

Mr. PENDLETON. The purpose of my inquiry was to avoid having my attention called, as it was yesterday, to the fact that some of our friends on the other side of the Chamber were, perhaps unexpectedly, absent, and that it would not be fair to make a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator is entirely fair and frank about it. I have had some doubt whether the indulgence which the Senator exercised yesterday has a good effect on this side. I think if he would bring us up standing once on this side——

Mr. PENDLETON. If it is the desire of the Senate that I should do so, I will exercise that discipline at once.

Mr. DAWES. I am almost tempted to call the Senator to my aid. However, I will let the Senator proceed with his remarks.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to make a remark?

Mr. PENDLETON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say to the Senator from Massachusetts before the Senator from Ohio begins, as some little confusion grew up yesterday on the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. BURNSIDE] and of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] relative to the position of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS,] the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] has a written statement of the pair, which he communicated to me yesterday, which is, as I recollect it, this: The Senator from Illinois is paired upon all questions of executive sessions, voting "yea" as to such motions; as to all questions bearing upon the main resolution, voting "nay" as to all questions upon that, and not paired as to all questions of adjournment.

Mr. DAWES. Was it to that the Senator alluded yesterday when he said the wind had shifted?

Mr. BECK. No; the wind has been blowing pretty steadily against Massachusetts for several days, and I think it will blow that way a while longer.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator seemed to intimate yesterday that it had shifted. That was a relief to me.

Mr. PENDLETON. My acknowledgments are first due this morning, Mr. President, to the two Senators from Massachusetts; first and largely to the junior Senator [Mr. HOAR] whose polite impatience to hear me yesterday suggested that I should make last evening the few remarks that I intend to submit to the Senate; and more largely to the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] who curbed his impatience and moved that the Senate adjourn. I shall take care while I am in the Senate to repay such obligations in kind and with full measure. They add to the pleasure of our intercourse upon the floor.

This extraordinary course of insisting upon a change of the officers of the Senate at an executive session; this course which is without a single precedent in all our history of insisting that the business of the Senate and the business of the country and the business of the President, which so considerately and patiently in obedience to the provisions of the Constitution he submits to us from day to day, shall be delayed and postponed until the Senate shall be disorganized in order that it may be organized again, has been defended upon various grounds by its various apologists upon the floor.

In the very outset of the discussion the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] told us that the incumbents of these offices are worthy and excellent men; that they are faithful, industrious, intelligent, obliging public officers; that the service of the Senate cannot be found fault with; and yet he said "our republican candidates for these same offices are worthy men also, and inasmuch as we have the power we intend to elect them." The Senator from Massachusetts told us that the possession of the offices of the Senate naturally follows upon the possession of the committees of the Senate, and that inasmuch as we had submitted to have the committees appointed by the vote of the Vice-President, a proceeding which we found to be necessary to enable the Senate fairly to discharge the duties for which it was convened, we ought with equal alacrity submit that the officers of the Senate should be changed by the same vote, a proceeding which we humbly conceive will retard rather than expedite the fair and proper discharge of our duties.

The Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] I think, stated that the full power of the Senate in the organization of its committees and the appointment of its officers belongs to the shifting political majority which happens to be found here, and that we ought meekly and kindly (to use the words of one Senator if not the Senator from Illinois) to submit to the inevitable. Many Senators have told us, notably my colleague, [Mr. SHERMAN,] that the rule of a majority is the law of legislative bodies, and resistance to that rule beyond the point which the conscience of the majority can justify is irregular, improper, and even revolutionary. I think we were told by a Senator from Massachusetts that it contained in itself the very essence of treason. I do not care to quote that remark upon the Senator from Massachusetts, because when he was pressed by the argument of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN,] with a good deal of unwillingness, and I cannot say with entire grace, he backed out of a position into which he had rather ostentatiously entered.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to say a word to him?

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will find on looking at the RECORD that the qualification of the remark which I made, that he now speaks of as backing out, accompanied the original remark; and that when the honorable Senator from Georgia adverted to it, before he had entered upon his argument, I called his attention to the fact that I accompanied the remark which I had made with a distinct statement that I only referred to the consequence of his doctrine, and that I did not impute to him or to his associates in practice a determination to carry out the doctrine to that consequence. It was an original qualification. However, if the Senator will permit me, I wish to say that the statements which have been made upon this floor and the conduct of the gentlemen on that side warrant me now in imputing what I then declined to impute, and I do now so impute it. I propose to take a coming time to state the reasons of that imputation.

Mr. PENDLETON. I am sorry to see that the Senator from Massachusetts, having, as I think, made the statement from which he was compelled to recede, though he says, and I accept the fact, that he made it with qualification, now comes up to the position which I said he occupied and makes it without any qualification whatever. After we shall have heard his reasons I shall ask my honorable friend from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] to repeat with emphasis the argument that he made upon the point, and I feel very certain that the Senator from Massachusetts will retract again.

Mr. President, it would be very easy to show that all these various statements made by Senators on the other side of the Chamber so far as they are true are utterly inapplicable to the present condition of this discussion, as so far as they are applicable to the condition of affairs before the Senate they lose all their truthfulness and pertinency.

My honorable colleague, in a speech which he made the latter part of last week and of which I can say in his absence that it was extremely direct and forcible, touched upon all these various considerations, but he touched them so lightly and so carelessly as to show that he did not consider them as safe or even respectable stepping-stones for him; for he brushed past them in a moment and hastened to put this struggle in the Senate upon higher ground. At one bound he leaped to the height of this argument and told us that this apparently unimportant struggle which is going on here is in fact a struggle for political power in Virginia; that it involves in its consequences possibly the installation of the republican party in that State and the destruction of the democratic party there.

My colleague well knows for what he is contending. He well knows the prize which is put before the eyes of his party in this contest which is going on here, and, with a courage which will always be found equal to his desires, he hastens to avow it. It is, he says, a struggle for political power in Virginia, and it is this, he says, which lends interest to this contest in his eyes.

Sir, I am glad we have at last the simple truth stripped of all its disguises. It is no longer a question of the election of officers of the Senate; it is no longer a question of equipping the Senate for the discharge of its public duties; it is no longer a question of our convenience and comfort in the transaction of the public business which is committed to us; it is no longer a question of rewarding political favorites or reinstating faithful public servants. It is a struggle for political power in the State of Virginia at the coming State election; and the instrumentality to be used in that struggle is to clothe Captain Riddleberger with all the dignity, and all the importance, and all the moral influence which an election to a high office in the Senate, which close affiliations with the republican members of the Senate, which this unanimous vote of confidence by every republican Senator can give him; and also to strengthen his hand for that contest in Virginia by giving to him the power of the appointment of the sixty or eighty or a hundred employés of the Senate, and the power of dispensing the patronage of a hundred or more thousand dollars which will accrue in the shape of salaries before the next meeting of Congress. It is a struggle for political power in Virginia, and the instrumentality to be used is to give to this gentleman a brigade of the employés of the Senate, paid at the public expense, to perambulate that State and to watch and win legislative elections in doubtful districts by gifts and promises of offices and salaries, and everywhere to aid in swelling the aggregate of votes for the governor and other State officers. We are told that at the next election in Virginia a Legislature will be chosen which will have the selection of nine members of the supreme court of that State, who will hold their offices for twelve years, and all the fiscal State officers, and perhaps the magistrates and judges of the county courts.

This, democratic Senators, is the struggle to which you are invited. It has been proclaimed by the leaders of the republican party; it has been defined so that it cannot be misunderstood by my colleague. This is the gage of battle that is thrown down to us and I venture in your presence to take it up.

If for the purpose of acquiring political power by this means one-half of this newly-elected Senate can neglect the business of the country in confirming nominations; if for this purpose the newly-installed Administration can sit supinely by and see its friends refuse to consider its nominations and equip it for the discharge of public duties, to which task we of the opposition constantly invite you; if for this purpose grave Senators can invoke the doubtful and dangerous powers of the vote of the Vice-President to eke out a majority which the States and the people have denied to you on this floor, then we of the minority can use all the rules which have been established for the protection and guidance of the Senate to prevent the consummation of that great wrong.

We will invite you ever and continuously to go to the discharge of the public business. We will submit to your guidance in the order and the transaction of that business. We will faithfully and intelligently and industriously consider the nominations which your committees report to us. We will consider according to the best of our ability and advise according to our best judgment as to the treaties which your committees submit to our action; and when the public business is all discharged we will unite with you in adjourning the Senate; but we will not permit (much less will we aid the desecration) the holy things upon that altar, consecrated to the discharge of great public duties, sacred to the discharge of great public trusts, dedicated to the service of the country, and therefore for the service of all parties, but for the partisan uses of none, to be dragged from their high places and made the instruments of petty political warfare and the spoils of petty partisan triumphs. We will prevent this wrong. You may call it improper; you may call it irregular; you may call it revolutionary; you may call it treasonable; but we will prevent this great wrong, as we think it, and then we will appeal to the people, our masters and your masters, to decide the right between us.

Mr. President, this is no longer a question of a free ballot and a fair count. The Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] who is not just at this moment in his place, with his fiery eloquence, seemed to desire for a day to give that phase to this struggle. The junior Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] who knows how to depict every passion so strongly, from mournful lamentation to fiery indignation, and who lends to the intensity of his speech so much by his voice and his manner and his tone and his facial expression, seemed to me to speak with rather bated breath when he remembered that he approached this subject of a fair count fresh from the triumphs of the electoral commission. In the later days of this debate we have heard very little upon the subject of a free ballot and a fair count. It was too broad a farce. Since when, I should like to know, has the candidate for Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate been made the very paladin of a free ballot and a fair count? Since when, I should like to know, has he been made the bearer of the oriflamme which marshaled the loyal hosts in that crusade? Surely it must have been since the time to which the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] called our attention, when, being a member of the Legislature of Virginia, this candidate for Sergeant-at-Arms appealed to the courtesy of a fellow-member to give him the floor, and then returned the compliment by moving to expel him. The man whom he proposed to expel was "a man and a brother." He may not have been the Moses of his race, but he was in the very vanguard of those who were following some beckoning Moses and had reached the fair places of the Legislature of Virginia. To use the poetic language of the Senator from Massachusetts, his sandaled feet were climbing to the summit, the light of the morning illumined his brow, and like—with the glad tidings of great joy to his race, when this ruthless Riddleberger moved to expel him from the high places which he had reached, because he was a negro and a debt-payer, and a republican in particular, and a nuisance in general. Since when, I should like to know, is it that the division of the democratic party in Virginia led by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] has become the champion, the special and par excellence champion of this battle for "a free ballot and a fair count?" I have looked somewhat curiously into the literature and the history of that division of the democratic party, and I cannot find that the special championship of "a free ballot and a fair count" was ever attributed to it by the republican party of Virginia or by the democratic party of Virginia or was even claimed by that division of the party itself.

Jocund morn stands tiptoe on the misty mountain-top,

My colleague said that there had been no bargain and no arrangement and no trade in reference to this matter; that those who said so were using unworthy words. Mr. President, I take the statement of my colleague as he made it. I know nothing beyond the statements of gentlemen and the acts which have been done here in public; but, sir, I do know and all the world that knows anything about this matter knows that on Friday the vote of the Senator from Virginia transferred to one-half of the Senate known as the republican party the control of all the committees of the Senate, and that on Tuesday the caucus of the republican Senators unanimously nominated for Sergeant-at-Arms a man for the introduction of whose name the Senator from Virginia a day or two afterward announced that he was alone responsible.

I put it to my candid friend from Iowa who sits before me [Mr. ALLISON], if the Senator from Virginia had not voted to give the republican party the control of the committees of this body would a republican caucus ever have heard of the name of Riddleberger? Would they have taken from the five millions of republicans who are ready to serve the Senate in this capacity, would they have taken from among them all, this democratic Riddleberger? If my friend from Iowa, with his usual modesty, does not like to answer that question, I will transfer it to the senior Senator from Massachusetts who has charge of this debate, and I will ask him whether if the Senator from Virginia had not given the control of these committees to the republican half of this Senate, the name of Riddleberger would ever have been mentioned in your caucus in connection with the nomination for an office in the Senate?

What! silent still? and silent all?

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Ohio does not quite do justice to this side of the Senate Chamber when he insists upon putting in his speech that we are silent because we do not break in upon his speech. [Laughter.] Mr. President, if the Senator prepared at home this statement, "Silent one and silent all," it is highly proper that he should now insert it in his speech. I take the liberty, however, to say to him that he has no right to assume that there is no answer to his speech because he cannot be interrupted just at this moment to spoil the figure which he prepared at home and committed to memory for this occasion.

Mr. PENDLETON. It is very apparent, Mr. President, that the Senator from Massachusetts dislikes to interrupt me, and therefore he refuses a simple answer of "yes" or "no" to the question I propounded.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the Senator commenced his speech with beautiful compliments to me for my courtesy——

Mr. PENDLETON. You deserved them all.

Mr. DAWES. For which he is kind enough to say I was deserving. How could I interrupt that flow by injecting into a beautiful figure prepared, with the audience all notified that it was coming, by anything which I preferred to say after he had got up?

Mr. PENDLETON. And still, Mr. President, I have no answer to the question whether the name of Riddleberger would ever have been heard in a republican caucus unless the Senator from Virginia had voted to transfer the committees of the Senate to the Republican portion of it.

Mr. President, I say that the vote of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] was given on Friday; I say that the nomination of Riddleberger by the republican caucus occurred on Tuesday following. I have shown the post hoc; I leave my worthy colleague to argue the question of propter hoc with those who are inclined to debate it. For myself I say nothing.

When the awful silence of the court was broken upon a very notable trial by a voice from the gallery which said, "Werry right, Sammy; always spell it with a 'we,'" and the irate and dumfounded judge said, "Mr. Weller, do you know who that was that interrupted the court?" Sam said, "I rather think it was my father." "Do you see him now?" said the frowning judge. "No, I do not," said Sam, staring right up into the lantern in the roof of the court. "Have you a pair of eyes?" said Sergeant Buzzfuz. "I have a pair of eyes," said Sam, "and that is just it. If they wos a pair o' patent double-million magnifyin' gas-microscopes of hextra power p'raps I might be able to see through a flight o' stairs and a deal door; but bein' only eyes, you see, my wision is limited." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I heard something said in the debate the other day about "the Ohio idea." I do not think the gentleman who spoke of it quite understands what it is. The Ohio idea is the absolute equality of all men before the law; absolute and equal justice to all men by the law; and, in the administration of our State affairs, the administration of the few powers committed to our State Legislature by the Constitution in such wise as that every man may pursue his own avocations and his own scheme of domestic life according to his tastes and his judgment and his habits and his education to such extent, without interference by sumptuary laws, as is consistent with the order of society and the peace of the community. And in national affairs "the Ohio idea" is the absolute performance of every act to which the plighted faith of the nation is given. It is that no classes and no industries shall be fostered and benefited by subsidies and bounties paid out of the common treasure and the common labor. It is that our financial system shall be so regulated and ordered as that labor shall find abundant employment and receive a steady and adequate reward. It is that that system shall be so ordered and administered that when vicissitudes over which we have no control and which we cannot prevent, wars and convulsions and exigencies of other nations, shall drain from us, as they always have at intervals and always will, the precious metals, our domestic trade shall not stagnate for want of a currency, and labor shall not starve and debtors shall not become bankrupt. It is that no combination of corporations or of capital shall dictate vetoes and defeat refunding acts. It is that the man shall stand higher than the corporation. It is that the interest of the people shall stand higher than the money power. It is that everywhere in State and in nation the active brain and the sinewy frame and the lofty aspirations of the poor and the lowly shall have before the law an equal chance in the race of life with all others. And it is that, cultivating these fundamental ideas, we shall stand abreast with an active, progressive, humane, humanizing civilization, whose constant advance is such that the unseen of yesterday becomes the goal of to-day and the starting-point of to-morrow.

This is the democratic "Ohio idea." It is the ideal of Ohio democracy.

And there is another instruction which that great Commonwealth which I am so proud to call my mother enjoins upon all her sons of all parties and persuasions; that when they are intrusted with great public duties they shall perform them so honestly, so faithfully, so intelligently, as that when any party in the country seeks for one whom to invest worthily with the performance of great duties and the possession of great powers and the enjoyment of great honors, it will turn instinctively to her. Do you ask me for a proof? I would point to my honorable colleague of to-day; I would point to his illustrious predecessor in this Senate, my honored colleague of the last session.

Mr. President, the constant cultivation of these principles, which are called our Ohio idea, has given to the people of that State a very high appreciation of the right of suffrage. We believe that it is the right preservative of all rights, and that it lies at the very foundation of our whole fabric of government. Our people are sensitive about its enjoyment everywhere. They hear with not entire complacency of the restrictions that are put upon suffrage by the laws of Massachusetts, but they recognize the constitutional right of Massachusetts to regulate the right of suffrage within her limits in her own way, subject only to the constitutional amendment; and therefore, however much dissatisfied, they do not feel at liberty to find fault. They hear, not with entire satisfaction, of the restrictions imposed by the State of Rhode Island upon her citizens of German and Irish descent, so valuable a part of our population, so intelligently exercising the right of suffrage with us; but she admires the sturdy manhood of Rhode Island's Senators who in these days rise upon this floor and in the strongest terms assert the validity and the virtue of the conservative doctrine of State rights.

The people of Ohio are sensitive upon the infraction of the right of suffrage anywhere and everywhere, and they are just as sensitive to an infraction of the right of suffrage when it comes from the mill-owners of Massachusetts as when it comes from the white people of the South; but the people of Ohio, I am proud to say, do not sit with open, eager ears anxious to hear evil accounts of their neighbors, whether North or South. When we hear from a defeated candidate for governor of Massachusetts of the great wrongs imposed upon the laboring classes of Massachusetts; when a committee of this Senate makes its report that great wrong has been done in various of the counties and towns of that State, we listen patiently to the honorable Senators from that State who deny that the accounts are true, who assert that there is no illegal limitation upon a free suffrage there. We find them upright and honorable men in all the avocations in which we are brought together upon the floor of this Senate; and the people of Ohio regard their denial and are glad to believe that the stories are at least greatly exaggerated. When we hear of outrages committed in the South upon the negro population in depriving them of the right of suffrage there, we call upon her Senators for information as to the facts. If it relates to South Carolina we call upon HAMPTON and BUTLER; if Alabama, upon PUGH and MORGAN; if Mississippi, upon GEORGE and LAMAR; if North Carolina, upon VANCE and RANSOM. They are men well known to the Senate, well known to the country, men in whose keeping every man in this Senate, whatever may be his political persuasion, would put his honor and his property and his life; and we ask them what of these stories that we hear coming up from your States, and one and all without default they rise in their places and say to us, These stories are false, or they are exaggerated, or a personal difficulty has been made to grow into a political disorder, and that which would be elsewhere called personal antagonism and private murder is here made a political mob and a riotous assemblage followed by assassination.

Gentlemen, we believe them; gentlemen we believe, we, the people of Ohio, that these accounts are coming to us either manufactured or exaggerated. We know that our own populations are not free from crime; we do not expect that yours will be. We know that wrong and robbery, that outrage and assassination belong to this active race of ours. We know that political misdeeds are to be found everywhere. In my own State as I have said, the State of Ohio, we value above all things a free ballot and a fair count, but we have had our difficulties too. On the morning of election day it frequently happens that a black cloud arises in Kentucky just below the Ohio River and extends to West Virginia, and the cities of Cincinnati and Portsmouth and Marietta and Ironton and all the river cities of our State present such an appearance upon the streets and sidewalks that you would suppose that the exodus from North Carolina of last year had been thrown in that morning upon our borders, but by ten o'clock the sun has come up, the black cloud has been dispersed, the negroes having voted, and we return to our normal condition.

We have had ballot-box stuffing; we have had criminal judges of election; they are to be found everywhere. We know how to distinguish between these exceptional wrongs and an organized system of intrusion upon the freedom of the ballot. We expect the one thing to be found at the South and at the North, as it is with us in Ohio; but we do not expect to find either in the North or in the South, either in South Carolina or in Massachusetts, systematic violation of the law which gives to the negro the right to vote in Mississippi as it gives to the laboring population the right to vote in the North. I tell you, Mr. President, and I tell you gladly, that while the people of Ohio are not less sensitive to-day than they ever have been to the outrages upon a free ballot and a fair count, they are to-day less credulous than they have been. They do not fail to see that this wonderful crop of stories increases just before every election at the North, or when we have a debate of a political character in Congress. They do not fail to notice with pain the fact that the senior Senator from Massachusetts the other day came into the Senate with a pitiful tale of an old man who had carried his fortunes and his family and his life to Mississippi and had there invested his money, and after years of habitation his factories had been burned, his employés murdered, and he himself driven to return to Massachusetts whence he went; and they will note with astonishment added to that pain, permit me to say, that when a Senator from Mississippi rose in his place and asked the name of that man already in Massachusetts, asked the locality in which all this had happened, asked it, as he said, that he might investigate the truth, the Senator from Massachusetts declined to give the name, declined to give the locality, declined to satisfy him in any respect so that he might investigate the story, and when, forsooth, he was pressed to the point, with very scant courtesy he only admitted that he had stated a factory was burned when in fact it was a cotton-gin.

Sir, the people of the Northwest will note this thing; they will note the stories that are told which have no name and no locality in which to track them. They will note another thing, and that is that Senators upon this floor, more than one of them, the Senator from Massachusetts who sits before me, [Mr. HOAR,] the Senator from Connecticut, not now in his place, [Mr. HAWLEY,] my colleague from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] have all repeated in divers shapes and forms that it is not the South that they hated; not the South that they were combating; not the South against which they leveled the anathema of their rhetoric; but that it was against the Bourbon democratic party that they would be found forever making war. Ay, Mr. President, it is the democratic party, and not the outrages at the South, against which they made war; the people are beginning to understand, and it will not be the fault of this debate if they do not make great progress in understanding, that it is not the rebellion, that it is not the confederate brigadiers, that it is not the outrages upon the negroes of the South, but that it is hatred for this democratic party of ours, North as well as South, which inspires the fervor of your philanthropy and the greatness of your efforts. They are fast coming to understand that if the white population of any State in this Union should send members of Congress belonging to the republican party to the Senate and the House of Representatives, if it should elect members of the electoral college of the republican party, then the white population may do what it pleases within the borders of the State as to the conferring and securing the right of suffrage there.

Mr. President, we have heard something of "the solid South" in this debate. At the last election, from Maine to New Jersey we had a solid New England; from New Jersey to Missouri we had a solid central belt; from Missouri to the lakes we had a solid Northwest; and not one of these solid sections of the country had the justification or the apology which "the solid South" presents to us. The South is confronted with a great domestic problem, truly said by the Senator from Connecticut to be one of the painful problems of government. Four millions of people, without act of the white people of the South, lifted at once into the rights of citizenship and suffrage; four millions of people, without fault of theirs, the most ignorant and unfit to exercise the right of suffrage; and you gentlemen, you who are responsible for this state of affairs, you gentlemen seeing this grave question presented in all its painful and all its mournful and all its difficult and intricate aspects to the people of the South, you gentlemen insist, because the exigencies of political warfare in Northern States have seemed to require it at your hands, you insist upon flooding the ears of the people of the North with tales of horror and outrage, and by the reflection of these stories and by the agency of your minions you teach these enfranchised negroes that the white men among whom they live and who were their former masters are ready to enslave them again and deny to them every right, and refuse to them the right of suffrage and treat them with hardship and wrong-doing; and thus you separate the two races at the South, while you know and avow you know that the only solution of this great question is that the two races shall live in harmony and peace, with confidence in each other, and divide, as all other classes of the community everywhere of whatever nationality are wont to divide, as between the controlling and striving parties of the country. Peace between the races is essential—confidence and kindness between them. This is the only solution of this great question, and against this solution, I am bound here, and sadly, to say it, the republican party has steadily and always set its face.

I listened with infinite satisfaction to the speech which was made yesterday by the junior Senator from Alabama, [Mr. PUGH.] It was wise, it was patriotic, it was humane, it was statesmanlike. I wish it could be put into the hands of every man in the Northern States, for I believe that it would show to him, whatever his political proclivities and prejudices may be, that the intelligence and virtue and purity and integrity of the people of the South are struggling with this great question, and that they intend to produce a solution of it which shall at once secure the amplest right of suffrage to the negro and the peace and order and well-being of the community in which he lives.

Mr. President, even at the risk of repeating in a feebler way a once told and powerfully told story, I desire to emphasize two or three sentences uttered by that Senator and call the attention of the Senate and, as far as I can, of the country to his wise utterances upon this subject. He says:

> We know from long association and experience with the negroes of the South that they are easily controlled by appeals to their ignorant race fears and prejudices; and when they are told by republican candidates and stump speakers that the white people held them in slavery and opposed their emancipation and would re-enslave them if they had the power, and that the whites of the South are their enemies and oppressors, the necessary and unavoidable effect of such appeals is to band them together as a race; and when the whites see this mass of illiteracy thus organized and controlled by wicked men for evil and ruinous purposes, the natural and inevitable counter-effect is to force the white people together as a race for self-preservation. For these reasons and causes the presence of this frightful mass of illiteracy in a distinct race, whose ignorant prejudices are easily inflamed against the whites, is the source of all our troubles and a standing menace to our society, peace, good order, industries, and local governments. The highest interests and welfare of both races demand that their relations shall be friendly, and the whites recognize the fact that the negro, in his present condition of illiteracy, is the helpless victim of wicked men, and every intelligent, honest, Christian man feels the obligations of a great Heaven-imposed trust to take care of this weaker and defenseless population, and to govern and control them in the right way, so as to prevent their ignorance from causing them to be converted into enemies of peace, society, property, and civil government. If trusted with the discharge of this high public duty, according to our best ability and judgment, it would be but a few years before all these race troubles and difficulties involving the South on account of negro suffrage would forever disappear; and then "the solid South" would cease to be a standing menace to the republican party, and intelligent, moral, honest, Christian white people at the South would divide on governmental theories and principles, and questions of tariffs for revenue and protection, and currency and finance, and internal improvements and civil reform and administration, and array themselves in different parties.
> * * * * * * *

What the Senator affirms—

Speaking of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY]— of the capability of "intelligence and morality to deal with the whole great question of impartial suffrage," the South affirms in reference to the capabilities and willingness of its intelligence and morality to deal with the question of negro suffrage and the execution of the fifteenth amendment in letter and spirit. * * * As I have already suggested, not only is the "intelligence and morality" of the South capable, but willing and anxious to secure the benefit of a free and unpurchased ballot to all qualified by law to exercise it.

Words of wisdom which I wish could ring in the ears and fall deep into the hearts of all the sectional parties in this country that they might gather from them a new inspiration of patriotism and a desire for a higher and more advanced civilization. Sir, I am no friend to the solidarity of sections anywhere. The solidarity of sections in this country means a doubt either as to the peace of society or the true bases of government. I would be glad to see those questions put upon an enduring and satisfactory foundation so that men in every section would differ as to economic questions, differ as to the administration of the Government, as we know that this race of ours, descended from the Anglo-Saxons and the Anglo-Normans and the Celts and the Latins, this composite race of ours, with all its activity of intellect and of energy, will always differ upon questions that are brought before it. I will rejoice to see the day when under beneficent auspices, doing good to all and injury to none, this consummation shall be finally achieved, that all races and all sections of all races will differ as to the questions of government as men differ upon all the problems of life. In the mean time let it be understood everywhere that the people of Ohio will insist that there shall be everywhere, in the South and in the North, absolute and complete freedom to deposit a lawful ballot and absolute and complete certainty that it shall be honestly counted. Nothing less will satisfy them. Our system of Federal government gives them an interest in this "free ballot and fair count," and they will insist upon it with all the moral influence which their intelligence gives them and with all the power which their numbers and the Constitution enable them to wield.

Mr. President, I have noticed that with a tone and an emphasis, which savor somewhat of scant courtesy, gentlemen upon the other side of this Chamber have repeatedly spoken of "the Bourbon democracy." What is "the Bourbon democratic party," as these gentlemen term it? It is that party which last November so equally divided the population of this country, its fifty millions of people, as that the petty, trifling number of 3,500 transferred to us would have given a popular majority for our candidate. This Bourbon democratic party is the party of Jefferson and Madison and Monroe and Jackson and Polk; it is the party that gave to us Louisiana and Florida and Texas and New Mexico and California; it is the party that a hundred years ago, laying aside kingcraft upon the one side and mere confederation on the other, made this Constitution and for sixty years so administered it that in the Government during all that time there was no law higher than the Constitution itself. It is the party which in the cycle of its years has drawn to itself every able and patriotic statesman who was not willing to walk in the wicked ways of sectionalism. It is the party which in storm and tempest and winter blasts has stood like the ocean rock unmoved and immovable, while around its base all other parties, the things of a day, this boasted republican party included, have surged and swayed with uneven and inconstant motion like the waves that obey the fitful bidding of the fickle moon. The spray may have covered its sides; the waters may have washed its summit; but every recession of the storm has shown that its light was unquenched, its luster undimmed, pointing out the dangerous rocks that lie yonder, and illuminating the pathways of safety that lie by its side. And you ask the Senators of this party to enter actively with you upon a crusade which is intended to foist the republican party on the State of Virginia! You ask the Senators of this party to prostitute the offices and emoluments and patronage of this Senate that they may be used in the seduction and debauchment of the people of Virginia at her next State election. Gentlemen, we will not do it. You forget what this Senate is. Three quarters of the States may change our Constitution, but the organization of this Senate cannot be changed except by the consent of each State itself. You forget that we are one-half of this Senate, the peers of you all, the representatives of States which with slight limitations are sovereign. You forget the character of the work in which you invite our co-operation. Gentlemen, I tell you now, I tell you here, you will not have that co-operation for that purpose at any time.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, it was not my purpose to occupy the time of the Senate even for a moment and I should not do so now if the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] had not put on—I hope he will not think it offensive for me to say so—an air of triumph and disappointment that he was not interrupted by me upon an appeal which he made.

I desire simply to call the attention of the Senate to the debate itself. The debate against the passage of these resolutions was commenced by those who were opposed to them in this Chamber, and has been controlled by those opposed to the will of the majority of this body. The majority have contented themselves with meeting from time to time what has been presented by the other side. The Senator from Ohio himself commenced it, representing so worthily and so properly the party on the other side, with a prepared speech such as he always makes, and such as always entitles him to receive, as he does, the attention of the Senate. From time to time during the debate he has participated in it in the same character, and to-day with a more carefully prepared and elaborate speech he has spoken again, I have a right to say, for the party which he represents. It is therefore quite instructive to take a short and brief retrospect of this debate, and see whether there is any lesson in it.

I accord to the Senator the credit, which is his due, of attempting from time to time to lift it up, if he could, out of the channels into which his associates carrying it on have dragged it; and in so doing the Senator has left his own record along through it, and he has helped, as to-day, to tell us how it has grown apace in these few weeks, how little to-day it resembles the debate which he himself launched upon the country in opposition to these resolutions. No more favorable sign of the times comes up to cheer and strengthen and encourage us to meet that debate as those on the other side shall choose to present it, than the fact that they who began and carried it on are quite as little satisfied with it as any one else.

When the Senator rose in his place as the representative of the democratic party in opposition to the proposition that the majority should rule in this body, his complaint was that this was an executive session of the Senate; and the debate proceeded on that side upon the narrow and pitiful point that it was improper for the Senate of the United States to make choice of its own officers, even if its own majority should so decide, at an executive session which was being held in this end of the Capitol in the absence of the House of Representatives. When that point slipped out of sight, there came forth next in the progress of the debate that it was unseemly haste, that the incumbents of these offices were taken unaware and had not set their house in order, and that such notice as would give them opportunity for that proper official duty of theirs which is always to be ready to render an account of their stewardship should be afforded, namely, until the December session, and then there would be no opposition to the will of the majority on that side of the Chamber, and the attempt was made to justify a defiance of the will of the majority of this Senate upon an equally small and pitiful complaint that these officers did not know that they held their offices at the will and command of a majority of the Senate. That did not satisfy the Senator from Ohio longer than a day or two; and then it was thought advisable to change the front of this debate and discussion, always under the control of his side and of him as their leader. They turned their batteries then upon the propriety of the majority's selecting themselves their candidates and undertook to announce that their opposition to the will of the majority was founded upon the impropriety of that majority having selected a distinguished citizen of Virginia for the office of Sergeant-at-Arms of this body; and the whole line of their attack rattled with the musketry of the other side fired upon the head of a single person named in one of these resolutions, and it was announced on the other side, withdraw one particular man from your resolutions and there shall be no further opposition to the will of the majority of this body. It having occurred to some minds on the other side during the debate that that was quite as narrow a ground to stand upon as any, and that whether the majority had selected for that office just the man that the minority would have selected was not a question for the minority to determine, but a question for the majority itself to decide upon under its accountability to that higher majority which is omnipotent in this nation, it was thought wise to progress a little further in this debate, and to say, no longer that this is an executive session, no longer that we are exhibiting mere indecent haste, no longer that you have not taken the man for Sergeant-at-Arms that we would take, but it is that there is associated with you a man who ought to have voted with us. It was not that this man was not good enough to vote with us; it was not that we could not have affiliated with him; it was not that we did not hold out what the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] called our amorous arms, into which we sought to bring him. Oh, no, that was not it; it was because in spite of all our blandishments, in spite of all our temptations and inducements, in spite of the fact that we had failed before the people of his own State to drive out or to crush him, in spite of the fact that the great work in which he was engaged had outlived all the assaults of the other side, he still lives a power in his own State, clothed with its authority here in this body, a freeman, to take his place on which side of this Chamber his own conscience and his own judgment, and that alone, and the men who sent him here should dictate; it was because in spite of it all he took upon himself the liberty of his own manhood and took his own place upon this side, after committees on the other side had waited upon him, had bowed to him, not one alone, two or more, one after the other had approached this man whom they now discover to be a leper, and had said, "Though your leprosy be as offensive as it may be, if you will only come and stand with the democracy that has endeavored to slaughter and annihilate you, if you will give this power the people of Virginia have intrusted to you to a party that has endeavored to crush and annihilate you, you have no sins on your head that will trouble us at all. You have no disease so offensive even to the Senator from Mississippi that we will not take to our bosom. Do you want any place? Tell us where we shall put you, what will be most agreeable to you on our committees. Tell us where, if you will only stand with us, you would like to have us put you, and all will be well." Has anybody forgotten, does not the Senator from Ohio find new reason for coming here this morning to change the front of this debate in the knowledge that has gone abroad of the failure to get the vote of this Senator from Virginia in the election to the office of Sergeant-at-Arms of one who still affiliates with them? Is not the Senator from Ohio aware that Virginia knows that this is only an afterthought; that but a few weeks before this session met they had a new candidate for Sergeant-at-Arms who could be elected Sergeant-at-Arms if he could but command the vote of this corrupt man? Has the Senator just heard, and therefore felt, that it is quite necessary to change this debate, that offices were tendered to him if he would but take his stand with those who had undertaken to annihilate him and his power and the power which sent him here in the State of Virginia?

Mr. PENDLETON. I wish the Senator would be a little more explicit. He is talking about something that I do not comprehend at all. I understood him to say something about another candidate for Sergeant-at-Arms that he or we or somebody would have put up some time ago, that was not done for some reason or other, and I understood him to say that offices and honors were tendered to somebody if he would give a vote on our side of the House. I do not know exactly to what the Senator refers, and I should be glad to have a more explicit statement with any authority he may have to give.

Mr. DAWES. Perhaps it was wise that the Senator who is spokesman for that side should not have been furnished with the details.

Mr. PENDLETON. I would be glad if the Senator would inform me, as I have not been informed before.

Mr. DAWES. The inquiry I made of the Senator was whether it had just come to his ears.

Mr. PENDLETON. That what?

Mr. DAWES. That there were efforts being made before this Senate convened and after the Senate convened that Senators have, representing themselves to be of the committees for the arrangement of the committees of the Senate, approached the Senator from Virginia with propositions.

Mr. PENDLETON. I hear it now for the first time, and I should like the Senator to name the committees to which he alludes or the gentlemen who represented themselves as such.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I chanced to have been a member of the committee for the arrangement of committees when this side of the Chamber supposed it had the power to control them, and if any candidate for Sergeant-at-Arms or any official position of any grade or any character was ever offered to the Senator from Virginia upon condition that he would vote with this side, I have never heard it, and I do not believe there is one word of truth in the insinuation made by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. COCKRELL. And nobody else ever heard of it.

Mr. DAWES. I had no doubt of this response when I made the assertion. The Senator from Tennessee says he was of the committee——

Mr. HARRIS. I said I was of the committee for the arrangement of the committees.

Mr. DAWES. I so understood the Senator, and I was about to say that he spoke with exceedingly prudent precision. I have not made any statement that any such committee made propositions to the Senator from Virginia in regard to any candidate if he would vote with them. I did say, I repeat——

Mr. HARRIS. I beg the Senator from Massachusetts not to deal in innuendoes. If there be a Senator upon this side of the Chamber, or a number of Senators upon this side of the Chamber, that he understands has made any such proposition or suggestion as the one he intimates, I ask him to do this side of the Chamber and himself the justice to name the man or men and to deal no longer in innuendo or hide himself in the ambush of innuendo under the vail of insinuation in respect to a fact such as the one he would have the Senate and the country believe. Name your men, and if you do not, I repeat I do not believe that there is one word of truth in the intimation or insinuation thrown out by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Tennessee plays an old worn-out rôle in this Chamber. The Senator will not hold a threat over me or my liberty of debate here according to my judgment.

Mr. HARRIS. I only invite the Senator to tell the truth.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Virginia and Senators on the other side know whether what I speak is true or not. This I said, that they undertook to catechise out of me in the early part of this debate that the republican party had had conferences with this man when that was true on their side of the Chamber; and I said further that before this Senate met negotiations were in process by the other side of the Chamber, and I said it, sir, to the Senate in response——

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether he states as a fact that the Senator from Virginia was open to negotiations from anybody for his vote? That I understand to be the effect of the statement.

Mr. DAWES. Who can tell what the Senator from South Carolina understands? What I said authorizes nobody to understand that.

Mr. BUTLER. I think, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. DAWES. That would be more than I have power to do.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator certainly has the power to be very pert and not very polite. He certainly has that power, and I shall yield him the monopoly of that part of the debate at least. He certainly shall have the advantage of me in that respect. I asked him what I supposed to be a very civil and a very polite parliamentary question. He replies in a very bad temper, in a pert and I must say an impolite manner. If that is to be the character of the debate, I shall decline to enter into it. I asked him a very simple question, and that was this: I certainly understood him to say that negotiations had been opened with the Senator from Virginia before the Senate met; and I simply asked him if he meant to intimate that the Senator from Virginia would permit himself to be negotiated with by anybody; that was all.

Mr. DAWES. I supposed the Senator understood what I meant, and now that I discover that the Senator did not understand it, let me state that I did not say that the Senator from Virginia had entered into any negotiations, or at least I did not intend to say so. I said and meant to say that they undertook to enter into negotiations with the Senator from Virginia. I do not mean to say that any Senator on the other side in person made that attempt, but I undertake to say, I am informed from Virginia and from sources in which I have the utmost confidence, that representative men on that side did undertake to enter into negotiations to have their man selected, and went with the assurance that if his vote could be commanded that man could be elected. Everybody knows if that be so that it required the entire vote of the other side also to accomplish that fact.

Sir, it is wise for the other side to be in such a position that they are able to make the demonstration they have made here this morning. It would have been the height of stupidity and folly to have undertaken this in any more open way.

All I desire to say is that everything which has been charged by the other side upon the republican party as a reason why the Senator from Virginia has of his own free choice deliberately determined that as between the two sides his convictions and his work call upon him to join with us in this organization, finds in fact its foundation in the consciousness of the other side that it is the failure of those efforts on their part that have given bitterness and virulence to the attacks upon the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. PENDLETON. I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to have said that by representative men negotiations were entered into with the Senator from Virginia by which certain offices in the organization of the Senate, and perhaps certain offices in the organization of the committees of the Senate, would be given him or put into his control if he would give his vote for the organization with this side of the Chamber. Am I right?

Mr. DAWES. No, Mr. President——

Mr. PENDLETON. Now will the gentleman state it again?

Mr. DAWES. I say that it was attempted on the other side to negotiate with the Senator from Virginia and to ascertain from him what his wishes were in connection with that side, and what would be most agreeable to him. I think there are persons within the sound of my voice who will recognize what I now say when I state that he was informed that the democratic party had got sick of Bourbonism in Virginia and were desirous of joining with him in this new departure, and with a few exceptions were ready at this moment to make common cause with him if he would make common cause with them.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to say that so far as I know, so far as I have heard, and so far as I believe, the information given to the Senator from Massachusetts is absolutely false.

Mr. DAWES. I am glad the Senator has been kept unadvised in this matter. I should expect he would be, for he is the man to speak for his party, and he should be, as he is, kept in the dark. He should believe, as I have no doubt he does, what he has uttered to-day, that the party which he so gallantly leads is that great and glorious party likened unto the sun of heaven, with the rhetoric and the figures of speech that glow even now in the sunlight and echo around these Chambers. All this was necessary for him. I do not charge the Senator with concealment or disingenuousness; I charge no man on that side with anything of the kind. I admire the perfect precision of language in which the Senator from Tennessee indulges this morning when he says, "I was on that committee." I admire even the Senator from South Carolina more than he gives me credit for, when he comes up here and makes amends for all there is behind in the show of perfect faithfulness with which he can indulge with so much propriety here in the Senate Chamber.

Mr. BUTLER. May I be permitted——

Mr. DAWES. But I want to get through. Will the Senator pardon me a moment?

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator says he has not the power to pardon me. He certainly has the power to explain when he indulges in insinuations of that kind.

Mr. DAWES. Allow me to proceed with the few remarks which it occurred to me while the Senator from Ohio was speaking that I ought to make. I had got as far in the progress of this debate, its growth if not in grace certainly in the desire manifested on the other side of the Senate Chamber to lift it up to some platform upon which it could stand before the American people—I had got so far as the resolve on the other side to turn it into an attack upon the Senator from Virginia. It was legitimate for me to call attention to the fact that if the Senator from Virginia had found it in the line of his duty to have co-operated with the other side there was nothing in the Senator's political opinions, there was nothing in the purpose which the Senator avows dearest his heart in the organization which he leads in Virginia, there was nothing in his association with Riddleberger even, there was nothing about the Senator from Virginia that would not have permitted them to have hailed and welcomed him to their side.

They do not bring here at the door of this accusation against him one solitary reason for this attack except that the Senator has in his judgment come to the conclusion that the party determined to crush his political work and life and purpose in the South was not the party with whom he ought to affiliate. It is passing strange (if we did not hear it here all the day long from sources we are bound to believe are sincere no mortal could be made to believe) that the Senator from Virginia could be so stupid, so insincere, so determined upon suicide as to listen to the party who come up fresh from Virginia in the fight with him and say, like the spider to the fly, "Walk into my parlor, my dear." The Senator, as I have said before, would have forfeited all claim to sincerity in what he has been doing as well as all claim to common sense if, after having come out of a hand-to-hand fight with the men on the other side, he would instantly have surrendered and gone over to them.

Sir, the Senator took his stand himself; he took it deliberately; he asked no questions; he made no terms; he had no negotiation; he received no committees; no men went to him from our side and told him that with his vote "I can be elected Sergeant-at-Arms of this body." No man went to him from our side and told him, "what offices do you want, sir?" No, without conference, determining for himself where his great work lay, resolved upon the accomplishment of it and upon availing himself of all the means within his reach for its accomplishment, with a clear-sighted comprehension of the conflict of political forces in this country, he took the only position open to him; and, sir, the batteries that are opened upon him are the batteries of disappointment and chagrin and failure.

Mr. President, that was another step taken in this debate. That step has been abandoned to-day. The debate has been invited upon a new plane to-day. The democratic party is told to turn its back on all these things and to say to the country, "Though we be in a minority we will tell you what things we will permit to be done and what we will not permit to be done; we will come forward and we will ratify your treaties; we will confirm your nominations; we will even vote with you to adjourn, but we will not permit the majority in this Senate to rule." Sir, the majority in this country does not hold its power by permission or sufferance even of those out of whose loins sprang the rebellion itself. Sir, the majority in this country must command, and not take from the minority what it will do. All the offers of the Senator from Ohio, prepared at home and polished down into elegance and seeming fairness, sink into an abyss bottomless and destructive when he says, "but this and that we will not permit you to do;" all goes together into one common destruction when the people of this country are to ask that minority what it is they may do. Sir, over and over again upon this side of the Chamber it has been tendered to that side that we would bow in silence to the will of the majority and appeal——

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to inquire——

Mr. DAWES. In a moment. And appeal for our justification to that high tribunal in this land from which, and from which alone, there can be no appeal. But, sir——

Mr. HARRIS. I desire——

Mr. DAWES. In a moment. But, sir, the records show an utter refusal time and again to submit to the will of the majority and bow to its decree.

Mr. HARRIS. The question I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts is, Did that side of the Chamber bow to the will of the majority for two weeks while the majority on this side of the Chamber was proposing to form the committees of the Senate? And I will put an additional question while I am on my feet. I desire——

Mr. DAWES. Ask one at a time.

Mr. HARRIS. One at a time. Then if the Senator prefers it in that order I will wait.

Mr. DAWES. If you would just as lief. Then, sir, it comes to this: they will bow to the will of the majority when it accidentally, by the death of a Senator, falls with them; but when the Senate is full, when every seat is occupied and the will of the true majority is about to be uttered, there is not only no submission but there is an utter defiance of the will of the majority. With four seats empty on this side, there was an anxiety which savored little of that worship of the will of the actual majority to take a vote then; but the moment the seats were full and the vote that was to be taken was the vote of a full majority, anxiety on that side oozed out, like Bob Acres's courage, at the fingers' ends of every individual Senator who follows that spirit which I am calling the attention of the public to to-day, namely, that the will of the majority, according to their doctrine, is only to be observed when that will accords with their own notions.

Mr. HARRIS. The additional question that I desired to ask was, by what rule of mathematics does the Senator from Massachusetts claim that thirty-eight Senators who sit on that side of the Chamber constitute a majority over thirty-eight Senators who sit on this side of the Chamber? I should like to hear the Senator upon that question; and if the Senator would indulge me, I might be tempted to ask one or two other questions, but I fear to trespass upon the courtesy of the Senator.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, it is not thirty-eight and thirty-eight; it is the Senate of the United States under the Constitution of the United States that the Senator is making war on. If there be no majority speaking out of the Constitution and through the Constitution and by the Constitution, the Senator would not fear or resist the vote on these resolutions a moment. It is because he knows that the Senate of the United States as the Constitution has made it is against him that he struggles against it in an unequal fight which he may continue here until December, but——

Mr. HARRIS. Does not——

Mr. DAWES. In a moment. But, sir, I assure him that it is a fight in which there can be no compromise without destruction. He who will yield a hair of the omnipotent will of the majority as it speaks through the Constitution and the law of the land yields the citadel itself and is a traitor to his country. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. HARRIS. Does not the Senator from Massachusetts know, under that Constitution, to which he is so flippant in appealing, that without aid from this side of the Chamber the thirty-eight Senators who sit on that side are utterly powerless under the Constitution to perform any authentic act, any act that would be binding upon any individual in the universe? Even though the Vice-President may vote where the Senate is equally divided, he cannot aid to make a quorum or to make that side of the Chamber a constitutional majority. It is not a constitutional majority, it is but an equal number; and all that the Senator can claim is that they have the power to make a tie; and they ask that we consent to that condition of things which will enable a minority, with the Vice-President, to become the arbiter in respect to the pending question.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, if I understand the long question of the Senator from Tennessee, it is that the thirty-eight Senators on this side and the Vice-President of the United States who the Constitution says are a majority, and which Constitution we have sworn——

Mr. HARRIS. Is it a majority to make a quorum?

Mr. DAWES. Wait one moment. If the Senator will not interrupt me before I get to the next word I will say that his question is this: The votes of thirty-eight Senators with the Vice-President constitute a majority according to the Constitution, which, when we took our seats, we swore we would obey; and he asks whether that majority can do anything without the aid of the other side. Mr. President, does he mean that rather than that the majority shall rule he will again secede as he did twenty years ago? Does he mean that he will not perform his constitutional function here in this body, and that there stand with him on the other side the whole of that party which the Senator from Ohio has tried to lift up into the sky this morning, and that they will abandon their seats, they will refuse to perform their functions, they will declare——

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator allow me to state what I mean?

Mr. DAWES. They will declare that this body shall not proceed in the deliberations which its Constitution has enacted, because they do not like what the majority so constituted proposes to do? Does he announce that we cannot accomplish anything without their aid? We do not ask him, sir, to agree with us——

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. DAWES. Not just yet. We do not ask him to agree with us; his convictions are his own. We ask him to do his duty and vote according to his convictions. If he announces here that he and those who stand with him will not do that duty and will not vote and will leave this Government helpless and paralyzed because he does not agree with the convictions to which that majority have come, he announces only in a new form what I heard twenty years ago from a seat very near where the Senator himself stands, when a man got up there and announced that he held an allegiance higher than that of this Constitution which we have sworn to support, and that he would turn his back upon his oath and upon his flag and go forth to make war upon it. This is war in another form. This is fatal, if it succeeds, to the existence of a government of majorities, as was the undertaking of Jefferson Davis when he announced the same doctrine in another form from very near where the Senator now stands. Has it come to life again? Has it been resurrected after twenty years of war and disaster and surrender upon the field; has it come here in this mild and insidious form of absenting themselves from their duty, constitutional, sworn duty, and saying that the majority is helpless unless the minority proves true to its oath? Perhaps it is, sir. If the majority——

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator now allow me?

Mr. DAWES. In one minute. I have not got quite through with you.

Mr. HARRIS. I suppose not.

Mr. DAWES. If this is the last plane into which the Senator from Ohio directing this debate has lifted it, it is quite as important, far more so in my judgment than any debate that has been had in this Chamber since the fonndation of this Government. It is new to the American people that there is a method of overthrowing the will of its constitutional majority besides that which those whom the Senator followed inaugurated—and I do not say it for the purpose of reproach but for the purpose of emphasizing what I say—it is far more dangerous than that, for the American people can meet all its open enemies within and without. It is necessary also that it should understand and see clearly the covert and secret enemies of the will of the majority, such as the Senator from Tennessee contributed to uncover by his announcement here to-day.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, now that the frenzy of the Senator from Massachusetts has slightly abated, and as he desired to know what was meant by the——

Mr. DAWES. Is the Senator putting an interrogatory to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. KELLOGG in the chair.) Does the Senator yield?

Mr. DAWES. I have not given up the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. I thought I was occupying the floor by the courtesy of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. I had not yielded the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. Of course I did not so understand the Senator. I understood that he was still occupying the floor, and I expect him to occupy the balance of the day; but I say now that the frenzy which has moved him for the last ten or fifteen minutes has subsided slightly, and the bloody shirt has momentarily ceased to wave, as he was curious to know what I meant by a statement made by me a few moments since, I beg to assure him that so far as my official duties upon this floor are concerned they will be performed as earnestly, as faithfully, and as conscientiously by me as by the Senator from Massachusetts, and I trust with much more frankness and manliness than the Senator from Massachusetts has exhibited upon this occasion.

Now I meant simply this, that your boasted constitutional majority is not a majority at all; the only majority that is recognized by the Constitution is the larger number, more than half of the Senators upon this floor, such a majority as would make a quorum to do business, such a majority as would enable you to pass an act or to perform any other duty that devolved upon the Senate. You have no such majority; you will not pretend that you have it. I was simply calling your attention to the fact that your boasted constitutional majority is no majority, and that your whole claim is a false pretense intended to popularize your position and deceive the public. Your boasted majority is not a majority, you can only claim an equal number of Senators upon this floor. That is all that I asserted; it is what I meant; and so far as the performance of my duties here are concerned, so long as I shall hold a seat on this floor, I will be found as ready to perform them as the Senator from Massachusetts, and I trust always to perform them with a manly frankness that I do not see always characterized in the conduct of that Senator.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator and I will not debate the question of manliness——

Mr. HARRIS. Now, I may remind the Senator of the fact that in the expiring hours of the last session of Congress he with almost every other if not every other Senator on that side of the Chamber sat there in their seats silently refusing to vote and breaking a quorum, and rendering it impossible for the then majority in the Senate to transact the public business that the majority thought it important to consider, the nominations of the President of your own party, and one hundred or more of which went down because of the fact that the Senator from Massachusetts and other Senators upon that side of the Chamber sat silently in their seats and broke a quorum, which the Senator flippantly to-day characterizes as revolutionary and treasonable, while he cannot have forgotten that he and every other Senator or a large number of the Senators who sat on that side of the Chamber did exactly the same thing upon many occasions in the expiring hours of the last session of Congress.

If it is treason in this side of the Chamber to do this where you have no majority upon this floor was it not treason blacker and much more criminal in you, when we had an acknowleged and universally admitted majority upon this side of the Chamber, for your minority to defeat the action of this body for days and to the end of the Congress in respect to matters of grave importance to the whole country by sitting here dumfounded and silent, thus breaking a quorum and preventing the action of the Senate in respect to matters of general and of public importance?

Mr. DAWES. When the Senator renewed his interruption I was remarking in all kindness to the Senator that I would not discuss with him whether my political course was more manly than his or his more manly than mine. We must each judge for ourselves. I have no political course of any great mark one way or the other to trouble myself with or to trouble the country. I do not think anybody will be troubled with it. I have never been so engaged, however publicly, as to be obliged to leave my country. I have never been so engaged in reference to it that I could not take a solemn oath that I had never lifted my hand for its destruction. I have never avowed upon this floor that the majority could not do what it deemed its duty to do with my help and I would not help it. I have never avowed to the country that the will of the majority depending upon my co-operation for the execution of the functions of this Government would appeal to me in vain.

There are those who have tried open and manly hostility to the Government, who met danger in asserting their convictions upon the battle-field and tried their strength in doing it, and have manfully taken the consequences. There are those who, shunning the disasters and learning wisdom from the failure openly to dissolve the Union, have come, in a manner more dangerous because more stealthy, velvet-footed, to the determination that "that Government can be undermined, and nobody can meet us in the field or put us down by force; I can refuse to be a patriotic citizen; I can refuse to do my duty to my country and my oath, and nobody can call me to an account for it." Sometimes men who avow that doctrine think they are manly. I leave that to them to settle with themselves when the heat of debate is over; to settle with their consciences and with Him who holds the issues of life and death in this country and with every one of us in His hands. I charge no man; I only say I do not belong to that category of men. If I felt any duty to perform I trust I may have strength and courage to meet it and record my vote here according to my judgment, and abide in the country the judgment of her people upon it. I will skulk into no cloak-room, I will not fold up my hands when the majority require me to do my duty in order that the will of the majority may prevail.

Sir, I think I discover in the papers this morning why the attempt has been made to change the current of this debate. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] received a missive yesterday so important that he felt it his duty to make it public in justification, it may possibly be, of this continued struggle against the will of the majority. Ex-Governor Kemper, of Virginia, the papers say this morning, writes to the distinguished Senator from Virginia on my left [Mr. JOHNSTON] as follows:

If the democrats of the Senate triumph now, then the democrats of Virginia will triumph next November; but any step backward now means defeat next fall.

That is the shibboleth of the new departure announced this morning with so much rhetoric and elegance and power by the Senator from Ohio, binding it up and winding around it tropes and figures and flowers of rhetoric; but underneath it all and as the kernel of the whole thing is the missive sent to the Senator from Virginia yesterday by his coadjutor in the work which he failed to accomplish in crushing out the new democracy of this country; not that old democracy which has tried these thirty years to graft itself upon the republicanism of Jefferson and Madison of those days; not that democracy born in 1825 and in 1829, carrying on its flag in front "to the victors belong the spoils," and gathering in its train all the hungry, starved, ill-fed who had stood out in the cold begging and beckoning until that hour. That is the democracy which seeks to-day to put itself underneath the lion's skin; but it cannot raise its voice without betraying its lineage and its true character.

Sir, let the debate go on. The people are being educated every hour to see the true issue. The Senator from Ohio plainly says that his side are for peace and good-will, that the free ballot is the right preservative of all rights. Nobody can talk so well as the Senator from Ohio and those who speak for his party; but the people of this country heard this, the people of the country took note that again this new democratic party that is newer, this party claiming and trying to seek parentage with Jefferson, had told this story many times before. The people took note that they had denied many times before that they had deprived the men of the South of a free voice in the elections. They had been told before that when this democratic party got power, no matter how, in these States, all was peace and good-will; but the people could not be made to forget or overlook the fact that republican majorities of 15,000 in one State and 25,000 in another and 20,000 in another and 15,000 in another had been, under this democratic rule, put to that sleep which knows no waking; and I have but to ask the Senator from Ohio if he is not discouraged, repeating, I admit with new eloquence every time, all these professions to the people, and yet the people telling him by their votes, "We have no confidence in the sincerity of these professions."

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yesterday I listened to most of the speech of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] but was called from the Senate Chamber when what I am about to read must have been said, for I did not hear him make the remark, and I think it is proper that I should bring it to the attention of the Senate. The Senator from Kentucky said, as appears in this morning's RECORD:

I fear the Greeks and their proffered gifts. Whenever I feel sure that my enemy wants me to do a certain thing, I take care not to do it. That is a good rule in politics and in war. When the other side want us to help them out of the dilemma they are in, then I do not propose to do it; just as I would not consent the other day when the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. SAUNDERS] undertook to pair my colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE.] I protested, and refused to allow it.

That is not the whole but it is the substance of what he said on that point. Now I want to give the Senator from Kentucky to understand that it was not his protest which prevented the pair from being transferred that morning, it was the fortunate appearance of the Senator from Virginia before the roll-call was concluded. I had heard that morning that the Senator from Virginia was ill and would probably not be here, and I was requested to transfer my pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] to the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE,] which I consented to do. When I announced the transfer of the pair the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] called attention to it and made some objection, but just at that moment the Senator from Virginia appeared and voted, so that of course there was no necessity for insisting on the transfer of the pair any further.

While upon the floor, I wish to say to the Senator from Kentucky that if he has any arrangement or any understanding with his colleague that I cannot use this pair as pairs are used by other Senators on all other occasions so far as I know, I wish to know it, for the reason that in that case I shall ask to cancel it, so that it shall no longer be binding upon me. I do not propose to be limited unless I make my own contract. I made no such contract with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] He came to me and said that he had, as he showed in fact, a very badly inflamed eye, and that he wanted to go to Cincinnati in order to have it operated upon. Suffering as he was, I felt it not only a privilege but a duty that I owed to that Senator to make the pair. I considered that the pair was general, as all other pairs that I have made since I have been in the Senate, and that I had a right, as we have done on other occasions, to transfer it. If the Senator from Kentucky now present has any understanding with his colleague to the contrary, I wish he would make it known now.

Mr. BECK. When I entered that protest, the Senator from Nebraska will bear me out, I stated to the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. ROLLINS,] not now in his seat, who seemed to be the "whip" of the other side and was keeping the pairs, that my objection to the proposed pair with the Senator from Virginia was upon the ground that he is not a republican. If he is a republican, and you will so avow it, and if he will so avow it and allow the people of Virginia to understand that he is a republican and that what he said to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] that he was a better democrat than he was only Pickwickian, then I will consult with my colleague further as to the pair; but my colleague desired to pair with a republican, and, as the Senator from Nebraska is a stalwart republican, I was perfectly willing that the pair should continue. He has the power to withdraw it. I said then to him, "You may vote if you like, you can violate any agreement that you made," for it would be a violation of it, in my judgment, unless you gave notice. I asked the Senator from Nebraska then if he desired to withdraw the pair, and the Senator said no. The Senator from Virginia came in. It may not occur again. All I ask is to pair my colleague with a republican, with one of the stalwarts in front of you, either of the three I see before you, the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] or the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.] I see them all there, and let him be paired with either of them or anybody else who calls himself a republican.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I have paired time and again with Senators on my own side, where we differed not on political questions but on particular questions before the Senate, and this ought not to be a political question to-day. It is a question whether the majority shall rule, or whether a minority taking advantage of the rules of the Senate may control legislation, or rather prevent legislation, and prevent us from doing what the majority ought to be permitted to do here. That is the issue.

Mr. BECK. The question of the majority, the Senator will allow me to say, depends upon other questions than the one suggested by him. While I do not propose to express an opinion, suppose it to be conceded that you are attempting to perpetrate a fraud, ought the minority to help you? Will you say that?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do not understand the question.

Mr. BECK. Suppose the fact is conceded that you are carrying out a corrupt bargain, ought the minority to help you do it?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No, I think not.

Mr. BECK. Then how do you know but that some of us believe that such is the fact?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I cannot help the belief of people; I cannot control their belief.

Mr. BECK. That may govern our action perhaps; I do not say it does; I am not here to get into a wrangle; but if the Senator desires to withdraw his pair with my colleague, I have no disposition to hold him to it. Break it if you like. All I can say is that when it is broken I shall endeavor to secure a pair with somebody else.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I should like to know of the Senator before he takes his seat whether his colleague said to him that he did not allow or wish him to pair him with certain Senators, or anything of that kind? Does he make the statement himself, or does he get it from his colleague?

Mr. BECK. My colleague left it to my discretion to pair him with any republican. Now if Mr. MAHONE will say he is a republican, that is one thing.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to ask him a question? The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] on one question; would it be fair for any Senator on this side of the House to ask the Senator from Illinois to declare whether he was a democrat, and say to him, "We will not allow you to make that pair unless you do say you are a democrat?"

Mr. BECK. There is no person on this side who desires to pair with the Senator from Illinois. Gentlemen on the other side can say as they like about that; that is not my business. My colleague seeks to pair with a republican, and with none other than a republican. You may break pairs and vote if you like rather than have my colleague paired with anybody else than a republican on party questions.

Mr. BURNSIDE. If the Senator from Kentucky were paired with a Senator on this side of the Chamber, would he hesitate to transfer the pair to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HOAR. I ask leave to make a suggestion.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I ask the Senator from Kentucky to answer my question. Would he transfer such a pair to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. Let me answer.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to make one suggestion? I think he will see the force of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield?

Mr. BECK. I might disoblige the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. HOAR. I will appeal to the Senator's courtesy. I desire to make an appeal to the Senators on all sides of the Chamber, and I hope they will believe that I make it in absolute good faith, whether they think I am bitter or earnest in my difference with them on other occasions. This matter of the pairing of Senators is the most delicate matter that can come up. It appeals solely to the personal honor of the individual Senator, and to nothing else.

Mr. BAYARD. That is all.

Mr. BECK. I admit that.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me it is better all around, and I make this appeal to all sides, that a discussion of that delicate subject shall not be brought up as a matter of public debate. Whether my honorable friend from Kentucky (if he will permit me to use that title; I am not sure whether I have a right to use it about him) is right or my honorable friend from Nebraska is right in a particular instance where in this keen and earnest strife of parties they may differ, it seems to me that it is a matter which they will settle in private by private considerations and discussion rather than by public discussion before the Senate. I think this is the first discussion of this nature which has come up. We all, I confide in the personal honor on this question of making a pair with me of that member of the other side with whom I most differ and whom I most condemn in all his political course. The Senator from Kentucky will say that generally of the republican side of the Chamber. I am not making individual applications. He does say it in substance already. I appeal to the Senate to let this matter drop out of public discussion here where it is.

Mr. BECK. I agree to that.

Mr. HOAR. I hope my friend from Kentucky will not answer the question put to him by my friend from Rhode Island, and that my friend from Rhode Island will not desire any answer.

Mr. BECK. I agree with that entirely.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I desire to say before I take my seat——

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator allow me one moment to remind him of a fact which occurred yesterday? I was amazed at the objection made by the Senator from Kentucky to the change of the pair of the Senator from Nebraska a few days since. Twice since that time a change has been made on the part of Senators on the democratic side. Yesterday the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] changed his pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] on account of the absence by sickness of the Senator from Indiana. No one questioned that pair or the right to transfer it. The Senator from Tennessee asked that the change might be made and it was done by common consent. That has always been the practice of the Senate, and I repeat that I was surprised that the Senator from Kentucky should have objected to the transfer of the pair of his colleague from the Senator from Nebraska to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg to suggest to the Senator from Michigan that my change was from a well-defined republican to a well-defined democrat.

Mr. FERRY. It is not for the Senator from Tennessee to define or state the status of the Senator from Virginia to-day. That is left to the public and the Senator concerned.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Tennessee was stating only the status of the transfer that he himself made.

Mr. FERRY. But I contend, if the Senator will allow me, that it is not for others to criticise the request of any Senator. The practice has been without objection that whenever a Senator rises and asks that a pair may be changed it has been done by common consent, and the Senator from Tennessee who now rises to comment upon the fact yesterday made that change without objection.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator allow me to say one word?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. It is only this, that I agree to every word that was said by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] that we had better talk this matter over in private perhaps, or otherwise we may make mistakes all around. When the matter first came up it was made public, and I went to the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. ROLLINS,] who had charge of the pairs on that side, and made the statement that I made yesterday. When my colleague left he said to me, "I leave this matter in your hands, and you must do what you think is right in regard to it." I was not willing to pair my colleague with any one except an avowed republican, because I knew that was what he intended. That is all there is of it; there is no misunderstanding about it.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Now, I should like to have an answer to my question. The Senator from Kentucky has made the assertion a second time with reference to the pair proposed to be transferred to the Senator from Virginia. I should like to have the Senator from Kentucky answer my question in reference to the Senator from Illinois, and if he declares that he would transfer a pair to the Senator from Illinois I should like to read from the speech made by the Senator from Illinois at the beginning of this extra session.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Illinois made his pair; it is in writing; the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] has it; and I have not one word to say about it, because I have no right to speak of it. That is a matter about which I will not speak.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I venture to say that I am speaking the sentiments of every man on this side of the Chamber when I say that if it becomes convenient to change that pair to any other republican on this side of the Chamber it may be done, and we know that the Senator from Illinois is not a democrat, and he says in this Chamber that he is not a democrat.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. President, just one word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Nebraska rose to a question of privilege, and he was proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I ask unanimous consent to say that I would not have called the attention of the Senate to the matter, but it appeared to me that if I left it in the situation it was it might seem that I had attempted to palm off an imposition on the Senate; that I had attempted to transfer my pair to an individual who was objected to by the person with whom I had paired. That is the reason why I rose. I think I was justified in it, and I think the Senator from Kentucky will say so. All I wish to say in regard to this matter is that I had no such limitation, and I thought I was at liberty to transfer my pair just as others had been doing, and I wish to so consider it.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Thursday last, I notice by the RECORD, (I did not fully understand it at the time,) the following occurred:

Mr. ROLLINS. Before I leave the subject I want to say one other thing, and that is, that the gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber—

Alluding to the democrats—unless they have been most wickedly misrepresented, would have been quite willing to have received the vote of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE,] and to have made any arrangement with him that would have inured to their benefit and given them the control of the Senate.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. But we would not have bought it.

Mr. ROLLINS. You wanted to make arrangements, but you could not do it. You made your offers, but they were spurned. It would have been all right if you had received the vote of the Senator from Virginia; it would have been all proper for you to have done it, but it is all wrong for us in your estimation. A great difference it makes whose bull it is that gores the ox.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to say to the Senator before he proceeds that if what he wishes to say is in the nature of a personal explanation, I beg to inform him that my colleague is absent from the city of necessity.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I am not making any personal explanation; and furthermore, I am going to say nothing but what is entirely proper to be said in the absence of the Senator from New Hampshire. I see also in this same connection a singular resolution adopted by what is called the Mahone meeting of readjusters at Norfolk, Virginia. The second resolution is in this language:

2. Resolved, That we consider the positions assigned General WILLIAM MAHONE upon the committees proposed by the democratic caucus as an insult to that distinguished Senator and the people who elected him, and we commend him for electing such committees as recognize his ability and influence and place him in a position to render efficient service to the State and the country at large.

I had not been in the Senate Chamber since Thursday until a few moments since when the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] was speaking. Strange to say, the first sound I heard when I came into the Senate Chamber was that Senator in a very excited manner, an amount of excitement which I think is unusual even with that Senator, and that is putting it in very strong language. It was upon this same subject, charging in substance that this side of the Chamber had endeavored by some arrangement or some proposition to secure the vote of the Senator from Virginia. As this charge has been made a second time on the floor of the Senate, and as it has been made a subject of a resolution by a lot of friends of the Senator from Virginia at a public meeting in Norfolk, and as I have heard none of the corrections which my friend from California [Mr. FARLEY] suggests to me have been made on that subject, I think it proper for me to make simply a statement.

I was one of the committee referred to by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] and like him was on the committee appointed to propose an organization of the committees of this body at the time when we supposed the democrats had the majority, and indeed at that time they did have the majority. I state emphatically that that committee made no proposition to, and received no proposition from, the Senator from Virginia on the subject as to what should be done for him or how he would vote. Any statement, intimation, insinuation to the contrary is utterly false and untrue. We discussed the Senator from Virginia in that committee precisely as we did the other new democratic Senators, simply with reference to the proper places on the committees that were suited to their qualifications as we supposed these qualifications to be, and we determined to treat the Senator from Virginia precisely as we treated the other new democratic Senators, no more and no less. That was the unanimous determination of the committee; nothing to the contrary was said or indicated.

Mr. LOGAN. Leaving him just where he was?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Upon that subject I will say once more, there seemed to be no doubt among us that the Senator from Virginia in national politics was a democrat. The air was full of rumors as to what he was being urged to do by others, and various suggestions were made as to what he might be induced to do; but I will say that while we knew the Senator from Virginia was in the local politics of that State known as a readjuster, we regarded that as exclusively a local question in Virginia politics, having nothing to do with national politics, and we had no intimation, no doubt, and no right to doubt that in national politics the Senator from Virgina was a democrat, and we treated him as such.

While on this subject I will make one additional remark. For myself I had no previous personal acquaintance whatever with the Senator from Virginia; but from what I knew of him through others I had none but the kindliest feelings for him personally. I will remark as a fact that I was urged to go into the Virginia canvass both in 1879 and 1880 during the time he was making his issue there, for the purpose of addressing the people in support of the regular democratic ticket, as it was called, against the readjusters and the combination of republicans and readjusters. I declined to do so. I thought it was a local question, which I deeply regretted. While my sympathies were altogether with what were called the debt-payers, I determined not to interfere in the local politics of that State, and I did not go.

I will say, moreover, such was the estimation in which I held the Senator from Virginia that if he had sent a proposition to the committee of which I was one, indicating in the slightest degree that he exacted certain positions of advantage over other new democratic Senators, I would have spurned it. I would have considered it an insult to him to have made a proposition to him indicating in the slightest degree that we thought it necessary to assign him positions on committees to induce him to vote with the democratic party. Of his national democracy we had no doubt. I did personally have an idea that perhaps he would vote for personal reasons against the organization of two or three of the committees as proposed by the democracy; I had so heard, but that he would vote generally with the democratic party I did not doubt, and I do not believe the committee doubted. We at least treated him as a national democrat, and if anybody had said that it was necessary to give that Senator positions which we did not give other new democratic Senators, to give him the chairmanship of a committee, to give him the patronage of the Senate, allow him to designate who should be Sergeant-at-Arms or who should be Secretary of the Senate, we should have spurned any such propositions. I know I would; I believe every member of the committee would; and I believe every member of the democratic caucus would.

Our position was different from that of the gentlemen on the other side, for while we had every reason to believe that the Senator from Virginia was a national democrat in national politics, of course having his own peculiar views upon the local question of readjusterism, I never had heard that anybody supposed he was a republican. For one, I confess I did not expect the Senator from Virginia to go into the democratic caucus; I did not expect him to go into any caucus; I did not expect him to have conferences directly or indirectly with any caucus; I would not have advised him to do it; I should certainly have advised him not to do it, on account of his personal relations and the suspicions to which he might have subjected himself. While everybody, as I understood, believed and was authorized to believe that the Senator from Virginia was in national politics a democrat, and here upon this national theater would act with the democrats, I never heard it suggested by anybody with any plausibility until Monday morning, the 14th of March, that he was going to act with the republicans as a republican. That is the point.

When I said the Senator from Virginia was elected as a democrat I did not mean as a regularly nominated democrat by any means, because he differed with the regular democrats on the question of readjusterism and the local politics of Virginia; but every act of his life as I was informed of it, every word of his life, classed him a national democrat. No act of his life and no word of his life, as far as I was informed, classed him a republican. We therefore had a right to expect the Senator to co-operate with us in national politics, retaining his peculiar views on the subject of local politics in his State.

I make these remarks simply because the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. ROLLINS] said what he did in response to something said by myself. I think it proper to state, as I was in a position to know, that there was no proposition, and no intimation of a proposition, arrangement, understanding, bargain, or trade of any kind, proceeding from the democratic members of the Senate to or from the Senator from Virginia in relation to the course he should pursue, the position he should have, or the vote he should give. I do not know what outsiders may have done; I do not know what persons who are employés of the Senate or who expect to be employés of the Senate may have done. The air is full of rumors on that subject; I do not choose to repeat them.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, this is a very interesting revelation the honorable Senator from Georgia has made; it interests me very much and it will interest the country very much. We have heard in almost every form of expression from eminent democrats that the nomination of Mr. Riddleberger as Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate and the appointment of Mr. MAHONE as chairman of the Committee on Agriculture was an alliance with the dregs of the South, to use the language of one Senator, and was to embrace or indorse or do something else with the moral leprosy of repudiation. And now it turns out that a member of the committee appointed by the democrats to arrange the Senate committees, knowing all about the Senator from Virginia so far as his opinions on repudiation or readjustment or State demands or State credit were concerned, had proposed, if he himself had consented to the relation, to recognize him, to use the language of the Senator from Georgia, as a regular democrat. We have got about a week of democratic eloquence eliminated from this discussion by this little statement of the Senator from Georgia

There is nothing in this gentleman's opinions on State credit which prevents his receiving honor, recognition, position, welcome to full and entire fellowship by the democratic party. Now we will put a pin into that and leave that as settled by the declaration of the Senator from Georgia.

Now remains, so far as he is concerned, the question whether he has been unfaithful to that relation by consenting to accept the office of chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, or anything else that he has done or proposes to do by way of vote or act on his part. I suppose that whether the Senator from Virginia was a national democrat at the last election is to be settled not upon the imperfect information of a Senator representing Georgia, but upon the official declaration of the national democracy of Virginia. They know whether he was a national democrat in the last election or not. I read the other day to the Senate the statement of the Richmond Dispatch made before the election in regard to the Senator and his followers, which I wish to read again in connection with another document which I shall read also:

As for individuals, their action on the 4th of November will settle their status. Those who follow Mahone will do so understanding that they need never ask for recognition by a conservative convention or a democratic administration.

That is the language of the democratic organ of the State of Virginia published at its capital city. Then comes the circular of the democratic executive State committee dated Richmond, July 28, 1880, in which they say, speaking of the Mahone ticket for Hancock electors, this:

The other ticket was framed by a convention that neither bore the name nor affected the principles of the national democracy. It assembled after the national convention adjourned; sent, of course, no representative thereto, and was without a voice or vote therein; was composed indifferently of democrats and republicans; counted among its constituents over forty negroes—

They do not think negroes vote the democratic ticket much, because negroes being in a convention is a sign that the convention is not composed of democrats according to this committee—and among these some delegates to the State republican convention, and many recognized as republican leaders; took pains, as we shall see, to disown all allegiance to or connection with the party that nominated Hancock and English; and as it was without participation in the choice, so is now without share in the organization of the national democratic party.

That is the certificate of the national democratic committee of the State of Virginia. I hold in my hand the original hand-bill which was stuck up in public, got out in the second congressional district of the State of Virginia, signed "Warner T. Taliaferro, Chairman Ex. Com., Dem. Party, 2nd Con. Dist." I send this to the Clerk's desk and ask to have it read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Regular conservative-democratic ticket.
Election, Tuesday, November 2nd, 1880.

For President,
Winfield S. Hancock,
Of Pennsylvania.
For Vice-President,
William H. English,
Of Indiana.

Electors at large,
John Echols, of Staunton.
P. W. McKinney of Farmville.

District electors.

1st. Thomas Croxton, of Essex.
2d. Legh R. Watts, of Portsmouth.
3d. Hill Carter, of Hanover.
4th. Samuel F. Coleman, of Cumberland.
5th. James S. Redd, of Henry.
6th. Samuel Griffin, of Bedford.
7th. Francis M. McMullan, of Greene.
8th. J. Y. Menefee, of Rappahannock.
9th. Robert R. Henry, of Tazewell.

For Congress,
Second district,
John Goode.

ATTENTION, VOTERS.

The above is the regular conservative-democratic ticket, chosen by the convention of the democratic party of Virginia. To vote any other ticket is to vote in favor of the republican party. It is the only ticket recognized by the national democratic committee.

WARNER T. TALIAFERRO,
Chairman Ex. Com., Dem. Party, 2nd Con. Dist.

Mr. HOAR. Now, Mr. President, we have the declaration of the Senator from Georgia that, representing the democratic party in this Senate, he deemed the Senator from Virginia, in spite of his opinions on financial questions, a fit person to be recognized as a democrat and to be appointed to an office of trust and honor in the organization of this Senate. We have the declaration of the democratic State central committee of Virginia, of the democratic executive committee of the second congressional district, and of the principal democratic paper of that State made before the election, that that gentleman and his followers had fully and thoroughly severed their connection with the national democratic party. Those two things are proved; they cannot be disputed. The Senator from Virginia therefore stands as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] said he stood, an independent elected by the combined votes of two parties, at liberty to cast his vote as he chose. The honorable Senator from Illinois occupying that attitude was named by the original proposition of the democratic party as the chairman of the honorable Committee on the Judiciary; and it was only his own refusal to act in that capacity that prevented his receiving the vote of the democratic party on this floor for that position. He was elected by republicans and democrats, the democrats being largely in the majority, and, as was his right—no man has a right to challenge it—he assumed the position of an independent. The democratic party knowing that position, expecting his vote however in the organization of the Senate, placed him at the head of the principal committee of this body. He had not been cut off by the official action of the national republican party of his State, though of course they did not claim him to be a republican. Now the Senator from Virginia does precisely the same thing; and what is wicked and sinful and justifies the revolutionary method of refusing to permit the Senate to record its action when a Senator is placed at the head of the Committee on Agriculture, is just, lawful, and proper in placing a Senator at the head of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, I certainly do not wish to say anything that is offensive; but the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] must allow me to say that I could not avoid thinking all the time he was speaking of that passage of Scripture which seems to be his favorite passage, "Beware ye of the leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy." I never said that the Senator from Virginia was a regular democrat.

Mr. HOAR. A regular national democrat.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Nor have I declared that anybody said he was treated as a regular national democrat; and yet the Senator from Massachusetts put the word "regular" in my mouth. I said distinctly, what everybody in this country ought to know, that in Virginia as in other States we unfortunately have local issues upon which the democrats themselves divide; we have them in nearly every Southern State, and it is generally the case in States where any party is largely predominant. There is practically in most of the Southern States but one party, and that is the democratic party; and upon local questions the party divides. It is a habit, a very common habit, in that country for those who adhere to the nominations of the party to call themselves regular organized democrats and denounce the others who do not adhere to the nominations as going to the republicans. That is very common; it is an argument used on the hustings to keep the bolters, if I may use that term, from being influential, to keep them from carrying off votes from the regular democratic party, to charge, "that man says he is an independent; that man says he is a readjuster; but I tell you he is a republican and is going with the republican party." That is the common argument. Just such arguments we hear brought up here and repeated as having been used by democrats in Virginia against the Senator from Virginia. There is a stereotyped answer to all that which I suppose the Senator from Virginia and certainly his followers have made a thousand times, and that is to say that these charges that they had abandoned the democratic party were false, and they were true democrats, that they were better democrats than the regular democrats. Every man in the South has heard that a thousand times; there is nothing more common.

And yet the Senator from Massachusetts says I have made a revelation to the country that we on this side of the Chamber would have allowed the Senator from Virginia to associate with us in national politics as a democrat. Certainly. Why not? There are a great many local questions in our States that do not affect our national affiliations in the slightest degree. It is so, I suppose, in other States; it is with other parties. The question as to whether Virginia should settle her debt in full or in part is not a national question; it is a local question that does not affect the division between the republican party and the democratic party on the great questions of national politics. I have no doubt myself that there are a great many gentlemen in Virginia belonging to the democratic party who were readjusters, honest men, men who honestly believed that under all the circumstances that policy was right. They were made to believe it. I do not concur with them; I sympathize with their feelings very largely, and with their misfortunes; but those gentlemen have repelled on all occasions the charge that because they were readjusters in the local politics of Virginia, therefore they were republicans in national politics; and if I chose to read them, I could read letter after letter that I have received from prominent readjusters of Virginia, scorning the idea that they were going to be carried into the republican party because they happen to be readjusters in local politics.

What we complain of in the republican party, or on that side of the House, is not that you associate with the Senator from Virginia. The Senator from Virginia has a right to choose his own politics; he has a right to be a readjuster in Virginia if he chooses; he has a right to be a democrat here if he chooses; and he has a right to change his politics and be a republican if he chooses. He has no right to be all three at once. He has no right to be a republican and a democrat both at the same moment. We concede his right to be either; we concede his right in local politics to be neither; we concede his right, if he chooses to take that position, to be neither here, neither republican nor democrat; a man has a right to choose his politics in this country. We do not assign him a position; we repel the idea that we do.

The Senator from Massachusetts talks about our assigning him a position; that is the effect of his language. By no means. If he chooses to recognize himself as a national democrat and act with the national democratic party, notwithstanding he is a readjuster in Virginia, that is his lookout, not ours. If that alienates him from the majority of democrats in Virginia and drives him to what is called the independent democrats there, be it so; he must take his chances; nobody is complaining of that.

That is not the point. The point is this: When, how, for what, did the Senator from Virginia become a republican? I am not quarreling with him for being a readjuster; I have nothing to do with that question; that is his own lookout; but when did he become a republican? He is one now; the Senator from Massachusetts proves that he is one; the Senators on that side have been laboring terribly to prove that he is a republican and has a right to be a republican. Very well, let him say so. We admit now that he is a republican. He sits with the republicans; he votes with the republicans; he acts with the republicans, and he joins the republicans in slandering his own people. If that does not make him a republican, pray, what does? That is all. He has taken up the talk of the republicans about tissue ballots and about a free and a fair count, and all that sort of thing; but he has not announced that he is a republican. Why does he not save you these long-winded speeches to prove that he is a republican? Why does he not rise in his place and say he is a republican? One word from him is worth ten thousand speeches of that character from the Senator from Massachusetts.

I concede his right to take what course he pleases. We, of course, are now compelled to regard him as a republican; but we say, when, why, for what purpose? He has not announced any change of opinion. He was a democrat in 1877 when he was a candidate before the democratic convention for the nomination for governor of Virginia, when the present excellent governor was nominated instead of himself; he was a democrat then, was he not? Did he not agree with the democrats then in their opinions on national politics? Was he not a democrat last year when he was voting for Hancock and English? He may have done it on his own peculiar ticket; it does not matter; he voted for Hancock and English. He was not a republican therefore, surely, unless he was one in disguise; he certainly was not openly one. He was not a republican in October last when he wrote that letter in which he spoke of the republican party as the "grip-sack party;" and I say here, as I read once before, his meeting in Norfolk the other day characterized the republican party as a "grip-sack party." Would a man characterize his own party with that contemptuous epithet?

Nobody denies the right of the Senator from Virginia to change his opinions; but has he changed? Does he entertain opinions on the great questions of national politics and of national issues different now from what he had in 1877; different now from what he had in 1880? If so, let him say so. We, of course, assume that it is so, because he acts with the other party. That is all.

All I got up to say was to negative the idea, which was new to the Senator from Virginia as well as to this side of the Chamber, that there was any negotiation between him and this side, that in consideration of his vote, or provided he would give us his vote, we would give him positions on committees to suit him, or give him the patronage of the Senate, or anything else. I deny that. That is all I rose to deny. There were no such propositions; we would not have made such propositions and we would not have received such propositions.

The thing the country wants to understand is, How does it happen that just at the particular moment when the vote of the Senator from Virginia became the balancing vote of this body, when he could make the organization of this body republican or democratic as he pleased—how did it happen that just at that moment, for the first time in his history, he went with the republicans? Nobody denies his right to go. Every man in this country has a right to change his opinions; it is an inalienable right; but let him say he has changed his opinions, and let him say that in consequence of that change of opinion he has changed his party affiliations. I am making no charges; I am simply saying that we made no bargain, we made no proposition for a bargain, and would have made none; and it is due to the Senator from Virginia as well as to the democrats that that should be known.

Mr. MAHONE. Mr. President, I think the Senate will bear me out that I have at no time during this discussion as to the election of officers of the Senate exceeded the bounds of propriety. I think it cannot be denied that in all I have had to say on this floor I have been courteous, I have been respectful. I think it will not be denied that I have not here intruded any question foreign to this debate. When we had for days under discussion the subject of the public debts of the several Southern States and the methods of their readjustment, the responsibility of bringing that question to this Chamber did not belong to me; it came here at the hands of my colleague, if I remember correctly. It is here that he has sought to introduce the question of the public debt of Virginia and to characterize a portion of his own people in effect as repudiationists, and another party, with which he would ally himself, as debt-payers, when the record not only of the Legislature of Virginia but the record of his own acts and all the facts show that there is no such party in the State of Virginia as a debt-paying party, in his sense, by his interpretation of the term. Has the Senator forgotten that the last attempt to deal with the public debt of the State of Virginia resulted in the passage of a bill known as the McCulloch or brokers' bill? Would he call that a debt-paying bill, a measure of extreme force, which undertakes openly and by violence legislatively to repudiate one-half of the accrued interest of eight years on a certain portion of the debt?

Mr. President, I did not rise in my place to review the speech made in answer to the one I delivered here in respect to this matter by my colleague. If need be, I will take a special occasion for that, if it shall be necessary, if for no other purpose than to be courteous to him. But, sir, I wish to say—and for that reason I have alluded to this question—that the responsibility for all that has come before the Senate in respect to this matter of dealing with the public debt of the several Southern States does not belong to me. When gentlemen on that side of the Chamber, whose States have readjusted in one form or another their State debts, sat silently by and allowed my colleague to bring the debt of Virginia before the Senate and to make that a question for the consideration of this body, and when gentlemen in the rear, if you please, of this tier of Southern States came to his assistance to assail the people who sent me to this Chamber, the readjusters of Virginia, as repudiationists, as unworthy associates with the democratic party, as unworthy associates with any party in this country—I say when Southern Senators sat there silently and allowed these things to be said, giving thereby their assent to the attack made upon these people of mine, could I do less than in justification of the course of the people of the State of Virginia give a reference to their legislation (and without comment) by which the public debts in the various Southern States had been treated as I showed they had been. When, where, or in what particular did I undertake to impugn the motives of the people of any State who had so dealt with their public debt, as to question the propriety of their methods? It is not to be found in anything I said on this floor. I hold, I have always held, that it is a question with which the people of each State alone have a right to deal for themselves; it is a matter not to be interfered with by any other people than those directly concerned.

Now, Mr. President, it has been suggested I am perfectly sure by gentlemen on this side of the Chamber that I had been approached by gentlemen on the other side in respect to the organization of this Senate. I want to say here—I have said before, but I desire to repeat—that no Senator on either side of this Chamber has ever approached me improperly as to the organization of the Senate, and I do not presume that any honorable man would expect or desire me or any one else to violate those amenities which obtain among gentlemen. I therefore shall not, unless compelled, repeat conversations which passed between myself and gentlemen on either their own quarters or mine; but I do have to say that neither on this side nor on that side of this Chamber has any Senator approached me by any improper suggestion as to the organization of this Senate. That gentlemen on that side of the Chamber, as on this, have asked me as to my wishes respecting the organization of committees, is true. Whether on either side they came as the representatives of a caucus, or a committee of a caucus, I never thought to inquire. They were gentlemen; they were so recognized and they so demeaned themselves, in whatever they had to say as to the formation of committees. As I have said, on both sides of the Chamber gentlemen have asked me as to my own wishes and my own views as to the formation of committees. My response has been to both alike in effect—and that response I have heretofore made in this Chamber—that I had no wish to prefer, and furthermore I was indifferent where I was placed, stating at that moment that I meant no discourtesy, but that I might, out of abundant caution, serve notice that here I intended on all occasions in respect to men and measures to vote as I pleased, [applause in the galleries,] recognizing obligation to no party for my seat in this Chamber, national or State, other than the readjuster party of Virginia. I came here to represent that people, and, God willing, I intend to do it according to my best ability and my honest convictions. Whether the discharge of that duty shall lead me to act with the republican side of this Chamber or with the democratic side, that is for me to judge and not to be suggested by a caucus.

Now, Mr. President, I hope I have said enough on this question of approaches to me, not only for myself, but in justice, at any rate, to the gentlemen on both sides of this Chamber, and, if need be, to repel any suggestion that I could be so approached with any scheme or plan, by combination or otherwise, to reach ends not legitimate.

Mr. President, I have said here once before that I was the custodian, and intended to be, of my own democracy. I do not choose to debate that question; it is not debatable. I think the sole question is between myself on the one hand and the people who sent me here on the other. When it is suggested that I was a national democrat, I ask by what species of analogy could I be a national democrat? There is no harmony, there is nothing that I have seen for eight years in sympathy between the democracy of my State and what is called the national democracy—a democracy which sought an extreme violation of true democratic sentiment and principles.

Why, sir, in my own State, when it was well known that the democratic party there, heretofore called the conservative party, and never denominated the democratic party until the 19th day of May, 1880—I say when it was well known to the national democracy that the democratic party in the State of Virginia were divided, when there had grown up in that State a division not to be reconciled, then came the national democracy with its national convention; and did that wing of the democratic party which supported me attend the State convention which sent delegates to Cincinnati? Not so. Then and there these people served notice alike on the so-called democratic party of Virginia as well as the national democracy that we participate not in your national convention. I say that the constituency which sent me here refused to participate in the convention, called a democratic convention for the first time, which sent delegates to the Cincinnati convention. And although that was a State convention calling for over fourteen hundred delegates, and there were over one hundred and eighty-two thousand democratic votes in the State, it was a convention which was elected by less than three thousand of the popular vote, and a convention calling for over fourteen hundred delegates could muster less than three hundred and fifty—a convention which sent a delegation to Cincinnati pledging the democracy of the State to a candidate for the Presidency, I undertake to say, whose name had never fallen upon the ears of three thousand people outside of one city in the whole State of Virginia.

Sir, the party which I represent on this floor is a party of the people of the State of Virginia who won their right to control their own affairs at the ballot-box, who got the privilege to send me to this Chamber on a direct vote at the polls which elected the members of the Legislature that sustained me to a man by 15,000 majority of the white vote of that State, a Legislature composed of a majority in both branches of white men, democrats, if you like, that voted for me, and representing a party that refused to recognize the national democracy at Cincinnati; a party that protested that the national committee should not interfere with our own liberty; and yet, against precedent, against all the principles of democracy as I understood those principles, this high committee, sitting at New York—will you believe it when I tell you?—undertook to say to the people of Virginia "These men shall be your electors," undertook to take down the ticket put up by the people and set up a ticket of their own men. Was that democratic? I protested then that this was a usurpation to which no people loving freedom would submit. The right of the democratic national committee to say to the people of Virginia "vote for these eleven men as your electors" would soon lead to the assumption that that committee could take the power of naming electors for all the States, themselves composing the electoral college. That is your national democracy to which the people I stand for do not belong.

But, sir, it was not expected (so I am now informed) that I would enter the caucus of either party here. I do not suppose there is any man in all the broad land who knew anything of my coming to this Chamber and of the organization of parties in Virginia who for a moment ever supposed I would enter either caucus, that I could ever become the partisan of either party. What do I owe either? I certainly say that I owe nothing to that democracy which undertakes to stand here for the national democracy represented by Mr. Barnum and his committee. If there had been no reason within the borders of my State to resist that manner of democracy, I would have it in the conduct of that committee.

But, Mr. President, as I said in the outset, I rose for an explanation which I conceive to be due no less to gentlemen on this side of the Chamber than to gentlemen on the other, in respect to the suggestion that there had been improper approaches as to the organization of the Senate. I had intended to ask you, Mr. President, for the floor at the earliest moment this day, not in respect to what I have said, but in respect to another matter, a question of privilege. I find a reference made to me from a quarter I had not expected. It was impossible for me to have expected, after what had heretofore passed in this Chamber, any allusion to myself from that quarter. I certainly would never have violated the rule which I had supposed to be established in this Chamber. I was not in this Chamber on Thursday during the afternoon when in the debate there took place a passage between the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. ROLLINS] and the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.] I did not see or know of this passage until I came to the Chamber on Monday, when in glancing over the RECORD I saw for the first time this allusion. I desire to read it, and I cannot doubt that the Senate will concede that I am justified in calling attention to this language:

> Mr. ROLLINS. Before I leave the subject I want to say one other thing, and that is, that the gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber, unless they have been most wickedly misrepresented, would have been quite willing to have received the vote of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE,] and to have made any arrangement with him that would have inured to their benefit and given them the control of the Senate.
> Then comes the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] interjecting—
> But we would not have bought it.

Mr. President, that language on the part of the Senator from Georgia admits of one or more interpretations. I come to ask the Senator from Georgia now, as this language in one aspect to my mind implies either that my vote had been or could be bought, whether in this language he intended to convey any such impression? [A pause.]

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Go on; I will answer.

Mr. MAHONE. I am ready to hear.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Do you want it now?

Mr. MAHONE. I have nothing else to say but to ask that simple question.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Give me the floor and I will answer.

Mr. MAHONE. Whether the Senator from Georgia——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I shall have the floor in my own right when I answer, but I shall answer the Senator very fully.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield the floor to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. MAHONE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. No, sir, I do not ask the Senator to yield to me. If I have the floor in my own right I will proceed.

Mr. MAHONE. I surrender the floor and take my seat.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Now, sir, I shall make to that Senator the answer which I feel that he ought to make to me, or any other gentleman ought to make under like circumstances, and tell exactly the truth. I inferred from the remarks made by the Senator from New Hampshire that he was charging in the language which he employed that we had sought to make an arrangement—that was his language—by which we should control the vote of the Senator from Virginia to get the organization of this Senate, and in response to that I said, "But we would not have bought it." I meant simply to negative what I understood to be the charge of the Senator from New Hampshire. That is what I intended to negative. The Senator from New Hampshire seemed to be arguing upon the assumption that they were charged with having bought his vote, and it seemed to be implied that we wanted to do it and could not do it. [Addressing Mr. MAHONE.] I deny that we buy your vote, I deny that we wanted to buy your vote, and we deny that we would have bought your vote; we would not have given you a fig for your vote. That is what I intended to deny. I did not charge that the Senator had sold his vote. I do not say now that the Senator had sold his vote. I would not charge, unless I knew the fact to be a fact, that any Senator on this floor had sold his vote. If the Senator wants me to go further and say what I believe, that is a different question; and I wish to say to the Senator now that if he proposes to call everybody in this country to account who has a belief on that subject, he has a heavy task upon his hands. I will make no charge against any Senator; but do not let any Senator invite my opinion or compel my opinion by seeking to make that a charge which is not, because he might get that opinion, and get it very fully.

Mr. MAHONE. Mr. President, I have nothing to do with the beliefs of the Senator from Georgia. I do not deal otherwise than directly in all those matters.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I do not hear the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia will please speak louder.

Mr. MAHONE. I say, sir, I have not in anything that I have said in respect to any Senator here indulged in suggestions, and I have risen to ask the Senator from Georgia a very plain question. He says that I will have everybody to call to account. That is not the question. The Senator from Georgia has used this language. Now he knows well whether he intended to convey the idea that I had been bought, or could be. He knows that! He knows whether he intended to convey that impression, and I respectfully ask whether he so intended? That is all.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have answered you fully, and it will be in the RECORD.

Mr. MAHONE. Well, sir, I understand your answer not to be full. The Senate will pardon me now. As the Senator from Georgia fails here to answer directly a direct question, I give him a problem to solve; he shall have a conundrum. I say to him if he did mean to imply that my vote had been or could be bought, he states that or undertakes to convey that which is foul, untruthful, false, and that no man less than a coward will make such a statement. [Applause in the galleries.] Now, I say to him he can solve in his own mind whether he so intended or not. [Addressing Mr. HILL, of Georgia.] You can solve that, sir. If you did I know what I have to say to you. Now, I have made my answer. You can solve that question for yourself whether you intended to convey that meaning or not. [Applause in the galleries which the presiding officer sought to check by rapping with his gavel.]

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I hope that you will not interrupt the galleries. It is disturbing both to the Senate and to the galleries to have that rapping continually on the President's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The galleries will preserve order.

Mr. PENDLETON. The disturbance came from persons in the front seats of our reserved private gallery immediately back of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. McMILLAN. It is all around all the galleries.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, I have too much respect for the Senate, too much respect for myself, too much respect for the people of this country to bandy epithets with the Senator from Virginia or any other Senator here. I have never sought to give nor will I receive or resent an insult in this Chamber I would not insult the Senator in this Chamber. The Senator cannot insult me. He is powerless to insult anybody.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. What do you mean by that?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. And strange to say he is not aware of the fact. I am not dealing with the Senator from Pennsylvania now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia has the floor.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator asked me a question. I answered his question; I answered it explicitly. The answer is on record; it will remain there; it was a truthful answer. I answered precisely as I thought and felt at the time I used the words, and any Senator can read those words and find them there. If the Senator thinks that he can suppress gentlemen in discussion in this Senate by assuming to play the bully, he has made a mistake.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to indefinitely postpone the pending resolution.

Mr. FARLEY. Mr. President, I have endeavored for some time, for about three or four weeks, I believe, to get the Senate to consider executive business, and it seems to me that we are spending a good deal of time in discussing matters that have nothing really to do with the questions that are before the Senate. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. FARLEY, Mr. COCKRELL, and others called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON, (when his name was called.) I am paired for the remainder of this day with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR.]

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when Mr. ANTHONY'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired on this question with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.] Were my colleague here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) I am paired upon all questions with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] who was obliged to leave the city on important business. I would vote "yea" if I were allowed.

Mr. GORMAN, (when Mr. GROOME'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. GROOME] is paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.]

Mr. PLATT, of Connecticut, (when Mr. HAWLEY'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. HAWLEY] is paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. JACKSON.]

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JACKSON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] and I make that announcement for the day.

Mr. JONAS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. EDGERTON.]

Mr. LOGAN, (when Mr. KELLOGG'S name was called.) The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] are paired on this question.

Mr. LOGAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME.]

Mr. SAWYER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. CAMDEN.]

Mr. SEWELL, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.]

Mr. WALKER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. HILL.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. SLATER. I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. GROVER] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to say that I was paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] during his absence; but the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] being also absent, I have transferred my pair with the Senator from New York to the Senator from Indiana, and therefore I have already voted "yea."

Mr. RANSOM. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. VANCE] is paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. SEWELL.]

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Bayard,	Coke,	Hampton,	Pendleton,
Brown,	Davis of W. Va.,	Harris,	Pugh,
Butler,	Farley,	Johnston,	Ransom,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and twenty-seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, April 14, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] providing for the election of certain officers of the Senate, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone the resolution indefinitely, on which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, unless there is some objection to the motion at this time.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio to suspend the motion for a few moments, if he has no objection.

Mr. PENDLETON. I will do almost anything that the Senator from Kansas desires except act on the pending resolution.

Mr. DAWES. The other side is so thin that I hardly think the Senator should take advantage of the absence of his friends.

Mr. PENDLETON. I would not do that for the world.

After a pause, during which Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, and other Senators entered the Chamber,

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Had we not better have a call of the Senate if there is not a quorum present? I suggest it to the Chair. That, I suppose, will enable the Senator from Massachusetts to gather up his forces, if that is what he is waiting for.

Mr. DAWES. Any course that is most acceptable to the Senator from West Virginia or the Senator from Ohio, who very courteously suspended a motion he made a moment ago, will be agreeable to me. I should prefer, though, to have a vote on the resolution.

Mr. PENDLETON. There would not be a quorum.

Mr. DAWES. I think I should be willing to take the risk of a vote on the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If the Senator does not wish a call of the Senate, I move that we now proceed to the consideration of executive business. That is the legitimate business before the Senate and that is the business we ought to transact.

Mr. DAWES. I think we should get along better if we should take a vote on the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I wish to say to my friend that if he waits for that he will wait until he is grayer than he is now. I do not know how long it may be, but certainly it will be a good while.

Mr. DAWES. I regret exceedingly to hear so unpatriotic a remark from the Senator from West Virginia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) I desire to announce for the day that I am paired on all questions with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] I should vote "yea" if I were not paired.

Mr. CAMDEN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER] if he is not in the Chamber. I should vote "yea" if he were present.

Mr. HARRISON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GORMAN.]

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JONAS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. EDGERTON.]

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. LOGAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME.]

Mr. COKE, (when Mr. MAXEY'S name was called.) My colleague, Mr. MAXEY, is paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.] I make the announcement for the day.

Mr. WALKER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. HILL.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. SAULSBURY, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I desire to withdraw my vote. I had forgotten at the time that I am paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

Mr. PLATT, of Connecticut. I am requested to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL.]

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. ROLLINS] is absent from necessity, and that he is paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to say that I agreed to pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] during his absence. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] being also absent, I have transferred my pair with the Senator from New York to the Senator from Indiana. I make the announcement for the day upon all questions that may be voted on.

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Johnston,	Pugh,
Brown,	George,	Lamar,	Ransom,
Butler,	Hampton,	McPherson,	Slater,

So the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, yesterday when the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] had the floor in discussing with his usual fervor questions which had come before the Senate, the Senator seemed to have made up his mind at last that he could not force a minority of the Senate into compliance with his will by whatever course of coercion he might see proper to adopt or even by his extraordinary powers of persuasion. He then cried out, like one in anguish, "Let the debate go on," and declared that the country needed information and education in respect of a number of questions which have been introduced into this debate, not unnaturally and not improperly, and which I for one do not regret.

The Senate of the United States finds itself arrayed with thirty-eight members on one side and thirty-eight on the other, every man the peer of every other, and representing, notwithstanding the size of his State, its population or its wealth, an equal amount of power in this peculiar body. That equal distribution of power between the States, without reference to their size or wealth, makes this particularly the conservative body of the United States, more conservative than the executive department, and really more conservative than the supreme judiciary. There is no positive power vesting anywhere under our Constitution in any other tribunal, the unquestioned and unimpeachable constitutional right, to interpose its final negative upon the action of the majority, and to compel the majority not merely to stop and consider the value of that negative, but to compel it absolutely to stop until the minority may see proper to go forward. It is the only body in the United States that has the attribute under the Constitution of having the determination of a question pending before it resolved by the action of a person who is not a member of the body, and in that respect it is powerfully conservative, and not in any respect to be regarded as an aggressive body, a merely popular body.

What the Senators on the other side have been pleased to term a minority of the Senate have been sitting here for twenty or twenty-five days out of forty for the purpose of assisting in the conduct of the business for which we were called together before organized committees. For forty days, the same number of days including the nights that it took to deluge the world with destruction, the Senate of the United States has been held here in debate upon the question whether it would first disorganize under the first resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, and then reorganize the Senate for certain purposes, some of which are avowed and some of which still rest in imagination and in suspicion, or whether we should proceed to the conduct and discharge of those high functions for which we were assembled here as we understand the call of the chief Executive.

The question as to where the fault rests for this non-execution of constitutional duty on the part of this great body has been so much discussed that it is quite unnecessary at this hour to make any further reference to that. What I have to say on that subject is merely this, that the people of the United States fully understand the purpose for which we were assembled; they understand that under the Constitution of this Government the President of the United States has the right to convene an extraordinary session of either House or both at his pleasure for the purpose of carrying out such objects of government as may occur to him as being necessary to enable him to execute that part of his oath which requires that "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

It is not at all necessary now to discuss the question for what purposes the President of the United States might assemble the House of Representatives in extraordinary session, not assembling the Senate at the same time. Perhaps it will be well for those who are profound constitutional lawyers and sometimes get their consent to look into constitutional questions when they subserve their personal or their party interests, to inquire for what purposes the President of the United States might see proper to assemble the House of Representatives in extraordinary session not in connection with the assembling of the Senate; but under the Constitution he has the power to assemble either House, and I am incapable of understanding how, except in perhaps one solitary case, he could assemble the House of Representatives alone except for legislative purposes.

But the country is not misinformed; it is not ignorant, nor is it inattentive to the fact that the President of the United States, obeying a custom of this country, at the close of the preceding administration called the Senate together for the purpose of considering those matters which relate to the conduct of the executive department of the Government and the incumbency of such other departments of the Government as the President has a right to assist in filling up by providing the necessary officers.

The democratic party in the Senate have aided that purpose all that they could. On the 4th of March, or on the next day of session after the inauguration of the President, we took immediate steps to organize the committees of this body, without which the body cannot act, or at least without which it cannot act according to its rules heretofore prescribed, and which we found in operation when the Senate met, and which we did not find it necessary to readopt. We offered to organize the committees, and Senators on the other side of the Chamber informed us that they would resort to every method that was then within their power to prevent the organization of this body. They predicated that opposition upon various excuses and pretexts, which necessarily in themselves implied an opinion on their part that the Government of the United States would not be properly carried on in any of its branches except with the assistance of the republican party, when there was only a mere possibility that that party might be in the majority and might at a future day have the power. We bore that reflection upon our patriotism and our sense of duty without complaining.

The Senate was delayed from day to day, until finally the republican seats were filled up which had been vacated by the action of the President himself, and the majority of this body was reduced not to a minority but to an equivalency of power with the other side of the Chamber. After that had been accomplished, after Senators had set the example by abstaining from acting with this body by withdrawing their States from out the reach of the roll-call of the Secretary which he was making by order of the Senate; after they had succeeded in breaking down the constitutional power of this body during the last hours of the last Congress, and by that action not for the first time nor even for the twentieth time had set us the example of an abdication of constitutional duty on this floor, then the Senator from Massachusetts brought forward the resolution to disorganize the portion of the Senate which we received fully organized when we met in this extraordinary session, for the purpose merely of its reorganization.

At first the Senators on this side of the Chamber, not suspecting any design to pervert the Senate to extraordinary and unusual uses or to prostitute its dignity and its powers so that it should become a part of the mere machinery of a political organization, thought that the Senators on that side were so greedy for the little offices which remained undisposed of, or which they might have a chance to dispose of, that they were moving in this solid phalanx, in this compact organization, and with this resolute step for the mean and insignificant purpose of handling the little coin through the agency of their friends which belongs under the laws of the United States to the employés of this body. That, as a mere scramble for the offices, would have been very bad.

The next step in the progress of the debate appeared to develop the fact that there was something beyond, and that the Senators on that side were struggling to execute on their part an engagement through which a coalition of hitherto hostile and contending factions had been made. We could not quite understand then all that it meant. The subject began to dawn upon the country, and the people of the United States began to lend an attentive ear to all the utterances that escaped the lips of Senators on this floor. When the controversy received another dark shadow in the thoroughly believed and as I think well-sustained suspicion that this movement meant a prostitution of the powers of this body for the purpose of electing a successor to a gentleman who is now upon this floor, then it became startling to the country, and it has raised a spirit of inquiry and, I will say further, a spirit of resentment which I think Senators will have to employ themselves diligently for a long time to quell.

Never before, and I hope to God it shall never be hereafter, did the Senate of the United States employ its great powers and its dignity, its traditional eminence in the history of this country, for the distinct purpose of taking one Senator out of his seat at the end of his term and replacing that individual with another man; and yet the purpose is just as distinct as anything that can be stated, now that it has become revealed. The object of the majority of the Senate of the United States as now avowed is to use its offices as a power of patronage for the purpose of entering a State of the American Union in order to dictate to the people of that State who shall come here to fill up this body in the future. Senators, instead of being embassadors from States and the representatives of great sovereignties, who are charged by the Constitution with performing certain high functions, not only in extraordinary sessions but in all sessions, find themselves able in this day to turn their backs upon their high constitutional duties and to take the offices which are meant for the mere convenience of the Senate and for the proper discharge of public business, and the officers who are brought here as the servitors of this body, and to organize them into a special squad of political campaigners and bummers for the purpose of entering a soverign State to control the people in the selection of a Senator.

That is the business of the Senate of the United States, and that is the expedition which the Senator from Massachusetts leads so heroically. Some Senator remarked one day, "Would to God that Webster and Clay could be here for one moment to rebuke this body for its departure from all its constitutional purposes and functions!" I cannot repress the thought, if that great Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Webster, who preceded the Senator who leads in this miserable expedition, were here, he would rebuke him in the name of his own State. The Senate of the United States is using its patronage and its officers to have men elected here for the express purpose of entering into a State to capture a man and to place him here as a Senator, who will become, when he does get here, more the slave of the party that elected him than any man who ever had the privilege of disgracing a seat on this floor.

It is announced in the Republican, or if not announced, more than intimated, (that paper which is edited by a gentleman who is to be made one of the servitors of the Senate,) that Mr. Riddleberger is a candidate for the Senate of the United States, to take the place of Mr. JOHNSTON. That is an ex cathedrâ announcement, as we understand it, because it has got to be thoroughly believed on this side of the Chamber, and I think throughout the country at large, that the gentleman who was formerly Secretary of the Senate and is now the principal editor of that paper is the man who, after all, is more responsible for Riddleberger's candidacy on the floor of the Senate than the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE,] who made the boast that he was responsible for it. It is more than believed that the editor of that leading newspaper which has announced Mr. Riddleberger's candidacy for the seat of Mr. JOHNSTON found himself capable, or rather capacitated, to compel his party to swallow him, nauseous as was the dose, because he had in one way and another trumped up power enough to induce the other side to believe that there was great political gain to be made in the election of Mr. Riddleberger as Sergeant-at-Arms of this body. That is the editor who comes out in this morning's paper and announces with flaming capitals at the head of one of his articles:

Hill, the Bourbon, called a coward by Mahone—An exciting scene in the Senate Chamber yesterday—The Virginia Senator badgered and dodged by Bourbon Senator Hill—Details of the debate.

When he gets here as our Secretary he will not perform the purpose for which you elect him unless every morning he can come up with capitals flying at the head of his editorial columns denouncing Senators through the public prints as Bourbons and cowards and as men who fly from an attack. A man who is to be chosen, if chosen at all, for the mere purpose of carrying into execution the laws of the land and the rules of the Senate, a servitor of the Senate, has, through the political machinery of this miserable expedition which the Senator from Massachusetts leads and heads, the power and the ability through his paper to demand our silence in order that he may be thrust upon us while he hurls abusive epithets at gentlemen who discharge their constitutional functions in their own way upon this floor. And when you have got Riddleberger here, that also will be a part of his business, and you will have employés appointed under our rules that will consider that a part of their business, and instead of performing their functions and duties as gentlemen should, they are expected to come here and abuse Senators, heap calumny on them, and I dare say in the very secret sessions of this body to betray a confidence that we have no power to withhold or to protect ourselves in the enjoyment of.

You have chosen the wrong set of men as recruits in your new campaign, Senators. You should have gone outside of the officers of this body if you wanted to do it, and have hired a set who had no connection with the discharge of public duties and no responsibilities personally to Senators on this side of the Chamber, and have allowed us to have had men here in confidential communication with us, who were not put here for the purpose of abusing and maligning us, or for the purpose of deceiving and betraying us. A seat in the Senate is not a pleasant place when Senators know that they are surrounded by a corps of pot-house politicians, brought here for the purpose of breaking up and destroying and obstructing what they conceive to be wrong or unprofitable to them in policies in which this Government is deeply interested.

I therefore charge upon that side of the Senate, that with a purpose which they perfectly understand and of which the country is by no means ignorant they abuse and prostitute the offices of this body for the purpose of making a special and distinctive campaign in the State of Virginia, the object of which is to remove Mr. JOHNSTON or some man like him from the possession of the senatorial seat and to put in his place a man that they can handle at their will and pleasure.

Perhaps, sir, I should not have been so bold in making this declaration if I had not found ample warrant for it in the debates which have gone on in this body; but I do find such warrant here, unquestionably do I find it, and finding it I will make bold to speak about it, although I am not quite certain that a Senator on this side of the Chamber may to-day enjoy the constitutional right of freedom of debate (without being questioned for it here or in some other place) which is guaranteed to us in the Constitution as one of the conservative features of the liberty of the people and the States that we represent. It seems to require a man to have a little more at his back in the Senate of the United States now than the Constitution to be able to enjoy all his rights under it. The right of freedom or debate and of speech and of commentary upon existing and known facts seems to be denied to Senators on this side.

I regret, sir, that the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is not in his seat to-day. I would omit to make the remarks that I propose to submit to the Senate in reference to his speech on the 6th day of April in this Chamber but for the fact that although he is not the acknowledged leader of that side of the Senate he is the known and real leader of it. That honorable Senator, on returning to this Chamber after a four years' experience in the executive administration of the Government, coming back crowned with the plaudits of the country in respect to his administration of the finances of the country, is recognized, not merely by that side of the Chamber, but he is also recognized by the country, as being the authentic spokesman and mouthpiece of that side of the Chamber; and after I have made my comments on that speech there will not be one on that side who will rise in his place to take issue with that honorable Senator in respect of some very important declarations that he has made before the Senate of the United States.

What I have said in respect of the prostitution of the powers of this Senate in its dabbling in the dirty pools of local politics would be extremely unjust, and I would never have dared to have made such a statement as that if I had not found that this great leader and mouthpiece of the republican party in this Senate had laid down in his speech made before this body, with all possible solemnity of utterance, a doctrine—to call it such—which is broad enough to justify all that you are doing, and a great deal more than I fear you expect to do.

The Senator referred to what he was pleased to call the Bourbon democracy, and he had made various impressive and incisive utterances to show his want of confidence in that organization; to show that he did not believe that organization was capable of carrying into effect what it professes to have adopted as the basis of its action; to show that that organization was not entitled and should not have the respect of the American people; to show that that organization had set itself against the Constitution and the peace of the country, against every proceeding that was considered necessary for carrying into execution the great purposes of the plan of our Government; and after having inveighed against us in that style he proceeded to deliver himself in a most philosophical and ex cathedrâ way of the following utterance. The Senator from Ohio said, in reply to the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD:]

But the third proposition of my friend is that to elect Riddleberger Sergeant-at-Arms is to interfere unconstitutionally with the election in Virginia, that the election of Riddleberger in some way or other has a connection with the election in Virginia. I do not exactly see how, although I hope it will.

The honorable Senator could not quite see through it, because like the other Senators who were exonerated yesterday by the Senator from Virginia on this side and on that side of the Chamber from all participation in any bargain, trade, or coalition by agreement, of course the honorable Senator from Ohio was exempted from knowing personally or seeing how that was to be, but with that blind faith and confidence which no man has the right to repose in anybody but his God or his mother that Senator takes the bit in his mouth quietly and marches under the direction and guidance of George C. Gorham and Captain Riddleberger, and comes here under their direction to enunciate doctrines, philosophical, political, and moral, doctrines which justify him in the course in which he has been driven to justify himself, not only in that, but in any result that may follow; and he hopes that the election of Mr. Riddleberger as Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate will result in the election of a Senator of the United States to represent the people of Virginia who may be in harmony with the sentiments of the Senator from Ohio, or if not, at least more under the control of his will than any democrat, Bourbon or what not, that would ever come from that great State. The honorable Senator wants another man under his power here, and when he saw an opportunity through the assistance of Riddleberger and his subordinate servitors of this body to effect that he would not hesitate to add to Riddleberger's public duties the other private political duty of serving him and his friends in any way whatsoever for the purpose of depriving the people of that State of their free right to elect a Senator of such political complexion and character and such acquirements and accomplishments as they might think would be worthy of the great name of that great Commonwealth. The Senator says:

If the election of Riddleberger will enable us to break up the power of the Bourbon democracy in Virginia I will go into this contest with ten times the heart I have had. If the action of the republican party in coming up to the support of the Senator from Virginia and electing one of his trusted friends will strengthen the republican party in Virginia that is a political object which will greatly advance the good of the people of the United States, it is a political object for which I would contend.

How would he contend for it? In the same manner that he wants you to contend for it, and in the same manner that he knows you have been contending for it, for his remarks are not only declaratory of his own convictions but are apologetic at the same time for your course. Here is the method in which he declares he will contend for it. He says that:

Anything that will beat down that party and build up our own is justifiable in morals and in law.

Mr. President, we find just such a certain course of conduct adopted here. I will not delay the Senate further to recapitulate it or to comment upon it, but it is in the line of the employment of the subordinate officers of the body; it is in the line of using the patronage which is conferred on those officers by law to compensate them for the discharge of their public duty, in personal political enterprises; it is in the line of having these officers to influence in the State of Virginia, of having them become a band of canvassers to influence and control an election in Virginia in some way, it makes no difference what, for there is no restraint of law and morals which the Senator thinks would be proper to be imposed upon them or upon him. After this corps has been organized and sent into the field under the advice and control of this great political leader, if they are called in question as to the methods which they may employ for the purpose of controlling the free will of the people of Virginia, what are they to say but to turn back to that great leader of the republican party in this Senate and ask the question, "Did we not go out with the authority of that great man who declared that whatever we might do, whether in violation of law or morals, would be right, provided it was for the purpose of beating down the democratic party and building up our own?

Mr. President, I cannot believe that that remark was born simply of malignity of spirit, for the weakest and most nervous dyspeptic in the land, when interfered with rudely and unexpectedly by the embarrassing restraints that may surround him, or the disappointment of his tastes or his hopes, would scarcely ever think of abandoning himself to such petulant exclamations even in the privacy and secrecy of his own sick chamber. But here is a Senator clothed with the majesty and power of his party and his State; here is a Senator who stands at the head of that great phalanx on the other side of this Chamber; here is a Senator whose will not one of them will dare to oppose and whose utterance not one of them dares to deny, who, in the midst of the solemnity of this Senate and after he had laboriously argued himself up to the proposition, announced this hideous doctrine which would not bear the test in any tribunal pretending to be civilized or even semi-civilized in the circuit of this globe. Even in the Sublime Porte at Constantinople the man who would utter such a declaration would be denounced as an unworthy Turk and driven from the body. Sir, if it were announced in the councils of the savages of the West, the Indian chief who announced it would be regarded as a man who had degraded himself below that position which entitled him to lead a brave and gallant people.

I will read it again; and, mark you, Senators, this world will read it from now till doomsday; these words have become immortal, not because of their value, but because they mark that condition of political sentiment in this country espoused and acted upon by the other side and never once denounced or even dissented from on that side of the Chamber:

> Anything that will beat down that party and build up our own is justifiable in morals and in law.

We have got your measure; we see your purposes in your conduct. You have revealed to us how easy and how convenient it is for you to throw off all restraints of law and morals to "beat down" an opposing political party, consisting of nearly five millions of people, and for the purpose of building up your own. And if the Senate of the United States should be put into political harness for the purpose of executing a plan like this, and these sovereign States or their embassadors here, great and small, should be required for forty days longer to sit here to prevent the consummation of a plan whose justification was expressed only in the language that I have read, what else could I call it but a prostitution of the Senate, and who will call me to task for saying that? I stand before the bar of this country accusing you not out of my own mouth, but out of yours. I present for its consideration this terrible announcement of your purposes and your creed, and I ask you either to deny it or to stand up to what that Senator has put upon you.

The honorable Senator from Ohio would not reform the democratic party; he wants it destroyed. That has been the burning desire of his heart, I have no doubt, ever since he first found that it was the lion in his path to imperial power. That party will stay, sir. Four million four hundred and forty thousand men who voted in the last November election with the Bourbon democrats and for the Bourbon democrats will be apt to last, and that power is not going to perish in the coming days and years of this country; it will be found here as long as the people need protection. As long as the poor need a friend, as long as the helpless need a defender, as long as justice needs somebody to uphold its authority, as long as laws are enacted and are required to be obeyed, as long as they are recognized in the depth of the heart of society, these 4,440,000 Bourbon democrats and their successors will be in this country for the purpose, not of breaking down the republican party by any means whether constitutional or not or justifiable or not in law or morals, but for the purpose of breaking you down by exposing and opposing the infamy of the creed which you profess on this floor.

The Senator has had many plans for destroying the democratic party. The republican party on that side of the Chamber have had numerous plans for destroying the democratic party, and the more you war against it the more you fail, because you have not sought to break it down with the force of truth and argument; you have not sought to break it down by an appeal to the honest convictions of the great mass of the people of the United States; but you have always sought to break it down by trick and combination and coalition and arrangements like that which you are attempting to employ in this Senate to-day. They have resorted to a curious method of breaking down the democratic party in Virginia, a very singular method. They find a little schism there upon a local question, and that out of the schism an unfortunate heat has grown up between persons who allowed themselves to indulge in debate upon it, and, like a jackal, slipping in behind while the majestic animals of the forest were warring over a capture, they propose to slip off with the spoil. They found a little division of sentiment in Virginia; they found some men there who had more ambition than they had the means of gratifying by their own unaided efforts, their skill in statesmanship, or the confidence the world had in their purposes and in their purity of motive, and they instantly seized upon one of these factions, naturally taking the weaker one, and they endeavored to incorporate it into their own body, and they have prophetically stated on this floor that there was no half-way ground, that the capture of the readjusters in Virginia is a capture out and out, including the side-arms of the officers, camp equipage, baggage, and all. The honorable Senator from Ohio in proclaiming the nature of this conquest or capture declared that the Senator from Virginia could find no half-way ground and no stopping-place, and he at once received him into the bosom of the republican party, as was said here, unshriven and unaneled, without death and without repentance, as the honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] wittily observed.

But it seems that there is a half-way ground somewhere, for the Senator from Virginia does not want quite at this moment of time to undergo the process of deglutition by which he is to be absorbed and become the lamb on the inside of the lion to which the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] referred, quoting from the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] He is not ready yet to occupy that position. Doubtless after a while he expects to be so honored. We shall see in the coming future how long it will take the great anaconda of the republican party to swallow this small affair in Virginia. But, anticipating this, the Senator from Ohio knew very well that if he could get the Senator from Virginia and his party outside of the ranks of the democratic party of this country it would take him but a short time to destroy him, it would require but a very brief moment of time to put him and his little squad hors du combat. He first swaps the carpet-bagger for the readjuster. He resorted to the tactics that the Indians sometimes resort to in the West when they want to get rid of their wives. They have there no law for divorce. An Indian cannot get rid of his wife except by her death or else by selling her. He has the right to sell, but the purchaser has the right to rescind the contract whenever he sees proper, and particularly as long as the tender which the vender received in exchange for the wife remains so that it can be returned. An Indian out West desiring to get rid of his wife refused to sell her out and out to another for money, fearing a rescission, but he swapped her off for a dog, and then he killed the dog, which prevented her return, and thus obtained a perfect divorce. So I must think it is that the Senator from Ohio and his friends on that side of the Chamber mean to treat this party. They mean to swap off their republican allies in Virginia, their "grip-sack" friends down there, for the readjuster party, and then when they get the readjuster party in power for the purpose of preventing a restoration of the bans they intend to kill the readjuster party. That is the only way they can think of to dispose of this matter and get rid of the "grip-sack" party.

The truth is, Mr. President, the republican party in the United States have found at last that their attempt to govern the Southern States through "the grip-sack party," as Mr. MAHONE calls them, or the carpet-bag party, as we call them, is a failure. They are obliged to get some substitutes down there for the purpose of leading the negro hosts in the political campaigns of the country, and they think the best thing they can do now is to immolate and destroy the carpet-baggers in the South and substitute the readjusters in their place.

I was utterly surprised the other day when I saw the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. KELLOGG,] the remaining soul, body, and bones of the Packard government, extending his arms in a death-like embrace to welcome his friend, the readjuster from Virginia. There was the old story of Damon and Pythias renewed. The Senator from Virginia was scarcely warm in his seat till this last remaining remnant of the Packard government enwrapped him within his tender folds and embraced him metaphorically until I thought they would die—a curious combination. It is perfectly understood on this side of the Chamber that the party which is led by the Senator from Virginia, or which he thinks he is leading, is designed by that side of the Chamber to supplant the carpet-baggers and take their place in the administration of affairs in the local governments of the South. Why, sir, there is not anything more patent than the fact that they intend to deliver into the hands of the disaffected democrats in the South, whom they call independent democrats, all the governments of the States, and in consideration and in compensation for it they are to assist these gentlemen here in managing the great affairs of the nation. They are to keep you in power in the Federal Government, where you have the expenditure of $1,000,000 every day that shines upon the earth, and you are to turn over to them the local governments in the States of the South in order that they may play the rôle there which the carpet-baggers have played heretofore, and in order that they may bring back as far as need be, without regard to law and without regard to the restraints of morals, that condition of affairs which existed in the South for many years, and out of which we succeeded in extricating ourselves by the twofold appeal of prayer to God and appeal to the hearts of our honest countrymen in the North.

How is it in Arkansas, where there is a distinct repudiation party running against the democratic party in that State for the offices during the coming summer and fall? Your party are as much organized to-day in the assistance of that repudiation party as you are here in the assistance of the readjuster party. It was so in Tennessee, and the repudiation movement in Tennessee received its impulse from the republican party. My honorable friend [Mr. JACKSON] on the left knows it and bows his assent to the proposition. No man who understands the history of politics in Tennessee can deny it. How is it in Mississippi? An organization is being perfected in Mississippi by which the negro race as a race and as a body are to be placed in close coalition with what are called the independent democrats, and are to be sustained by the patronage of this Government in attempting to dislodge the government of the people of Mississippi. Similar combinations are forming in Louisiana. In my own State during the last November election all the power of the Federal Government and its money as far as they chose to use it was employed in the northern district of Alabama for the purpose of defeating a democrat with a greenbacker, thereby showing that the business of the party is to use, wherever they can find it, a disaffected element among the democrats of the South, and, dropping all considerations of law and morals, to undertake, in the language of the honorable Senator from Ohio, to beat down the democratic party and to build up the republican party.

And so it will be in every Southern State where you can find a foothold. It is precisely the same case that exists in Virginia, where, notwithstanding the effort made on the other side of this Chamber to plaster and smooth over the trouble about the nature of the enterprise which the readjuster party is conducting there with reference to the debt, you are encouraging, as you well know, that party in Virginia, organized, as the Senator from that State told you yesterday, strictly with reference to local affairs and belonging to neither of the great parties of this country. Yesterday evening he undertook to announce his independence and that of his party from either of the great parties of this country, stating that he was here merely as the representative of that party. Let me read his words:

> I came here to represent that people, and, God willing, I intend to do it according to my best ability and my honest convictions. Whether the discharge of that duty shall lead me to act with the republican side of this Chamber or with the democratic side, that is for me to judge and not to be suggested by a caucus.

Before that he had said, in substance, that the readjuster party, of which he was a member, was his party; that it was organized upon a particular phase of local politics; that it had no connection with either of the national parties and had refused to participate with either of the national parties in their last great campaign. He had also said that the readjuster party, which he led at the time of his election to the Senate, had no representatives in the Cincinnati convention. In that I think the Senator's memory was at fault, although it would be inappropriate, perhaps, for a Senator from another State to undertake to correct him about the history of his own State; but, as well as I recollect about it, Mr. James Barbour, who was a readjuster, was president of the State convention that sent delegates to the Cincinnati convention from Virginia, and Mr. H. D. Allen was also, I believe, made permanent president of that body, or, at all events, he was an influential member of it, and the delegates from the State at large, both readjusters, were James Barbour and S. H. Moffatt, the delegates at large of the regular democratic party being William Terry and John W. Daniel.

So it goes, Mr. President, through the entire chapter. The words which I have quoted from the honorable Senator from Ohio will become more suggestive to the people of this country in the future attempts of this combination to legislate here. I do not know what measures they propose to carry into effect to accomplish their designs, but I can very well understand that, when there are no restraints of law or morals on a party thus united together in the government of this country, the people, referring to the experiences of the past, have much to dread from this combination. Sir, it was combinations of this kind which destroyed many of the best governments of the world, and the persecutions that men have endured from age to age and from generation to generation are due to the fact that the leadership of the great parties of this world was in the hands of men who renounced all obedience to law and morals in their dealing with their political antagonists. It was that which bathed Lu Vendee in the blood of the peasantry. It was that which dismembered Poland and drove the majority of its population into exile in Siberia. It is that which carried into Siberia during the last year more than 16,000 exiles, of whom three-fourths were political prisoners. It was that which prompted the bloody assizes of England. It was that which has put the yoke of bondage upon the neck of Ireland, so that to-day she groans with inextinguishable grief beneath the hand of her oppressor. It was that which sent your carpet-baggers into the South, and it was that which put upon her a burden the like of which no people in this country or any other have ever before been required to bear. The man who will announce on the floor of the Senate that he is unrestrained by law or morals in beating down the opposing party or in building up his own is not one whit better than Cortez or Pizarro. His principles would lead him to the extermination of any man or set of men who opposed him. Left to himself, he would convert Alaska into another Siberia, where the ice and the sands alternating in their strife for the occupation of the country during the summer would drive the population to misery and death.

Sir, in the light of this philosophy there is nothing that can be said in opposition to the will of a bare majority uncontrolled by law, unrestrained by morals, which would prevent them from doing what they desire to do. I would never have thought of charging this sentiment upon that side of the Senate, but when it is asserted out of the mouth of your own leader I do not know any occasion that requires me to bate my breath in discussing the proposition.

Sir, according to high republican authority the honorable Senator from Ohio has been some time preparing himself for an announcement of this kind. During the last year when the canvass was proceeding for the candidacy of the republican party, when the conventions were about to be held and delegates were about to be selected from the South and North and East and West to represent the republican party in the great convention at Chicago, the New York Times indulged in some remarks about the honorable Senator from Ohio which that paper states are based on facts, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

> Of the delegates to the Mississippi republican convention, eight were employés of the Treasury Department, six were postmasters or postal-route agents, and one was a United States district attorney. All these were, of course, Sherman men, since to hold a Federal office in the South and support any presidential candidate except the Secretary of the Treasury is to invite removal. They were aided by half a dozen outsiders, also in the employ of an indulgent people, whose money is used to the extent of at least $35,000 a year to galvanize Mr. Sherman's candidacy in Mississippi. Perhaps the discreet journalists in Ohio and New England who have been so greatly shocked by the suggestion that Mr. Sherman was not entirely without responsibility for the peculiar transactions of brother-in-law Moulton may condescend to explain the tactics by which their immaculate candidate has pushed his candidacy in Mississippi. These are, it is true, merely a repetition of the shameless trickery practiced in North Carolina and Georgia, but as they are, if possible, a little more impudent, they appear to challenge some sort of notice from the alleged reformers who have undertaken the somewhat delicate task of vouching for the statesmanship and political probity of the eminent trimmer from Ohio.

> It is well to make this statement in order that Mr. Sherman may know just how much his friends bear for his sake. Further for his information, that of the civil-service-reform administration, and the public, it will not be amiss to give the following list of office-holders who conducted the Secretary's Mississippi canvass. Those marked with a star were delegates to the convention. The others did good work on the outside:

> In addition to these were a number of messengers and minor "hangers-on."

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the New York Times is high authority in republican circles. If it stands for anything at all in its statements, the honorable Senator from Ohio was not wrong in stating as his moral view of political action in this country that "anything that will beat down that party [the democratic] and build up our own [the republican] is justifiable in morals and in law," and he might have added that anything that will beat down an antagonist in my own party is justifiable in morals and in law.

While that canvass was going on there was another initial movement going on in the United States custom-house, which was called civil-service reform. It was a prelude to the Chicago convention. I turn to the celebrated civil-service order No. 1, and read it for the purpose of reminding the Senate of the very high ground which was taken by the administration of which the honorable Senator from Ohio was a prominent member:

CIVIL-SERVICE ORDER NO. 1.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON, June 22, 1877.

SIR: I desire to call your attention to the following paragraph in a letter addressed by me to the Secretary of the Treasury, on the conduct to be observed by the officers of the General Government in relation to the elections:

"No officer shall be required or permitted to take part in the management of political organizations, caucuses, conventions, or election campaigns. Their right to vote and to express their views on public questions, either orally or through the press, is not denied, provided it does not interfere with the discharge of their official duties. No assessments for political purposes on officers or subordinates should be allowed."

This rule is applicable to every Department of the civil service. It should be understood by every officer of the General Government that he is expected to conform his conduct to its requirements.

Very respectfully,

R. B. HAYES.

That was indeed "thundering in the index," as the honorable Senator from New York remarked the other day in reference to another matter, and it was followed by a book of history in which was written the weakest and feeblest performance in that line that I think was ever recorded in a book since books were first made. The Senator from Ohio was a part of that administration, and while he was there, with this rule held out for the guidance of public officers of the Government of the United States in all the Departments, we find him, according to the New York Times, undertaking to use the employés of the Government, and in the pay of the Government, to conduct a personal canvass for him in Mississippi against other republicans. I do not wonder, after he has left that administration and come back to the Senate, that either in a moment of forgetfulness (for men sometimes in moments of forgetfulness get to be too candid in the expression of their opinions) or in a moment of boastful bravado and of imperious determination to sustain what he calls the power of a constitutional majority, he has announced the odious doctrine on this floor that he would stop at nothing because of the constraint of law or of morals to carry into effect the purposes of his party, provided it would beat down the democratic party and build up the republican party.

Under the influence of this civil-service order No. 1 the honorable Senator from Ohio, when he was Secretary of the Treasury, addressing a letter to Hon. William A. Wheeler, President of the Senate of the United States, in respect of an important public official who was collector of customs in New York and another who was naval officer, made the following observations, which are entirely in harmony with civil-service order No. 1, and entirely out of harmony with the declarations made the other day in the Senate:

The third report shows that the gravest irregularities existed in the department of weighers and gaugers; that the larger number of the thirteen weighers and eight gaugers rendered but little, if any, personal service to the Government; that the weighers' fireman performed but little service; that the weighers' clerks in some instances performed no duty; that in most, if not in all, the weighers' offices men were hired as employés and assigned to do the work of the regular clerks; that the number of laborers thus assigned varied from four to eight persons in each weighers' office; that the men so assigned had but little duty to perform; that persons were borne on the pay-rolls as laborers as a reward for political services who performed no service except to sign their names to the rolls and receive their pay; that a part of the weighable merchandise was not weighed by the Government officers, but by city weighers, who furnished memoranda upon which the United States weighers rendered their returns; that a part of the weighable goods were not weighed at all, but the marked weights on the packages were copied off and returned by the weighers as if weighed; that the weighers had adopted a schedule of irregular fees, which they illegally collected from merchants for special returns and copies of weights, delaying to make returns to the custom-house until the importers paid these irregular fees; that by reason of these irregularities the cost of weighing and gauging imported goods at the port of New York had increased to the enormous sum of $346,524.80 per annum.

These evils were known to Collector Arthur, yet he made no attempt during his term of office to remedy them. * * * The existence of all these irregularities was subsequently verified by independent investigations made under my direction.

What is the weight and pith of that accusation? It is that the men employed in these offices rendered but little service and that of a perfunctory character, but that they had permitted men to be assigned to this duty who were borne upon the pay-rolls as laborers as a reward for political services. If that be wrong in the custom-house at New York and if that be a sufficient ground of accusation by a Secretary of the Treasury against a distinguished and a long-tried public officer, what must we say to the honorable Senator who was then Secretary of the Treasury when he comes back to the Senate and says that he will be glad to know that the officials of this Senate can be employed to control political elections in Virginia? Sir, it is time to pause and reflect a little as we go along in this debate. It is time to understand the reasons of our action. It is time to probe to the very bottom the motives of this proceeding and to understand whether or not any man in this country who has held a responsible official position has made the declarations I have quoted while holding such position, and now in the Senate feels himself warranted in declaring that the employés of this body, who are chosen and paid only for the service of the people and the Senate, are to have offices conferred upon them not only as a means of influencing political action in the different States, but for the express purpose that they may have the power to do so. In the concluding part of the same letter the same honorable Senator, while Secretary of the Treasury, proceeds as follows:

It is respectfully submitted that, under the circumstances, the restoration of Messrs. Arthur and Cornell would be a serious injury to the public service, involving a loss of public revenue and an increased revenue. It would establish a constant irritation and struggle between old abuses that existed and reforms that are sought to be accomplished. It would destroy the discipline of the Department; for, after all, the collector of customs is but a subordinate of this Department, and, though possessed of great powers, can do but little without the sanction of the Secretary; but he may seriously obstruct the Department in the conduct of business according to its ideas and plans.

IMPORTANCE OF THE NEW YORK COLLECTORSHIP.

It has been the established custom that this great office should be held as an administrative office, like that of a Cabinet minister; for the officer who collects over two-thirds of the revenue from customs performs functions equal to those of a Cabinet minister; but the law requires constant supervision and approval of his acts by this Department.

To require this business to be performed by persons in hostility to the general policy of the Administration would create discord and contention where there ought to be unity and harmony. It would be unjust to the President and personally embarrassing to me in the discharge of my duties to have the office of collector of customs at New York held by one who will not perform his duties according to the general policy of the Department.

Especially is this in point if the officers of any Department are employed for political purposes, and if the money paid to them out of the Treasury of the United States is to be perverted to the business of the corruption of elections, or even to the direct use of influence by these officials. Did it never occur to the honorable Senator that the men we are proposing to employ in the Senate are the mere servitors of this body, that they have very important official connection with us, that they are under our control, that it is expected of them that according to law and every consideration of propriety of action they will faithfully obey the orders of the Senate? After men are brought into this Chamber and in such relations to us are they to announce their independence of the Senate, and say that neither morals nor law shall restrain them any more than they shall restrain their chief in what they please to do in thwarting the purposes of any man or set of men in this body?

I will read from the message of President Hayes upon this same question, addressed to the Senate of the United States, and bearing date the 31st of January, 1879:

The custom-house in New York collects more than two-thirds of all the customs revenues of the Government. Its administration is a matter not only of local interest merely, but is of great importance to the people of the whole country. For a long period of time it has been used to manage and control political affairs.

The officers suspended by me are, and for several years have been, engaged in the active personal management of the party politics of the city and State of New York. The duties of the offices held by them have been regarded as of subordinate importance to their partisan work. Their offices have been conducted as a part of the political machinery under their control. They have made the custom-house a center of partisan political management.

The custom-house is a business office. It should be conducted on business principles. General James, the postmaster of New York City, writing on this subject, says: "The post-office is a business institution and should be run as such. It is my deliberate judgment that I and my subordinates can do more for the party of our choice by giving the people of this city a good and efficient postal service than by controlling primaries or dictating nominations." The New York custom-house should be placed on the same footing with the New York post-office. But under the suspended officers the custom-house would be one of the principal political agencies in the State of New York. To change this, they profess to believe, would be, in the language of Mr. Cornell, in his response, "to surrender their personal and political rights."

I have read enough of it to give emphasis to the proposition that the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury both denounced, as being improper under the laws and spirit of our institutions, the employment of any of the officers of the Government of the United States for the mere purpose of affecting party politics.

Now, sir, I would like to know how far the honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] is expected to assist in this business. If we could have that question answered, we should perfectly understand what his relations are to this side of the Chamber and whether he is here, as he boasts, the representative of an independent party, refusing to go into the caucus of either party, standing upon his own party organization and outside of all others; or whether he is here to give the influence of his counsel and his vote to purposes like that which are now uncovered before the Senate. If I could know in what way he would vote upon propositions respecting the punishment of Virginia's judges, who may undertake to execute the constitution and laws of that State according to their oaths; if I could know what he means to do or is expected to do in reference to the jury-box, in reference to the future employment of troops at the polls, in reference to the striking out of the representation of Southern States upon the false clamor of their having denied "a free ballot and a fair count" to the negroes of the South, upon the proposition to make a permanent reduction of the democratic power in this body and in the House—if I could know how far he intends to go in that direction, then I would not be doubting, perhaps, whether he was a democrat or a republican, and the honorable Senator from Ohio would feel more fully satisfied that he had pocketed his game or else had lost it.

But is this coalition to stop with the organization of the Senate? Is the alliance to be broken the moment the honorable Senator's friends are placed in position and office in the Senate, or is it expected to be a permanent alliance, offensive and defensive? There is no middle ground to be occupied in the Senate of the United States on questions like these, and I, for one, must be permitted to doubt, it makes no difference how bold and defiant the declarations may be, or how much they may be accompanied with threats or bravado, I must be permitted in my own conscience upon the facts to doubt whether this alliance is not a through and through arrangement, and whether it does not imply that the Senator, notwithstanding his announcement of independence of caucuses on both sides, is not after all as much the slave of a caucus as any man on either side of this Chamber. The Senator announces that he has not been in either caucus and gives notice that he is not going into either caucus, and that it was expected that he would not. He is the luckiest man not to have any special political friends that I ever knew. Not to have any political support from either party in this Chamber he is the most fortunate gentleman I ever met. The chairmanship of a leading committee, important positions upon other committees, and dignities have been been conferred upon him at the expense of Senators on that side who have been serving here for years, men of ability and character known throughout this country and, some of them, throughout the world. They have been rudely displaced, set aside to make room for a gentleman whose present position cannot be accounted for except upon one of two hypotheses: one that he is the most gifted and most highly endowed man that America has yet revealed to an astonished people, or else some good friend who has the power to control and manage has provided the places for him. We must be permitted to judge of these things, because when you place astonishing facts before the human mind, they challenge inquiry, and when the solution becomes to us a matter of constitutional duty we cannot hesitate because the conclusion we arrive at may be disagreeable on the one hand or extravagantly flattering on the other.

Is this new doctrine that the honorable Senator from Ohio has espoused for the first time on this floor a part of the readjuster doctrine? Does the credit belong to the readjustment party of Virginia to have discovered it and to promote the idea that it is the right and duty of Senators here to violate law and morals to beat down an opposing party and build up your own? Sir, has it come to this that, to accommodate that feature of southern politics (as it is called southern politics) which partakes of the nature of readjustment or repudiation as you please to call it, that you have graded down the moral standard of the republican party to this low plane to gain this little squad of 31,000 readjusters in Virginia? Are the five millions of voting republicans in the United States to have imputed to them that doctrine which the honorable Senator from Ohio announced on this floor, merely because it is necessary to lower the standard of your party to be able to include men like these?

The honorable Senator from Ohio has been in many a contest and we have felt the weight of his hand in the past. I admit it; and when he rises on the floor of the Senate and makes an utterance like this we do not regard it as a merely unguarded expression. It is a trumpet-sound in our ears and a tocsin of alarm. It comes to us with a force and weight that we cannot resist or avoid. We are obliged to understand that hereafter the immense power, not of that Senator only, but of all the Senators on that side, is to be used for the purpose of beating down the democracy of the country without respect to law or to morals.

Mr. President, while this debate is going on in the Senate let us turn our eyes outside of this Chamber, and let us see whether the enunciation of doctrines like this, and the fruits of such doctrines, as displayed in the conduct of republicans on the other side of this Chamber on this particular resolution, meet the approbation of the people of this country.

What is the condition of the actual relations between the people of the United States at this moment of time? Here is the Senate of the United States engaged in angry debate; thirty-eight men are speaking and voting against thirty-eight others, day in and day out, and there seems to be a settled conclusion on the minds of all that we shall stand here and debate and that no conclusive vote shall be taken upon the pending resolution. While this is going on the people that we represent and the States that we represent, so far as I know, are entirely in harmony with each other. I do not know of a State in the American Union that has a quarrel with any other State. I have not heard of a spiteful message that has been sent from the executive of one State to the executive of any other. I have not heard that there is any antagonism in fact or in feeling between the northern section and the southern section, or the eastern and western sections, if we are obliged to have sections in this country. We have peace and amity and harmony between the States. How is it among the people? From the borders of Maine down to the peninsula of Florida, and from the easternmost shore of Massachusetts to Alaska, around all our borders and throughout the entire country, I hear of no bickerings and no strife. The people from my own State visit Massachusetts and Connecticut and New York to sell their productions; they are well received, are heartily welcomed, entertained oftentimes with expensive and luxurious taste. There is no strife that I know of between the people. The commercial men and the manufacturers of the East and of the North are preparing their goods to send them down to our country. They deal with each other in perfect security and confidence. The people of the Northwest send their provisions and crops to the South and exchange them for what we have to sell or the money we have to pay for them. From the city of Cincinnati, the chief city of the State of the honorable Senator from Ohio, a railroad has been built by the corporate authorities at an expense of about thirty million dollars, going right down into the heart of the State that I have the honor in part to represent. What was the object of that great thoroughfare? It was to increase the facilities of intercourse between the people. While during the late presidential campaign heated and abusive speeches were made through the Northern and Northwestern States against the people of the South we listened with astonishment at the complaints that were being made against us, knowing they were not true, knowing that the very men who were sent to the South from all these great commercial and manufacturing establishments, and who visited every part of the South and inspected the condition of every community were taking back reports continually that utterly contradicted all these stories. Your trade with us increased. Our development has been great and progressive in consequence of it, and because of our own industry also. Senators must know, or if they do not the country knows, that the productions of the South could not have increased a hundred per cent. in the last twelve years, and its trade with the Northern States more than a hundred per cent., if there had been in the South any condition which was hostile to the purposes of legitimate and honorable government.

These facts are a reproach to the condition of the Senate of the United States to-day, and a bitter reproach to those men who make it their business to get up on this floor and undertake to create excitement and prejudice against communities in the South that are laboring to do their duty, working under the laws of the country in perfect harmony with the people in all the rest of the country. Sir, I thank God that the influence of the Senate of the United States is not yet powerful enough to disturb the harmony of the people of this country; for whatever else we may think of ourselves, of the grand powers that are placed under our control here, the people understand that after all they hold the helm, and that at the ballot-box they can control us. However we may allow our passions or our prejudices to abuse our judgment and warp our conduct, they, being at peace with each other and in harmony with each other throughout this land, will after awhile assert their power, and they will produce harmony in this body also.

The honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has chosen for himself this bad eminence, and he is entitled to occupy it alone. He cannot get the American people to follow him in a declaration which invites them to set aside law and disregard morals to break down any political party. He says that every party does these things. I deny it; and if every party did such things, such conduct is not worthy to be quoted on this floor as a precedent for its continuation. As my friend near me says, our experiment of self-government demands that we should prove to the world that we are capable of driving out wrong and injustice wherever it may exist. If this is not our business here, we have got no business here. If we are only urging the bad conduct of one party as a justification for bad or worse conduct on the part of another, then we abdicate the authority which the Constitution has placed in our hands and degrade the high offices that we occupy.

If that side of the Chamber is stronger than this side of the Chamber constitutionally, as they claim to be, and which I dispute, what is the duty of that side of the Chamber toward us? It is not to beat us down; it is not to break us down; it is to consider questions in conjunction with us, to debate them with freedom, to vote upon them with candor and sincerity of purpose, and with a view to the good of the country, and not to place over us a set of men merely because you have the power, who you know are objectionable to this side of the Chamber and with whom we cannot have the relations that we would like to have with the officers of this body. It is no part of the business of any majority here imperiously and arbitrarily to exercise this authority to the beating down of the other side or to their degradation in any sense whatever. It seems to me that if I had been on that side of the Chamber I should have had the floor before this to demand that one of the great committees of this body should have taken charge of this subject and should have inquired into the facts which cause this terrible uneasiness, not here alone, but among the people. Sirs, we are not entitled to be treated by you with imperious arrogance. There is not a State on this side of the Chamber, nor is there a Senator on this side of the Chamber, who is worthy of any such treatment.

It has been time and again insidiously hinted that some of us do not hold the titles to our offices by legitimate elections. If you believe that, bring forward your inquiries and see whether there is a Senator on this side of the Chamber who will take shelter behind the plea of res adjudicata or former acquittal or former conviction. Can you afford that inquiry? We challenge you to it. We have got nothing around us or behind us that we would shut the door of inquiry upon or exclude the light of heaven from illuminating. Intimations do not prove anything in this body, and history cannot be made by mere assertions, especially by innuendoes. You can go deeper than that when you wish to try us. When you expect to put a gag upon us by crying out treason when we get up to vindicate the constitutional right and powers of minorities, we recall how that same cry was raised in the house of burgesses in the peninsula of Virginia and how it was met by an indignant people. Your Constitution defines treason. There is no doubt about that. There is no man amenable to that charge who is not liable to be indicted in one of the courts of the country. When the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] reiterated yesterday as a settled conclusion and conviction of his own mind that this side of the Chamber were in spirit traitors to the Constitution of the country, and intentional traitors, we understood it as being one of those outbreaks of the honorable Senator which I believe he has not got the constitutional ability to resist, an outbreak of serious ill-temper; for it is his habit, wherever he can find a spot or blotch on the body-politic of State or government in the South, to strut through it like a piece of proud flesh, and to demand the skill of the considerate surgeon. Treason, is it?

As one of the reasons which has been urged for this new coalition between a thoroughly independent man who will not connect himself with any party at all and the great republican party is the demand of a free ballot and a fair count in elections. That matter has been very extensively discussed in the Senate; but has it never occurred to Senators that they are influencing somebody's ballot when they pay a corps of hirelings here to go to Virginia to influence and control elections? If you want a free ballot keep your hands off the ballot. If you want a fair count keep your agents out of the field. Let the men who are employed here to serve the Senate in subordinate capacities remain here and perform their duties according to the law, and do not send them out for the purpose of influencing the ballot in Virginia. Yet while the Senators on that side get up here and talk loudly and eloquently about a free ballot and a fair count, they admit themselves that they are concerned in what I call a conspiracy to place the power of the United States Senate and the money and influence that belong to these offices at work in the State of Virginia for the purpose of controlling elections in that State. It is a magnificent start you are taking for a free ballot and a fair count. If you will go deep enough into the Treasury of the United States, and it seems not to make any difference to you how deep you will go, and take enough money out of it to my State, I will assure you that you can hire 60,000 negroes to vote for the repudiation of the debts of that State or any other State, or to follow the Senator from Ohio in his newly developed scheme of controlling the politics of this country without respect to law and without regard to restraint of morals.

Some Senator rose the other day and suggested that after all a hardship would not be inflicted upon the officers of this body by turning them out, for the reason, as he said, that they were entirely willing to vote the whole amount of the pay to them just as if they had filled the offices until the commencement of the next session in December. Yes, you are very free, very liberal, and very kind with other people's money; but who gave to the Senate of the United States the right to go into the pockets of the people and take out salaries to pay one set of officers that you turn out and another set that you keep in for the same service? The proposition itself shows the absolute state of demoralization of the republican party. They are willing to go into the Treasury of the United States and, I will say, filch therefrom (for it is nothing else) money enough to pay the full corps of officials for the Senate of the United States, who will not perform one hand's turn of service from now until next December, provided we will consent to also employ and pay another set that they want in just now, not for the good of the public service, but merely for advancing their politics in a particular State.

This may be considered by some as a small matter, but it takes sometimes a very little pimple on a man's cheek to convince the skilled observer that he has a malady in his system which will eat the marrow out of every bone in his body.

When you came with your proposition to us you supposed that the democratic party would be willing to go into the Treasury of the United States and take out of the people's money enough to pay these officers until December provided we would let you have the control of another set to do the same business, they being brought here and sworn in, not for the purpose of serving the Senate, but for the purpose of serving a political party.

This subject of a free ballot and a fair count is one that does not belong to sections, nor does it belong exclusively to the republican or the democratic party. Our election system in the United States is about as just, as fair, and as free as it is in England or in France, perhaps not more so; and in the South it is as fair as it is in the North. But the man is a Utopian and has no just conception of the realities of government who expects that any political party, embracing more than four million voters within its circle, would be able to conduct all the elections of this country without the intrusion of any fraud or irregularity into any of them. It is one of the evils of the system which it is impossible for us to root out, but which every honest and good man in the country sets himself diligently to try to check. I say on the part of every Senator on this side of the Chamber, that there is not a man in the world who can lay his finger upon an act in which, by expressions or by his conduct, he has ever participated in any unlawful or improper interference with the ballot-box. Neither repudiation, nor ballots that are perverted, nor counts that are corrupted, have an advocate or a defender or an apologist on this side of the Chamber. We represent our own constituencies; we come here as men who were elected, not with reference to the defense of the corruptions of the ballot-box, not with reference to the repudiation of debts, State or national. Being representatives of such people, it is enough that we should rise in our places and deny the impeachments, to be able to exonerate ourselves from the broad and sweeping denunciation of the Senator from Ohio, that it will not do to trust the democratic party of the United States to carry out their own professions.

Mr. Butler impeaches the elections in Massachusetts and Senators on our side of the Chamber have impeached the elections in many of the Northern States. It is thoroughly well known that every important civil officer of this Government during the last presidential campaign actively exerted himself in the endeavor to control elections. As far as that was legitimate I have no objection to it; but it is equally well known that there was not an official, an employé, an officer of the Government of the United States here or elsewhere within the Union in the civil service who was not taxed in the last campaign a percentage upon his per diem or his salary for the purpose of collecting a fund with which to control elections in this country. From the President of the United States down to the women who upon their knees scrub the floors of the Insane Asylum in this city, nobody was exempt from taxation for political purposes. The system was as perfect, as thorough, as inexorable as any system of taxation that was ever imposed upon the people of any State in the Union.

Let me ask you what did you do with the millions of money which you collected thus by taxation out of the office-holders of this country last year? Where did you use it? You had a terrible complaint against us, reaching back for ten, fifteen, or twenty years, ever since the enfranchisement of the negro race, that we would not allow them to vote, that we perverted the ballot in one way and another. Why did you not use that money in these Southern States to protect a free ballot and a fair count? I am not aware that a dollar of it went farther South than Hon. John Goode's district, in Virginia. I know that some of it went there, and I happen to be informed of the orders by which it went. Why did not you take these levies that you taxed out of the people elsewhere and use them in Southern States to secure this fair count and this free ballot? It was because you knew that there was no occasion to do it. You employed your money in Indiana and Ohio, in Maine and in New York. Wherever there was a doubtful State there your myrmidons flocked, loaded with money taxed out of men and women who were in Government employment. When you got to those States do you expect to convince the people that you made a legitimate and honorable use of this money? If you do you had better prepare yourselves and occupy the remaining part of your days in that labor, for the world is not going to believe it, though you might stand tiptoe and preach it from now to the dawn of eternity. We know as well as you know that the money which by the arbitrary system of levies upon the public officers of this country you gathered in these immense masses was used to influence the floating population of the large cities, and to pay professional ballot-box stuffers and Johnny Davenport for his cages and his chains to put upon the limbs of honest freemen. Knowing that as you do, it is well enough for you to depart from your lines of defense and make an attack upon us, for well you understand when the people of the United States in organized array assail your defenses you are obliged to go to the wall. I commend your strategy and your tactics in coming out from your own camp to fight people upon ground that you select for them.

I have sat here in the Senate recently (and it has not been until recently that I have had it to do) and listened to the horrible accounts that have been presented by various Senators, some drawn like that which the honorable Senator from Massachusetts drew out of his pocket or else from his imagination about the gin-house that was burned in Mississippi. Some were like that; and then we have had bloody pictures. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] got up here and undertook to tell us horrible recitals of terrible murders, of bottoms of bays and lakes and creeks filled up with the bodies of slain republicans in Louisiana. We have had intimation after intimation of such crimes in the South, and though our people have protested in every form in which a protest can be presented, it makes not the slightest impression to remove from us the stigma that all communities in the South are capable of inflicting upon an inferior race any sort of cruelty and outrage that the devilish malignity of the depraved human mind could invent. We are denounced by States and sections. We are not given the benefit of a fair trial even to the extent of having a bill of particulars, but the broad indictment is made that all society in the South is corrupt and cruel. There never was a greater cruelty and injustice than that, and the men who perpetrate it will be at last compelled to understand that the people, though very credulous, especially in believing what they desire to believe, can never give them credit for veracity when they decline to come forward with their particulars, but make broad and sweeping accusations for the inculpation of whole communities in the South.

Sir, they may be a very bad people, but I still thank God that myself and my children have the privilege of living among them. I do not know a people in all this world where I have been or of whom I have heard with whom I would prefer to have my posterity cast their lot rather than with the people of the Southern States. We do not boast much of ourselves either of learning or of genius, but there is an honest, homely simplicity of character and a love of truth pervading society in that country which prevents them from becoming the unjust accusers of other people and disturbers of the rights and privileges of other societies, and which gives them a just confidence that after all this world will do them credit in the days to come.

I am going to read some remarks by the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] delivered on the floor of the Senate in respect to certain transactions in the city of New York, and then I will ask some Senator on that side to rise in his place and point to me a southern community in which it can be asserted by a Senator on this floor that such things have ever occurred. That Senator, on the 24th of April, 1879, in the discussion of a measure then before the Senate, proceeded to say this:

> In the autumn of that year—
> Eighteen hundred and seventy—> an election was held for the choice of Representatives in Congress.

That was in the city of New York, that great metropolis of the United States, that center from which comes forth, we are to suppose, every just and moral influence to control the people, as well as the financial power which regulates their affairs, the largest city in the Union, the center of American civilization, the focal point upon which every eye from every promontory of this world is directed when they want to understand American character.

> I see more than one friend near me who for himself and for others has reason even unto this day to remember that election and the apprehension which preceded it. It was the first time the law of 1870 had been put in force. Resistance was openly counseled. Democratic newspapers in New York advised that the officers of the law be pitched into the river. Disorder was afoot. Men, not wanting in bravery, and not republicans, dreaded the day. Bloodshed, arson, riot were feared. Ghastly spectacles were then fresh in memory. The draft riots had spread terror which had never died, and strong men shuddered when they remembered the bloody assizes of the democratic party. They had seen men and women, blind with party hate, dizzy and drunk with party madness, stab and burn and revel in murder and in mutilating the dead. They had seen an asylum for colored orphans made a funeral pile, and its smoke sent up from their Christian and imperial city to tell in heaven of the inhuman bigotry, the horrible barbarity of man. Remembering such sickening scenes, and dreading their repetition, they asked the President to protect them—to protect them with the beak and claw of national power.

I defy any Senator on that side of the Chamber to rise in his place and point to me an instance where men and women in the South, white men and white women, drunk with madness and rage, have roved the streets stabbing and killing, mutilating the dead, setting fire to orphan asylums where the children of blacks or whites were assembled, and burning them until the smoke ascended to heaven to protest against bigotry and outlawry.

Senators, until you can remove that spot put upon your own country by one of your own Senators do not turn to us to point out the little peccadillos of which some of our forgetful and injudicious people in the heat of passion and burning with a sense of wrong have attempted, or on some occasions have been guilty. Get rid of the accusations of Mr. Butler; get rid of the accusations of Mr. CONKLING; get rid of the accusations made by the whole democratic press of the North against your conduct in the last election; and then we will give you a free and fair opportunity to sit down with us and to counsel with us about our sins, and we will take your advice to the letter. You need not come at us with any hypocritical pretensions of your purity and excellence with a view to convince us that we must bow our heads to you and never make an inquiry as to what sort of men you are. When reformers begin to reform, to gain the slightest degree of respectability in the estimation of mankind they ought first to convince the world that they have started a reformation in their own lives. The most contemptible of all God's creation is a non-reformed reformer, a man barnacled with crime and sins, who comes out and preaches holiness and purity to others!

Has Virginia been derelict? If so, when was that? When was it that a free ballot and a fair count were denied in Virginia? What has given this sudden and unexpected spur to inquiry in regard to the affairs of Virginia, and has made this the great crisis in the history of that State, which renders it necessary that a distinguished Senator should come out from the midst of those people and signalize his devotion to the cause of the Constitution and laws by proclaiming and declaiming against the abuse of a free ballot and a fair count?

There was an election in Virginia last November, and there were three tickets in the field. There were a great many around the polls to watch. There was not a Bourbon democracy there who had control of the people of Virginia to do with the ballot-boxes what they pleased; but the election was held and the count was made, and no man on that side of the Chamber has risen in his place, and I expect that none will, to assert that in that election there was a single ballot which was not fairly cast, or that there was one which was cast and was not counted. What is the necessity, then, of this great reformation in Virginia politics? When did you make the discovery that it was necessary to hold the Senator from Virginia in your protecting grasp in order to secure in that State a free ballot and a fair count?

Mr. President, we of the South have occasionally heard something about tissue ballots. I never saw one; I do not know that I would recognize the article if I were to see it. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] bows. I have no doubt the Senator has one. It was an invention of his own people; his presses worked off the first issue; they were sent to the South on a tour of political reformation. They came in the name of God and morality; they came as a part of the reformation.

The first time that I ever heard of a tissue ballot was at Petersburgh, in Virginia; that was in 1874. I recollect the newspapers came out with entirely a new view of political management quite stunning to the gentlemen of the South; and when it was charged upon what was then the conservative party of Virginia that they had used them there was a feeling of intense disgust that ran through every honorable mind in the South that men who called themselves Virginians could be induced to resort to a trick so low as that. It was known as the Petersburgh method, and at a time when Petersburgh was under the ban, as it was termed. That method was afterward alleged by the republicans to have been continued. I am not prepared to admit it or to deny it, but I know the papers of the country rang with the accusation that the political methods of Petersburgh, in Virginia, were such as comported with that declaration of the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN,] that to beat down a party it is right to do anything, whether justified or not by law or morals.

Suppose I should take that text as a justification of the alleged Petersburgh method of holding elections in Virginia, what would be the result? It would be that that side of the Chamber would be estopped from claiming that we were censurable for anything that was done in connection with an election, because if it is fair for you to do anything without respect to law or morals to break down the democratic party it would be quite as fair for us to use your own weapons upon you, including your tissue ballots.

This zeal about the tissue ballot in Virginia is entirely modern; and, so far as the Senator from Virginia is concerned, I think it is entirely new-born. When I have listened on the floor of the Senate to his infantile complaints about a free ballot and a fair count it has occurred to me that these wailings arose from the fact that, like Cæsar, he had been suddenly brought into a fresh atmosphere by compulsion and found himself taken by surprise. That this idea of a free ballot and a fair count was entirely new to a Petersburgh man passes belief.

What do the republicans of Virginia say about this business? I want to inform that side of the Senate of the complaints that have been made by the republicans of the United States against the Petersburgh method, and perhaps when they get hold of the complaints made by their party they may be able to bring to the contemplation of the country the reasons why they are so anxious now to adopt into their family the honorable Senator from Virginia because of his orthodoxy on that subject. The republicans charge down there that the vote in Petersburgh, Virginia, for the years 1869 to 1874, was as follows:

1869.—Walker, (democrat)	1,822
Wells, (republican)	2,781
Total	4,603
1873.—Kemper, (democrat)	2,065
Hughes, (republican)	2,295
Total	4,360
1874.—Greggory, (democrat)	2,483
Wood, (republican)	1,945
Total	4,428

That was the way it stood up to 1874; showing that in five years the democrats gained 661 votes, and the republicans lost 836 votes, the total vote being in 1869, 4,605; in 1873, 4,360; and in 1874, 4,428. In November, 1874, W. H. H. Stowell was the republican candidate, and William H. Mann was the democratic candidate for Congress. Mr. Mann is a readjuster, and was elected judge of Nottoway County as such by the same Legislature that elected Mr. MAHONE. Mann was sprung upon the republicans on the morning of the election, his name being borne in huge capitals on this delicate and fairy-like ticket, which is one inch and seven-eighths long by three-fourths of an inch wide. [Exhibiting.] I hope that the printer will be able to duplicate this, in the exact form in which it is, in the RECORD. Perhaps the honorable Senator from Massachusetts would like to examine it; it is a kind of little joker; it is the readjuster ticket that was voted:

City of Petersburg, Virginia.

ELECTION,
November 3rd, 1874.

For Representative in Congress
From 4th District:

Judge
Wm. H. Mann,
OF Nottoway County

Stowell's ticket had on it the eagle bird, and is four and one-half inches long by two inches and one-half wide. I have Stowell's ticket here also. I will hand that to the Reporter to be inserted:

Republican Ticket,

PETERSBURG CITY.

FOR CONGRESS,

Fourth Congr'l District of Virginia,

W. H. H. STOWELL.

Perhaps you would like to know why these small tickets were used. I will inform you out of the statutes of Virginia, and then perhaps the honorable Senator from Virginia can make some explanation of it that will make it clearer than I can. I read from page 160 of the Revised Code of Virginia, (1873.) I will omit the parts that are not necessary to be read in connection with the observations that I am now engaged in making:

The canvass shall commence by taking out of the box the ballots unopened, (except so far as to ascertain whether each ballot is single,) and counting the same to ascertain whether the number of ballots corresponds with the number of names on the poll-books; and if two or more separate ballots are found so folded together as to present the appearance of a single ballot, they shall be laid aside until the count of the ballots is completed. Then, if upon a comparison of the said count with the number of names of electors on the poll-books it appears that the two ballots thus folded together were cast by the same elector they shall be destroyed. If the ballots in the ballot-box are still found to exceed the number of the names on the poll-books, then the whole of the ballots shall be replaced in the ballot-box; and after the same shall be well shaken, the conductor, or one of the judges of the election, being blindfolded, shall draw therefrom a sufficient number of ballots to reduce the same to a number equal to the number of names of electors on the poll-books.

After listening to that statute you can very well understand why it was that for the purpose of electing this famous readjuster, Mr. Mann, in Petersburgh, his ballot was one inch and seven-eighths of an inch long and three-fourths of an inch wide, and that Stowell's ticket being four and one-half inches long and two and one-half inches wide, being put in the same box, there was an over-vote, a large over-vote, and when they drew out all the ballots and examined them that were folded together and destroyed them, if they found any, and then they put them in the box and shook it well and they blindfolded one of the judges and he put his hand in the box and whether he drew the big ballot or the little one was a matter of taste and convenience to himself. That was the Petersburgh method, and at that time the honorable Senator from Virginia was a distinguished conservative democrat in that vicinity. Whether he had any connection with that I do not know. He knows. He was a friend of Mann, the man who was voted for. The republicans down there complained that in every ward in the city of Petersburgh in that election the number of ballots found in the boxes exceeded the number of names upon the poll-list by from fifty to two hundred votes. There was no difficulty about Mr. Mann's being elected on that occasion; he had no trouble in getting through. This was charged upon Mann by the republicans, not upon the Senator from Virginia; but after it had been charged upon him by the republicans, it is a remarkable thing that the republicans on that side of the House should be rejoicing over his conversion to readjustment and to republicanism.

The next election was for State senator in 1875, when William E. Hinton, a readjuster, and Colonel Robert Bolling were the candidates, a very important election for a very important office. The republicans and part of the democrats supported Bolling. Hinton received 2,483 votes and Bolling received 1,837 votes. And this same system was resorted to. It was then complained that the railroad company of which the Senator was president conveyed three hundred negroes out of the city of Petersburgh and so arranged that they could not get back to vote. I do not know whether that complaint is just or not. The republicans make it, and it is for them now to settle among themselves, as they have such a dear friend concerned, who is right and who is wrong about that business. That was a very violent contest. That was the very spring of readjusterism in that part of Virginia. It was then and there that party lines commenced to be drawn between the debt-payers and the readjusters in Virginia.

Mr. William E. Cameron in 1880 was one of the electors for the State at large on the independent readjuster ticket. Mr. Riddleberger and Mr. William E. Cameron were the two candidates of the readjuster party for the State at large on that electoral ticket. I desire now to call the attention of the Senate for the purpose of tracing along in the opinions of these various distinguished gentlemen who belong to the readjuster party their views on the subject of "a free ballot and a fair count," their views on the subject of negro domination, and their views also on the subject of repudiation; for you cannot accept Mr. MAHONE in your party and welcome him as you have done to your confidence without at the same time accepting and welcoming in the same degree every readjuster in Virginia with whom he was associated, and especially those who speak officially for him and for his party.

Now, I will read the readjuster electoral ticket for 1880:

RE-ADJUSTER TICKET.

Election, November 2d, 1880.

ELECTORS AT LARGE:

William E. Cameron,
H. H. Riddleberger.

DISTRICT ELECTORS:

1st District—Robert M. Mayo,
2d " William Lamb,
3d " John S. Wise,
4th " F. E. Buford,
5th " William Powell,
6th " Wyatt M. Elliott,
7th " S. Brown Allen,
8th " N. B. Meade,
9th " James C. Taylor.

FOR CONGRESS:

FOURTH DISTRICT,

JOSEPH JORGENSEN.

Jorgensen's name is on this ticket for Congress. Now, let us see what are Mr. Cameron's views on various topics. He was editor at one time of the Daily Index and afterward of the Evening Star, at Petersburgh. I will read an extract from his paper of February 19, 1869, on the subject of the debt of the United States, and perhaps we shall find out from that the root of this business, we shall find out from that the start of readjusterism, and we shall be able to ascertain by comparing views then and now whether readjusterism is important with respect to the treatment that it would bestow upon the public debt of the United States or any other debt. The heading of the article is "The national debt treated facetiously;" and it is:

The Tribune thus amuses itself over a proposition of one of its correspondents: "A correspondent gravely proposes the payment of our national debt by voluntary subscriptions. He probably supposes that a shinplaster collection some bright Sunday morning in the churches would suffice. Finally he suggests that we send him the Tribune a year or so, 'for this valuable idea.' We respectfully but most positively decline. Our plan for paying off the debt is only worth five cents, but that is five times as much as the cash value of any competitor. Its outlines are: 1. More workers, few idlers. 2. More productive industry and less gold and stock gambling. 3. Larger exports, or much smaller imports, or both. 4. More Federal revenue and less expenditure. 5. Begin to pay off the debt at once, and keep doing it so as to be able to fund our five-twenties at a lower rate of interest. We value these propositions at one cent each, not because they are not important but because they are so obvious that any honest, sensible person could have developed them as well as we have done."

Now says Mr. Cameron of the Index in commenting on that article in the Tribune:

It is gratifying to see Greeley, the friend of humanity, take the matter of our national debt so easily. It is gratifying to see the modest value which he places on his own plan for its liquidation—but modest as it is, it is half a dime too high. The real question before the people is not how to pay the debt, but how not to pay it. There is such a neat and expeditious way of getting rid of this intolerable burden altogether that to discuss the best means of carrying it further does seem like ludicrous trifling, no amount of which can have appreciable value. The debt must and will be repudiated.

I do not know how far Mr. Cameron, the elector for the State at large on the readjuster ticket, has had his opinions modified and reformed by association with the honorable Senator from Virginia, or how far they will be modified if he should associate long with that Senator in his alliance with the republicans in this Chamber; but his was a bad start for a debt-payer; and it was because the South had in its midst a few men like this who were blatant in forcing their views before the world that we have been accused of being repudiators, when we have, in fact, had to sacrifice all that man could find in his reach to make a sacrifice of in order to be able to countervail and counteract such sentiments as these.

At the time these contested and heated elections were held at Petersburgh Mr. Cameron was there working side by side in the harness with the honorable Senator from Virginia. In his issue of the Evening Star, of Petersburgh, of September 21, 1875, he says:

No people ever displayed a more noble endurance and determination than was put forth by the people of Petersburgh under the long black years of negro domination, and none ever made a more splendid exhibition of energetic resolution than that which they put forth in the spring of 1874, when with serried masses and unbroken tread they marched upon the despoilers and hurled them from the seats of power their ignorance and dishonesty had defiled.

That is a bad start for a readjuster who now professes to be so extraordinarily affectionate toward the negro race, and yet he was in 1880 a candidate for elector at large upon the Mahone ticket. On the 22d of September, 1875, he said this:

Others must act up to the conscience and light they possess; for ourselves we hold our older slogan: Fusion of the whites against the solid enmity of the blacks.

There is your color line drawn with a distinctness and energy that I have rarely seen excelled by the pen of any southern editor. October 1, 1875, he said:

We want no better reason for opposing Mr. Bolling than that the radicals and their negro followers support him. Is that not cause enough?

On October 5, 1875, he said:

It is one thing for the conservative organization, founded by white men for the protection of the whites, to accept the votes of negroes who believe that the intelligence of the Commonwealth should rule. It is quite another thing for men who seek the disruption of that organization and who rebel against its mandates to seek negro assistance to accomplish their purpose. It is one thing for a majority of white people to accept aid coming from any source. It is another and a distinct matter that a minority of the whites should rely on negro aid to overcome a majority of their own race.

On the 7th of October, 1875, in the same paper he said:

Yet to-day in Petersburgh, in Virginia, there are those willing to join hands with a crew who have only lacked opportunity to visit upon us the ills which their brethren have heaped mountain high upon the helpless people of less favored communities. Even here we have had experience enough to give us a foretaste of what to expect if the radicals ever achieve political supremacy.

On October 16, 1875, he said:

The independent programme as to radicalism: endure; then pity; then embrace. Do you want to break up the conservative ascendency in Petersburgh, and have negro policemen, and carpet-bag officials, and an irresponsible council, and colored teachers in the free schools?

On October 20, 1875, he said in the same paper:

And yet the Petersburgh bolters are willing to make a gap in the organization and to weaken its authority and prestige simply to overcome a candidate (Hunter) distasteful to a minority of the party here. Nay, more, they are willing to borrow negro assistance to accomplish the injury to the State. And yet they claim to be conservative and ask white men to vote with them.

On November 3, 1875, he said this:

For five years and everywhere the supremacy of the party sustained by these black people has invariably resulted in plunder, oppression, and social lowering of the intelligent and virtuous citizen over whom they had usurped control.

On November 5, 1875, he said:

Conservatives and negroes, a nice combination truly. Verily our former friends have "stooped to conquer." Richards and Van Auken will be very much disappointed on Tuesday night if it shall be found that Hunter has been elected. Such news as that will drive iron into the souls of the oppressors of our brethren, the feeders on our substance, and the persecutors of our registrars and judges. But all true conservatives will rejoice at it. Do the white people of Petersburgh wish to labor for the satisfaction of radical leaders?

I suppose, Mr. President, that that is a sufficient introduction of that gentleman as an elector for the State at large upon the Mahone ticket to give you an idea of the bond of union between him and the Senator from Virginia, and it will be enough to give this country an idea of the bond of union between you and the Senator from Virginia. You who profess to love the negro, you who profess to love "a free ballot and a fair count," you who profess to detest repudiation, now ally yourselves with him, not for the one vote of the honorable Senator in this Chamber, but because of the power that he is supposed to possess in the State of Virginia to carry another vote into this body. There is the bond of union between you—there is the platform.

Well, sir, it might well be supposed that editorials of that kind, coming from the leading readjuster paper in Petersburgh, would produce certain rough results, and it is no wonder to me that in the later elections in Petersburgh it is charged by the republicans that white men there belonging to the readjuster party had invaded every precinct in Petersburgh and violently torn the books from the hands of the book-holders of the republican party, the Jorgensen men, those who were there to guard the ballot-box and who had made memoranda for the purpose of preventing the voting of tissue ballots. Why, sir, it is perfectly well known in Virginia that Petersburgh is the very nest of this tissue-ballot business. I will not make charges and accusations upon my own knowledge as to matters of which I do not know anything personally, but I will say this: I have before me a paper which shows that the honorable Senator from Virginia was the president of the congressional club in Petersburgh and for that district, and the republicans charged that while he was the president of that club, and while that club had the issuing of the tickets, the ballot-boxes of that district were stuffed with tissue ballots.

I must suppose, of course, that the president of that club was entirely ignorant of this business; otherwise this enlightened and excellent body of gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber would never have received him with open arms, at the same time boasting that they did so because he was not a man who was willing to tolerate tissue ballots or any other interruption of the ballot or of the honest making of a fair count. I give you republican complaints; I do not know what they are worth, but the whole air was full of them.

Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Ohio found one other reason why we were to be exposed to anything that he saw proper to do or say about us without respect to law or morals, and that was included in the important fact that he took the liberty of calling us "Bourbon democrats." Some Senator, I believe it was the honorable Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE,] remarked that he had no use for a democrat that had to have a surname or handle to his name. Throughout the length and breadth of this great land, where we divide great States with you, like New York, by a very few thousand votes, and others by a very few hundred votes, and where the total vote between the two parties is divided by less than three thousand difference, I believe—throughout all this land those who belong to the political alliance call themselves democrats. They are not new-light democrats, or independent democrats, or anything else but the men who rally under that great creed which has stood as the monument of the democratic party in the history of this country from its foundation down to the present time. Yet the Senator from Ohio seems to delight in calling all these millions Bourbon democrats.

What is a "Bourbon democrat?"

The Senator from Ohio employs Talleyrand's celebrated witicism to describe us as "democrats who learn nothing and forget nothing." We cheerfully accept his definition, and would be glad if he enjoyed the honor of having been its author. There is at least an idea of integrity in such a character, though it may better become a fool than a wise man. That is a better character after all than that of a man who is wiser in his day and generation than the children of light, "who is all things to all men" that he may win men to the republican party, or than that of the man who is ready to be won to any party in order that he may make unto himself "friends of the Mammon of unrighteousness."

The complaint that we learn nothing is just when it is made in connection with the fact that we have not been willing to adopt the discoveries in the art of government which the republicans have made in the last twenty years. I rejoice that there are some new inventions of radicalism which we cannot be schooled into adopting:

1. We cannot be taught that there is a power in this country higher than the Constitution.

2. We cannot understand that the oaths we took to support the Constitution are relieved when we come in view of a party necessity which cannot be fulfilled without the abrogation of the Constitution.

3. We cannot comprehend that any burden can justly be laid on the people that mere party success may require.

4. In our ignorance we cannot believe that the offices were not created for the service of the people, whose money is gathered by tax collectors for their support, but for the purpose of rewarding the henchmen and retainers of political barons who claim the perpetual lease of power, and the right to use the offices to perpetuate their hold upon it.

5. To our stupidity it is incomprehensible that any man has the right to trample out the rights of another without his being afforded constitutional redress.

6. We dread to believe that the Army is the proper custodian of the ballot, or the proper judge of the elections.

7. In the innocence of our reverence for what we consider the sheet-anchor of our liberties we spurn the doctrine that the judicial department must prejudge the elections of Senators and members of the House, and also the officers of State governments, and so destroy constitutional rights reserved to the legislative department by employing its deputies to visit the polls and there to decide, without appeal, who shall vote and what votes shall be counted.

8. We take alarm at the suggestion that the great corporations of the land, in addition to their valuable and exclusive privileges and immunities, shall also enjoy the monopoly of every product in every market in the country, and price the toil of the people at arbitrary sums.

9. In the name of the fathers of constitutional government we repel the thought that States, as well as men, may be disfranchised at the will of Congress.

10. Our convictions and sentiments are in arms against the horrible heresy that the judiciary is to be used as a mere machine of party politics, and that judges shall be appointed only because of the distinction they have won in the most disreputable employment of mere partisanship.

11. With shame and disgust we feel that we are to be made unwilling witnesses to the fact that fraud and corruption are the canonized saints of the political calendar, and when they are carried in the procession of the saints every knee must bow and every tongue be silent, except to say "Thy will be done."

12. We protest in the name of the people whose love of justice still survives that it is false that either citizens or Senators are worthy to be charged with treason who speak against or vote against the power of a bare majority surreptitiously gained and used for the abuse of the right of any State, without constraint or interference by Congress, to express its free and untrammeled voice in the selection of its representatives to this body or the other House.

The Bourbon democracy are incapable of learning that either of these twelve capital sins, which comprise the leading features of the creed of this readjusted radical republican party, are worthy of their adoption so long as they are recognized as free American citizens. So much for our capacity to learn the new teachings of the readjusted radical party.

It is said we can forget nothing. Would to God that we could forget some things. We can forgive, and in our hearts we have forgiven much, but when God made man in His image he did not make him to forget!

Coming to the time when the republican party really crystallized in its present organization—in the year 1865—and going back no further, what is it in connection with the history of the Government under the control of that party that we are required to forget?

The mighty compass of the historian's field of inquiry will never embrace a tittle of the horrible wrongs we have been compelled to endure and are now required to forget.

Not speaking of the South, but of the whole country, its Constitution, its laws, and its traditions, let us recur to a few of the leading crimes of the radical party against all of these, of which we are never to speak or to think except upon pain of being denounced as traitors and stigmatized as Bourbons.

I could occupy hours and days in the simple recital of the crimes committed under the guise of reconstruction; but on the 16th of January last I had the honor to speak before the Senate on this subject, in a very imperfect manner, it is true, but sufficiently to outline the sufferings of the South under that system, and to draw the attention of the inquirer to the disastrous effects of that policy upon the States of the North. No reply has been considered necessary to what I then said, and I let it stand until there is some attempt at denial or explanation of the facts I then brought forward. Froude, in his admirable sketch of Julius Cæsar, says that the attempt of the Roman Republic (in a somewhat similar manner) to govern its dependencies necessarily converted the republic into an empire, for the reason that no free constitutional government can rule subject States and provinces without the entire discredit of the principles on which it is founded. The freedom of the government means the freedom of the governed; when the governed are free the people must govern themselves, and to do this they must be relatively and proportionately equal in the rights, powers, and privileges which the government is ordained to establish and protect.

The reconstruction measures violated these laws of political economy, and this violation was almost as dangerous to the governing States as it was to the States that were governed. They exasperated the people of the subject States, and covered them with the shame of degradation from an eminent position of honor and power to so low a condition that to call them States was an insulting mockery, while they encouraged the governing States in assumption of power that made them dangerously arrogant. It was after the governing States under republican lead had first felt the intoxication of unrestrained power and the first imperial triumph over conquered sister States had purpled their history with imperial crime that the real purpose and mission of the republican party began fully to reveal itself. In its career of wild debauchery it made a history that democrats cannot forget even under the pain of being stigmatized with the fearful epithet of "Bourbon." Let us recall a few of the remembrances that time can never efface:

1. We cannot forget that the States were coerced to adopt the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, but we faithfully remember them to keep their commandments.

2. We cannot forget in the South that in doing this we were compelled to dishonor our dead in their graves and our living heroes who had nothing left worth living for but the honor they had won by their sufferings in a cause that we believed was right and worthy of the holiest sacrifice.

3. We cannot forget to thank you for the high consideration you have bestowed on the "lost cause" by receiving with open arms Mosby and Longstreet and MAHONE, none of whom have breathed a sigh for forgiveness for what you have always alleged was treason and rebellion. They have never recanted or repented, and are to-day what they were twenty years ago, "rebels and traitors," if there were ever any such in the South.

In their persons the whole southern people stand vindicated by your voluntary act; and in conferring honors on them you inflict upon yourselves the reproach of having slandered and abused them and us for twenty years. We hope that Mr. Garfield will not prove himself so intensely a Bourbon as not to be able now to reverse his statement that he would never shake hands across the bloody chasm, or any other chasm, with an unrepentant and unpardoned rebel. It is due to surrounding circumstances that he should yield that harsh declaration to the softer sentiment now pervading the republican side of the Senate. He required repentance and an open confession of treason as a condition of his reconciliation to the rebel traitors of the South, while you are willing that a Harry Hotspur of the rebel brigadiers shall strut out on the floor of the Senate and shake his fingers in your faces while he ejaculates his defiance in your ears that he should never recant or apologize for anything; provided he will make promises not of future repentance but of "good works" in bringing back to you again the scepter of absolute power you so much love to wield.

4. We cannot forget that you attempted to impeach Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, because he held the Constitution to be of higher authority than your imperious will, and attempted to protect the States and the people against your cruel demand for their immolation; and that you ignominiously failed.

5. We cannot forget that you made war upon a peaceful and prostrate people after they had surrendered; that by arms you destroyed their chartered rights and common law inheritance of liberty, violated the sanctuary of their homes, violated their rights of personal security, despoiled them of their goods, and confiscated their lands, decitizenized them by ex post facto laws as to their rights of voting, holding office, and sitting as jurors in the courts, after you had invited their assistance and they had given it in so amending the Constitution of the United States as to destroy three thousand millions of property, much of which they had purchased from you and paid you for.

6. We cannot forget how you entered peaceful States with your armies and with the bayonet drove out every officer, high and low, that had been elected by the people and qualified according to law, and filled their places with appointees who were selected by military commanders and commissioned by adjutant-generals; how you assembled Legislatures with the drum calls of military corps, selected their membership by the assistance of armed sentinels at the doors of State capitols, purged out such as were of doubtful politics by the aid of provost guards, and disbanded and dispersed entire legislative bodies when their presence was inconvenient to the military authorities. We remember, yes, we cannot forget, that while the Constitution provides that the military shall be subordinate to the civil power the republican party has reversed these grand utterances, and has not hesitated to make the military the ruling power whenever it suited their purposes.

7. We cannot forget the ruin and desolation of a beautiful land under the hot scourge of republican hate, which, like a sirocco, swept across its bosom scorching, withering, blasting, uprooting, and destroying the works of its people, leaving them not even the means of subsistence. We cannot forget the anguish of the innocent, the sufferings of the old and helpless, or the indignation of the strong and youthful who had laid down their arms to accept an honorable allegiance, only to find that it was the chains of slavery and the badge of degradation, and not the bonds of fraternity, which they had been deceived into fastening upon their limbs.

8. We cannot forget our debt of gratitude to many republicans of the North and to the Bourbon democracy of the North for its sympathy for us in those years of persecution and calamity which followed the surrender to military power. We cannot forget such men as Seymour and Greeley and Hancock, for whom we voted as northern men, as men opposed to all our views which led to and resulted in the great civil war, but who were true to the Constitution when it stood for our protection, after we had surrendered, as they were true to the cause and the armies that restored the whole country to its sway.

9. We cannot forget that the republican party under the lead of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] by a single act of Congress increased the burden of the public debt by more than six hundred millions of dollars, and by demonetizing silver took from the people at least one-fourth of their power to carry that heavy burden, and struck down the most important industry of the times—the production of silver from our great mines. Who can forget the terrible impoverishment of the people, and the enormous increase of wealth in the hands of the favored few whose servants the Congress became?

10. We have not forgotten the Santo Domingo business, or the Pacific mail subsidy, or the Leet and Stocking frauds, or the millions squandered in the Navy Department on the Secors and Catletts, and on a nest of procurers.

11. We have not forgotten Black Friday, or the fact that it lifted Fisk and Corbin into great wealth and Jay Gould into a position where he is more powerful to-day than the President, while it sunk thousands of worthy and innocent men, women, and children into poverty and wretchedness.

12. We have not forgotten that the republican party in the twenty years of its rule has granted to railroads out of the public domain 291,758 square miles of land, worth at the average of $2.50 per acre more than $700,000,000, embracing an area larger than the thirteen States of Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, Indiana, Maryland, Delaware, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Vermont, Maine, and New Hampshire.

13. We have not forgotten Babcock, or McDonald, Joyce, McKee, or Avery, and the whisky ring, which for a time seemed to have more power than the Government.

14. We have not forgotten Belknap and the post-traderships, the Indian ring, the moth swindle, or the Sanborn frauds.

15. We have not forgotten the Freedman's Bank, or the robbery of the negroes of their little savings throughout the country. The Credit Mobilier and the illustrious names connected historically with that infamy are not lost to memory, nor will they ever escape the contempt of the Bourbon democrat.

16. We have not forgotten Durell and his midnight order to arrest the Legislature of Louisiana, or the military and naval expeditions prepared in advance to support it.

17. We have not forgotten the "free ballot and the fair count" of the Louisiana returning boards. All who participated in that scheme, in whatever capacity, on the side of the republican party, have had their names and memory perpetuated on the pay-rolls of a grateful country; and the Eliza Pinkstons and the Agnes Jenkses and the James E. Andersons and Don Webers are to live, as parasites live and flourish, on the decaying trunks of some of the sturdiest reputations in the history of the times.

18. We have not forgotten the great electoral commission or its work. It does not require a Bourbon's memory to keep alive the sad and disgraceful memory of that act, by which millions of free ballots were annulled by a false count and the sovereign voice of a constitutional majority, first of the people and then of the electors appointed by their votes, was reversed and held for naught.

It is because we have not accepted the doctrines and methods of the republican party, to some of which I have referred, as substitutes for the doctrines and methods of the Constitution; and because we cannot forget the history of that party, a portion of which I have adverted to, that the Senator from Ohio has seen fit to ascend to what he seems to consider the very climax of eloquent denunciation, and to stigmatize us as Bourbon democracy.

Let me say to the Senator that we prefer the ignorance of Jefferson, Madison, and Jackson to the wisdom of Thad. Stevens, Durell, and J. Madison Wells, and we prefer to remember the wrongs done to our country as a means of avoiding such painful experiences in the future, rather than to slumber in forgetfulness in the lap of the Delilah of the republican party, from which we can only arise when we have been shorn of all strength and are ready to be treacherously delivered into the hands of the destroyer.

For one I must say that I feel that the rights, liberties, and prosperity of the people of Alabama are as safe in the keeping of the thirty-seven Bourbon democrats on this side of the Chamber as they would be in the hands of the best thirty-seven men, including the readjusters, who were ever found or will be found hereafter in the ranks of the republican party. I am proud of the association with these thirty-seven Bourbon democrats, not one of whom has ever attempted to sustain a fraud or an outrage against the rights of the people, or has ever failed to lend his assistance to the preservation of their constitutional rights.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, at the end of what was known or must now be classed as the war of the rebellion because it was unsuccessful, the Government of the United States was in the hands and under the control of the republican party, and I admit they had very difficult problems to deal with in reorganizing the machinery of government and putting it into operation again. Whether they dealt wisely or unwisely has been a question for the people to determine and is yet a question of debate. They thought proper to pass what were termed the reconstruction bills into laws. Those acts disfranchised and drove from the ballot-box, in the elections for the conventions that were to form constitutions for the southern people to live under, probably two hundred thousand of the most intelligent, cultivated, and educated people of the South, including all persons who had ever taken an oath in any office to support the Constitution of the United States and had afterward in any way whatever aided the war of the rebellion. I fell in that class, and I stood by and saw my negroes, or those that had been mine, vote in the election for members of the convention who were to form a constitution under which I was to live while I was excluded from the polls. There may have been—I do not say there was not—"a fair count" then, but there was not a very "free ballot." It was free, however, to all the males of the colored race who were twenty-one years of age and upward. They all had the right to come to the ballot-box and exercise the suffrage; I think they were generally there.

At a subsequent period, however, the grave question arose as to whether these mere acts of Congress were enough on this subject, and it was found by the republican party that it was necessary to propose a constitutional amendment that would guarantee to all persons, without regard to race, color, or previous condition of servitude, equal rights at the ballot-box.

These measures were regarded very hard measures by the people of the South. I thought so; but having taken part in what is to be termed the rebellion, I recognized the Government of the United States as my conqueror, and when these terms were dictated I acquiesced in them and advised my people to do so, and I think they committed an error—but there is a difference of opinion about that—in not promptly accepting those terms. I think the mistake we made when you put the suffrage into the hands of the colored race was that we indicated displeasure at it. The colored people were our friends, and we were their friends; but when our people—and it was the most natural thing on earth that they should have taken the course under all the circumstances—thought proper to make an issue on this question; and the carpet-bagger—and by that term I do not mean the northern man who came South for any honest purpose, but the man who could not have been elected constable in Massachusetts or Ohio, who came down to the South simply for the purpose of taking charge of the colored people and securing their support for the promotion of his ambition or his interest—when the carpet-bagger took our former slaves into the out-houses or school-houses at night and swore them into the Union Leagues, they were taught to believe that on that question our people were not their friends; and it was probably very natural that they followed this class of northern men who said to them, "The Government of the United States has given you the right of suffrage and we are here to see that you have it."

At that day I took position for absolute acquiescence in the reconstruction measures, and in the dictation of my conqueror. I said the terms were hard, but I believed it was better to accept them promptly; I recognized your power to dictate them, and I thereupon, after the passage of the fifteenth amendment, took position for "a free ballot and a fair count" in Georgia and all over the South, and I have stood there from that day to this, and I stood there at a time when, to say the least, it was a matter of some inconvenience to a man to stand there.

My friend on my left asks, where did the Senator from Virginia stand? I understand him to ask where did the new republican Senator from Virginia then stand? I do not know. I was noticing Georgia matters then more than Virginia matters; but I had always been under the impression that he stood with the democracy at the time when I temporarily separated myself from them upon that issue, and that he then voted with those opposed to the reconstruction measures.

Times have changed. The past year I entered the Senate under an executive appointment. There were those in Georgia to whom that appointment was very distasteful and, as I stated the other day, there were popular demonstrations in two or three counties against the governor of the State for having tendered me that appointment. The governor appealed to the people upon that issue, and I appealed to them also, and announced myself a candidate for election to the Senate of the United States. What was the result? Two democrats ran for the office of governor; both planted themselves fairly and squarely on the line of "a free ballot and a fair count," and I think I may say with perfect propriety that at no time in any State in this Union has there been a fairer election or a fairer count. No one has complained, so far as I have heard, of either party, that anybody was excluded from the polls who had a right to come there, or that there was coercion, or that there was any unfairness of any character. Members of the Legislature were elected in the same manner; and when the Legislature met, standing as I did before them as a democratic candidate for the United States Senate, I received a majority of more than two-thirds of the Legislature; every republican in the body and nearly two-thirds of the democratic members voted for me.

Then I affirm in the Senate Chamber to-day that the democracy of Georgia stand fairly and squarely upon the doctrine of "a free ballot and a fair count," and that they practice it. My colleague has announced the same doctrine. There is no division among us on that question, and it is not probable that there can ever again be such a division. All that is said in reference to any unfairness in elections there, or any disposition on the part of the democracy of that State to drive from the ballot-box any one entitled to vote, is gratuitous and unfounded.

The honorable Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] in his very able and eloquent speech, the other day, on the republican side of this Chamber, said:

> The South, the solid South, declares that the fifteenth amendment is a failure, that it cannot be executed in letter and spirit.

I deny it. With all due respect to my honorable friend I say the South, the solid South, occupies no such ground, and takes no such position. There is no place on the face of the earth to-day in any civilized government where there is a freer ballot; and there is no question about it that the fifteenth amendment is acknowledged to be binding, and in practice that it is faithfully carried out. The same honorable Senator said:

> I come back to the great fact which you, sir, and I, and every man in this land must accept, and may as well make up his mind this hour to accept, now and hereafter, that universal suffrage is the law of the world of late, and is the irreversible law of this Republic to-day.

I deny that, too. Universal suffrage is not the law of the world at present, and never was, nor is it the law of any civilized government in the world. Universal suffrage is not the law of this Republic to-day, and never has been. I admit it is manhood suffrage in most of the Southern States, and each male citizen, twenty-one years of age, without regard to race, color, or previous condition of servitude, may go to the polls and vote; but it is not the law of Connecticut; it is not the law of Massachusetts, and it is not the law of Rhode Island.

Senators from those States have said and said properly that the States have a right for themselves to regulate this question. That they have a right to say what restrictions or qualifications shall be put upon suffrage, I admit; and much as State rights may have trailed in the dust, and much as they may have been overridden and downtrodden, I am glad to see Massachusetts and the other New England States come up and take the lead in the affirmance of that doctrine. I desire to do no injustice to your States. As I have already said on this floor, I admire your industry, I admire your thrift, I admire your enterprise, I especially admire your educational systems, your colleges, your universities, all that you have done for the civilization of the country and of the age in which we live. I admit that you are a great people, and that you are a powerful people; but while that is true, and you have ample time to attend to your own business and do it well, I think you appropriate a little too much of your time in attention to other people's business. Now if you would only be content that other people of other States exercise the same privileges and rights that you claim for yourselves on that subject, to regulate this question for themselves, and if you would be content for us to carry out an important principle of the constitution of Massachusetts—I do not say whether a wise one or not—probably we should all get along better. In the constitution of Massachusetts I find this language:

> Wisdom and knowledge as well as virtue diffused generally among the body of the people being necessary for the preservation of their rights and liberties; and as these depend on spreading the opportunities and advantages of education, in the various parts of the country, and among the different orders of the people, it shall be the duty of the Legislatures and magistrates in all future periods of this Commonwealth to cherish the interests of literature, and the sciences, and all seminaries of learning, &c.—Constitution of Massachusetts, chapter 5.

Here you lay down the doctrine that wisdom, knowledge, and virtue diffused generally among the body of the people are necessary to the rights and liberties of the people. If you had permitted us to apply that rule in the South we should have had less difficulty. You have put upon us by your legislation an immense mass of ignorant voters. They have not wisdom, they have not knowledge, some of them even have no virtue, as is the case in every community. These are not diffused among them; from the very nature of the case it cannot be; and yet how anxiously you guard their rights to go to the polls to make laws for us and to regulate our affairs. You have, it may be wisely or unwisely, excluded them from the polls in your States. They must have something of this wisdom, something of this knowledge, something of this virtue there, before you permit them to go to your polls. Why? Because I presume you are not willing to trust your rights, your liberties, your property, all that is dear to you, the very organization of society itself, in the hands of the more ignorant and less virtuous part of your people. And in order to protect yourselves there and protect your property, what have you been compelled to do? You have in carrying out that very idea I admit—I wish to do you no injustice—placed a wall of constitutional steel between the men who would exercise manhood suffrage in Georgia and excluded and driven them from the ballot-box. Your constitution says that no male citizen shall vote until he can read your constitution in the English language and write his name. Your constitution and your laws further say—I do not remember whether that is a constitutional or statutory provision, and I will not misrepresent it—that he must have resided twelve months in your State, if he is a citizen coming in from another State, before he can vote; he must have paid a tax assessed against him within the last two years, and he must be neither a pauper nor under guardianship.

Now, what is a pauper in your State? I have not found the direct definition, because I may not be as familiar with your laws as I ought to be with our own, but I have found a description of a pauper, as I suppose, correctly, where it is provided who may enter an almshouse, and I there find this designation:

> Paupers in Massachusetts are poor and indigent persons who are maintained by or receive alms from city or town; who, being able of body to work, and not having estate or means otherwise to maintain themselves, refuse or neglect to work; who live a dissolute, vagrant life, and exercise no ordinary calling or lawful business; who spend their time and property in public houses, to the neglect of their proper business; or who, by otherwise misspending what they earn, to the impoverishment of themselves and families, are likely to become chargeable to the city, &c.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. BROWN. I will permit a reply after I am through; but I prefer not to be interrupted.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. BROWN. I decline to yield. If I misstate any matter connected with Massachusetts the Senator will have a fair opportunity to correct me when he gets the floor. I do not state that this is the definition of a pauper; I only find that to get into the Massachusetts alms-house—and that is where a pauper generally goes—these seem to be the qualifications. But at least there is a class of people there who are known as paupers. It will not be denied. Now, whether that is the correct definition of a pauper or not, certainly all who fall within the correct definition of a pauper are excluded from the ballot-box. There may be many or there may be few. But they are an excluded class.

Then, in reference to spendthrifts. There is a class of persons, as I understand, in Massachusetts who are spendthrifts, as is the case in every community, unfortunately. You have a provision, probably a very wise one, there, for appointing guardians for those spendthrifts. The word "spendthrift," as your law-books, I believe, say, includes every one who is liable to be put under guardianship on account of excessive drinking, gaming, idleness, or debauchery, and who spends his property in these vices. I suppose you execute your laws faithfully, and if you do, all those who indulge in drink to excess, or indulge in gambling to excess, or in idleness to excess, or in debauchery to excess, and thereby misspend their property, are under guardianship as spendthrifts, and they, too, are driven from the ballot-box in Massachusetts; it is doubtless a good long list. There may not be many paupers. I may be wrong and the Senators may be right, and they will correct that if necessary when the proper time comes, in reference to the class of persons I have been referring to as paupers, but you certainly have some paupers. If you did not have them you would not make the exception in the statute and say they should not come to the ballot-box; you certainly have a class of spendthrifts that you have provided guardians for, and they are embraced under your statute with persons who indulge in the vices already stated——

Mr. HOAR. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. BROWN. I prefer not to be interrupted now. If I have the wrong page, or the wrong statute, then I still plant myself on the other statute which gives the correct definition, not being as familiar with the Massachusetts laws as the Massachusetts lawyers are. You do have a class of people who are spendthrifts, who are driven from the ballot-box; you do have a class of people who are paupers who are driven from the ballot-box—I do not say how many there are; you do have a class of people who have not been twelve months in your State who were voters in other States before they come there; you do have a class of people who if they have not paid their tax are driven from the ballot-box; you do have a class of people who cannot write their names and are therefore driven from the ballot-box; you do have another class of people who cannot read the constitution of Massachusetts in the English language and therefore they are driven from the ballot-box. There is quite a numerous list of disqualified classes.

Now, on the principle laid down a little while ago that the people of Massachusetts and New England, being a thrifty people, whom I admire very much, with, as already stated, ample time to attend to their business and a good degree of time to attend to other people's, I incline to think that you have attended pretty well to your part of it in excluding classes that you think might be dangerous to your institutions at home from the ballot-box. I do not know how many there are excluded; I have to be governed by the statement of others on that subject, for I am not familiar with the state of things there. I can form an estimate, however, from the data at my command. I read from a speech delivered by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] during the last session of Congress, who is apt to be very accurate, I believe, and I suppose very good authority on that side of the House. He says:

> A distinguished citizen of Massachusetts has declared that the tax and educational qualifications in that State disfranchised a hundred thousand of its inhabitants, fifty times as many as the census returns render as disqualified by the real-estate qualification in Rhode Island. This gentleman estimates that, by the enforcement of the fourteenth amendment, the representation of Massachusetts would be reduced from eleven to eight.

That is taken from the statement made by the Senator from Rhode Island in this Chamber during the last session of Congress. I do not know whether he was right or not. I have so much admiration for his character and for his accuracy that I will not dispute the point with him; I will take it for granted that the Senator from Rhode Island was right and that he believed that the estimate made by this distinguished citizen of Massachusetts was not very far wrong, or he would not have introduced it here in his argument. If that be true, then there are 100,000 of the male citizens of Massachusetts over twenty-one years of age who are barred out by the constitutional inclosure that you have put around your ballot-box, and cannot go to it; they cannot approach its sacred precincts. But the number may not be 100,000; that distinguished citizen of Massachusetts may have been in error. I heard that question canvassed somewhat the other day when the honorable Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] was discussing this question. I think there it came down to the point, if I recollect correctly, where you admitted in round numbers 18,000 of your citizens of foreign birth and native born who are excluded from the ballot-box on account of their inability to read and write as required by your constitution and laws. That is my recollection of it. Eighteen thousand is a good round number to be driven from the ballot-box.

All this, as I have stated, may be entirely necessary in your opinion for the protection of your property and your rights and for the preservation of your State institutions; and I am not assailing your right on that point; but I only say that there is probably no State in the Union that has so many qualifications on the right of suffrage, and probably none that bars so many of the male citizens of twenty-one years of age and upward from the polls. It is true, as the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] stated a few days ago, that the provision of the constitution in reference to reading and writing did not apply to those who were voters at the time it was adopted; but that has been about twenty-three years ago; so that I suppose those who were then voters have in a great measure passed away, and it does apply to much the greater portion now.

Just in that connection let me state another fact. You are very exacting about the right of the negro to vote in the South. If my State to-morrow were to apply the rule of suffrage that is applied in Massachusetts to the colored people of Georgia, we should drive more than eight-tenths of the whole number from the polls. Take the colored citizens of Georgia to-day over twenty-one years of age and let them move to Massachusetts, as they have a right to do, because they are entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of citizens in the several States—let them locate in Massachusetts, and you drive eight-tenths of them from the polls, and will not let them vote. Why? Because they cannot read the constitution of your State in the English language, and they cannot write their names; and therefore it is very well to give the negroes of the South the right of manhood suffrage and to insist upon it, but it will not do in Massachusetts. I do not know how many of the colored race there are there that are disfranchised. All who come within any of the exceptions I have mentioned are, however.

But I say, take the southern colored men and transfer their citizenship to Massachusetts, and as they have had no chance to learn to read and write, if they were there now, as they cannot labor for their living and learn, indeed many of them are not trying to do it, they would be driven from the polls there by scores and hundreds and thousands. We have but a single qualification with us, and that is the tax qualification, which you have. We turn none away for any other cause, unless they be insane persons or convicted felons, and most of the Southern States do not even have that qualification.

Mr. DAWES. How much is that?

Mr. BROWN. There is a small number. If there were one hundred in the last gubernatorial election in Georgia excluded from the polls in consequence of the non-payment of the tax I have never heard of it, and I do not believe there were so many.

There is another point I will notice, Mr. President. All this ado about suffrage has but one object: it is to try to republicanize the South by the use of the negro. We might as well deal plainly about the facts. Let us examine the negro question a little. You did not enter into the war for the purpose of setting the negro free. He is not indebted to any of your good intentions at the time you entered the struggle for his freedom. You distinctly proclaimed to the world that that was not one of the objects even of making war on the Southern States. The reason given, and no doubt the one you meant at the time, was the preservation of the Union and the execution of the laws. Within a day or two after the battle of Bull Run you saved the Border States to your cause, greatly to our regret at the time, by passing almost a unanimous resolution of both Houses here, the purport of which was that it was not your object in waging war to make conquest or to interfere with the institutions of the Southern States. Had you not done so, you could neither have carried Maryland nor Kentucky nor Missouri with you, and the termination of the struggle might have been different.

Then you were not making war for the benefit of the negro. And near the end of the struggle, on a very noted occasion, after Mr. Lincoln as a necessary war measure had issued his proclamation of emancipation, at Hampton Roads conference as recorded by Mr. Stephens in the second volume of his history of the war between the States, at a time when all the parties except Mr. Lincoln were in life—and I have never seen its correctness denied—Mr. Lincoln indicated very clearly to the southern commissioners that while he would take back nothing of his proclamation it was a doubtful question to be left to the courts whether anybody was set free except the negroes who had fallen within your lines and had taken part with you; in other words, whether the emancipation applied to the colored people within our lines. He even went so far in the kindness of his heart and the generosity of his nature—and probably no man ever had more of either—as to indicate his willingness that $400,000,000 be paid to southern slaveholders for their slaves if peace could then be restored. Mr. Seward is reported as having said at the time that he would be willing that an amount as large as the balance of the necessary expenditure in the prosecution of the war should be paid for the negroes. It is true the confederate government did not accept those terms, nor were they tendered in an authoritative shape, but only spoken of in the conversation as terms that might be agreed upon if the war could then cease. But I refer to these facts to show that the great object of the war, even up to the close of it, was not the emancipation of the negroes. It was, as Mr. Lincoln had said, the restoration of the Union and the execution of the laws.

As another evidence that Mr. Stephens has not mistaken this matter, in his place in the House of Representatives on a noted occasion, the uncovering of F. B. Carpenter's picture, February 12, 1878, he used these remarks and I have not seen them challenged:

> Emancipation was not the chief object of Mr. Lincoln in issuing the proclamation. His chief object, the ideal to which his whole soul was devoted, was the preservation of the Union. Let not history confuse events. That proclamation, pregnant as it was with coming events, initiative as it was of ultimate emancipation, still originated in point of fact more from what was deemed the necessities of war than from any pure humanitarian view of the matter. Life is all a mist, and in the dark our fortunes meet us.

That has not been challenged. Therefore I take it that Mr. Lincoln even near the end of the war when he was holding the Hampton Roads conference did not make the emancipation a sine qua non. He had other objects in his mind. Providence set the colored man free and not the Government of the United States. You did not expect it, and we did not expect it when we entered into the contest; but God in His mercy and in His benign providence interfered and struck the shackles from the hands of the race and made them free, and I am glad to-day that it is so; I was not then.

What was your next step? You did not apply to the Southern States the rule of the Massachusetts constitution, that wisdom and knowledge and virtue diffused generally among the people were necessary to the preservation of their rights and liberties. You did not apply the Massachusetts rule of suffrage to the Southern States. Instead of doing that, as already stated, in the election for delegates who were to form our constitutions you disfranchised the great mass of southern intelligence, and you turned all the negro males of twenty-one years and upward loose to the polls. I do not say it was not wise for you to adopt the rule you did for your home government, but if it was wise in Massachusetts, was it unwise to do it in Georgia? You may say that the South had been in rebellion, and that that made a difference. I give you all the benefit of that. Possibly you were justified to some extent in applying a different rule, but was it not your natural expectation, and should it not have been the understanding of every one, that when the colored race were given the ballot for their own protection, if you saw they needed it for that, that they should then be left to the usual rules applied to other citizens?

I want to be candid and intend to be; I admit that there were outrages soon after the close of the war. I only wonder there had not been more. Look at the situation. A proud, wealthy people had entered into a contest in which they had been conquered and had lost probably a greater amount of property than almost any other people of like number ever lost in a war, coming out at the end of it almost destitute, with brothers, fathers, husbands, the cause they had been attached to, lost; everything lost. Then the conqueror dictated terms of the character I have mentioned, taking the slaves, without education, and placing them over us, driving us from the ballot-box and turning them loose to it. Was it wonderful that we thought this upheaval was sapping the very foundations of society? And was it wonderful, under these circumstances, that there should have been restlessness, that there should have been Ku Klux, that there should have been every effort to try to maintain something like society organized under the usual rules that apply in other States?

But that day has passed. There were outrages; I admit it; now there is as free a ballot as there is in any State in this Union. It has taken years to reach it. There are still outrages that may occur there (not in reference to the ballot, however) as there may occur outrages in Massachusetts or in any other State; but we execute the laws there, and we are for disposing of the Ku Klux in any manner that is necessary to apply the remedy if they should raise their heads again. Only last year, near Cochran, Georgia—the case went the rounds in the newspapers—not with any view to politics, as we understand there, but on account of some grudge that some unworthy men had against a very worthy, steady, clever old colored man, they put on their masks and they surrounded his cabin at night with arms in their hands, and demanded that he deliver himself up. He had a double-barreled gun, it was loaded, he was a good shot, he aimed well, and he fired both barrels and killed one at each fire; and there they lay in his yard the next morning with their masks on. His course was applauded by all the white people of Georgia, so far as I know; the newspapers commented favorably on it, and expressed the hope that it might always be so when desperadoes gathered around the home of the humblest colored or white man at night; and I hope such may be the fate of all who may attempt it. He was never even arrested; there was nothing done with him, no legal steps were taken against him whatever; I do not know that he remained in the community, but everybody said he did right. It may have been that he was afraid to remain on account of the revenge possibly of the friends of those who had been killed; he probably thought it prudent to move from there, as it would have been in Massachusetts under similar circumstances, but his act met the approval of the people of Georgia. In a county of Upper Georgia, on account of a Ku Klux outrage, three men were convicted on circumstantial evidence of being guilty, and sent to the penitentiary.

Outrages have occurred in Massachusetts. I remember years ago that the whole country was shocked by a report that a highly cultivated man there, a man occupying a high position—I refer to Dr. Webster—had for a paltry sum, probably two or three hundred dollars, killed his fellow-man, a man of good standing in society, and to conceal him had even mutilated the body and attempted to dissolve it by lime and other chemicals.

Mr. DAWES. And he was hung for it.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator says he was hung for it. I was going to give you full credit for that; but I want to draw a comparison between that and a case that occurred in Georgia at a much later period. You executed the law, I grant, and you did right. Some three or four years ago, in Floyd County, Georgia, in which is the city of Rome, a man named Johnson, of one of the best families of our State, a young man, reckless and somewhat dissipated, killed a young negro boy under circumstances of very decided cruelty. He was put upon his trial. All the influence of family and otherwise that could reasonably be brought to bear was brought in his favor and able counsel defended him. The jury found him guilty. Strong appeals were made by strong family influences to the governor to commute the sentence or pardon him. He refused, and as your man did in Massachusetts, he atoned for his offense on the gallows; he was hanged by the neck until he was dead. Yes, you execute your criminal laws where one white man kills another. So do we, and we execute them where a white man kills a negro; and so we should. You see, then, that our community is as orderly as yours is, we execute the laws as promptly and as faithfully as you do, and the ballot-box is as free.

Thus much in reference to how the colored men got the ballot and as to the execution of the laws. I am inclined to think, and I may be wrong there, and I do not wish to judge wrongly, that in giving universal suffrage under those circumstances possibly you had a little eye to power. There may have been at least a thought of party power in it, that it was the best way to republicanize those States, that it was the best way to get control of them for the republican party. I do not say that was the object, for I have no right to judge harshly the motives of others. At least you gave the negroes the ballot under circumstances that you would not give it to them at home, and at a time when you did not give it to them at home.

I have here another little sentence from the speech of Senator ANTHONY that I wish to read in this connection. Even of the great State of New York, which is so well and so wisely governed, this is what Senator ANTHONY says:

> Many of the Northern States adhered to their discrimination against colored citizens till the results of the war compelled its abandonment, and all the Southern States retained or established it. In New York the proposition to admit colored citizens to equal rights of suffrage was submitted to a separate vote, with the constitution of 1846, and was rejected. It was submitted again, in an amendment in 1860, and again in 1868—

After the passage of the reconstruction acts, you will please bear in mind—> and was both times rejected. It was not adopted until 1874, when the fifteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution had removed the disqualification and established the equality of the whites and the blacks in the suffrage.

Therefore it was not simply the love of the colored man that prompted the giving of the suffrage in the Southern States. Even in that great State, as I say, they refused absolutely to give the colored man the ballot for years after it had been given in the South and they were exercising it there.

Again, I incline to think under all the circumstances that you have not dealt as liberally with these colored people as you might have done. There are fifty million people in round numbers in the United States. Of that number the republican party lacks nearly 160,000 voters of being half, according to the Political Almanac. So, then, the republican party represents a population of about twenty-four millions in the United States. There are six million five hundred-and-odd thousand of the colored race, more than one-fourth, if they are all republicans, of the entire republican party of this Union. How many of the offices have you given them? What have you done for them? The last administration did give Hon. Frederick Douglass, who is a man of great intelligence and power, the position of marshal of the District of Columbia, but if the reports be correct he was not invited to do all the honors at the White House that have generally been performed by the marshal of the District of Columbia. And rumor says, I do not know whether it is true, that now he will have to give way to a white man who can attend to all those honors and duties. I admit there is some palliation in that, because it has been reported that the white man is to come from that poor and neglected State of Ohio that never gets anything. That may be a reason for the change. What high positions have you given them? Are none of them intelligent enough to fill them? I see before me now a distinguished gentleman, Mr. Bruce, who occupied with dignity, urbanity, and character a seat on this floor I believe for six years. You have seven cabinet ministers. More than one-fourth of the whole republican population of the United States, if all the colored people are to be counted as republicans, is colored; and yet there is no man among them who is considered worthy by your party to represent that fourth in the cabinet of seven. What high positions have you given them? Occasionally they have had the position of mail-route agent and occasionally a post-office, but what have you done for them? I think not a very liberal part.

Allow me to say here that in my opinion the democracy have learned some wisdom by experience. I do not adopt the term that I have heard to-day, "Bourbon" democrat; I do not know that I am one; I am on a more liberal line, probably, than some have been. I stand by the execution of the different constitutional amendments, and for carrying out every right of the citizen in the strictest good faith; but I think, as I have already stated, the democrats have learned wisdom by experience, and you need not be astonished when they meet in grand council again as you have neglected to do justice to these people that they should do it. There will be no more trouble about a free ballot and a fair count then. If you will not do right by them we will. That is my opinion; that is my advanced position. I am a democrat on that line.

Mr. HOAR. Will you do it any way?

Mr. DAWES. My colleague wants to know if you are going to do it any way?

Mr. BROWN. I said I would under any circumstances.

Mr. HOAR. You said you would if we would not.

Mr. BROWN. I will not do it simply for a party purpose. I will advocate it because I think it is right to do justice by them. That is not quite all. You have not been very liberal to the republicans of the South without regard to race or color. There was once an eminent man, I believe, in this Capitol who said something about the cohesive power of public plunder. I do not use that phrase, however. But there is a cohesive power about executive patronage that has a good deal to do with keeping a party in power sometimes. Your party, one hundred and fifty-odd thousand in the minority of the popular vote in the United States, has almost the entire hundred thousand Federal appointments, and as you need them North, you do not send many of them South. You complain that you cannot build up the republican party there. No, and as long as you take all the offices for yourselves, and as long as those that you give down there are given to carpet-baggers or to those who have no native influence there, you will not build up one.

I have taken pains to look a little into this question. I do not vouch for the correctness of the figures that I now use, as I did not make them myself, but I use them as such an approximation to accuracy as to illustrate properly the principle I am discussing. I directed one of my secretaries to take up the Official Register, the latest I had, for 1879. You will remember that along down in the columns of that you will see the name of the officer, from what State appointed, and where he was born; and it is a little remarkable to see among those given to Georgia how many there are who were not born there, and how many there are who were never heard of there. I suppose that is upon the principle, however, that Georgia not having much share in the spoils, when an applicant came here and a Senator or Representative found that the places were full from his State and this office-seeker reported from Georgia, he was put down there. At least I cannot, on inquiry, locate a good number of them as having ever been known in Georgia. But taking them all now as Georgians and taking my figures as approximately correct, which I am satisfied they are, you have not been very liberal in bestowing patronage down there. If you want to rally the people and form a party there you ought to deal as justly by them as you do by the republicans elsewhere. I respectfully state that I do not think you have done so. As my secretary has made the list, those employed in the executive department and in the Secretary of State's office, and I suppose connected with the work there, number 98, or did at the time the Official Register was published, and of the 98 there were 2 charged to Georgia, but neither born there.

Mr. DAWES. One was Fitzsimons.

Mr. BROWN. That comes a little lower down. In the Department of State there are 367 appointments; from Georgia 4. In the War Department 1,507; from Georgia 14. In the Navy Department 347; from Georgia 1, and he was born in Georgia. In the Post-Office Department 488; from Georgia 9; 6 of them born elsewhere. In the Treasury Department, not counting laborers, 10,099 appointees; from Georgia 157; and 81 of them born elsewhere. I learn that there are about two thousand here in the Treasury Department proper, and therefore that is the better rule to apply. On inquiry I learn that under the statute, if it is construed as we think is the plain meaning of it, Georgia would be entitled to 60; and when I inquired I found she had 31. In the Department of Agriculture there are 73; from Georgia 1, and he was born elsewhere. In the Department of the Interior 3,924; from Georgia 7; born elsewhere 5; 2 natives. In the Department of Justice 321; from Georgia 2; born elsewhere 2. In the Judicial Department 2,008; from Georgia 51; born elsewhere 27. I suppose they locate Fitzsimons there. In the Government Printing Office 1,136 are employed; from Georgia 1, and that one born elsewhere. In the government of the District of Columbia 472; from Georgia none. My own idea of it is that if you did not have these hundred thousand officers you would have a great deal of difficulty in keeping your party together, and certainly a great deal of difficulty in triumphing with that party.

Mr. DAWES. Your colleague says there are not any republicans down there. What could we do?

Mr. BROWN. You have driven them out of the field by your injustice to them. No, gentlemen, you have not done justice to them. If there is anything in your civil-service reform there ought to be a competitive examination and a democrat let in once in a while. I have insisted on that before some of the Departments, but I find the first inquiry to be, "Is he a republican?" After that is ascertained he might have a chance at a competitive examination. It does not seem to apply to a colored man; I notice here, it is generally a white republican, and most of those from Northern States, who gets these benefits. I say you should give some of the offices to the democrats; but if you will not do that, then, as the republicans of my State have no representative on this floor but my colleague and myself, I demand justice for them, and that they receive the proportion of the official patronage that Georgia is justly entitled to. If you will not grant this, complain no more of your inability to maintain the republican party in Georgia.

You gave the colored people the ballot to enhance your power and you have not dealt generously by them since they have had the ballot. I apprehend at the next election you will scarcely count them solid for the republican party. I admit that I will be glad to see the day when race lines shall be no longer drawn, when the people of this country shall divide upon principle, upon finance, upon tariffs, upon banks and currency and other such issues as may come before us; but as long as you attempt in the South to displace the more intelligent, the more moral and upright class of people, the property-holders, and put those who are the more idle, the more illiterate, and the more vicious on top, you will always find a solid South.

I know you build hopes now upon Virginia since the republican Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] has abandoned the democracy and become a republican. You expect that he will carry with him the readjusters of Virginia. Doubtless many of them will go; but permit me to predict that there is many an honest old democrat in the mountains of Virginia who, when he separated from the regular democratic party upon the debt-paying question, did not feel that he had started over into the republican camp, and when he finds that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] is leading him there and has joined the republicans himself, and that out of from one to two hundred votes that he has cast in this body he has cast every one with you and not one with the democrats, the hard-fisted old democrat there will begin to inquire, "How is this? My leader has abandoned the principles we started in upon, as I understood them; I did not start into the republican camp, and I am not going there." I understand the policy and I have a right to comment upon it, because it has been announced here that you throw this support to the Senator from Virginia and his friends with a view of uniting the elements there that can give the republican party the power, and it has been further very strongly intimated to us that this work was to go on into the other Southern States.

In my State we have had divisions among the democrats. In the seventh and ninth congressional districts, the mountain portion and the stronghold of the democracy, a large wing of the democrats revolted against what they considered corruption or trickery in the party caucuses; independent candidates came out, gentlemen of ability and worth, and led them against the regular nominees. What was the result? The republicans fell in with the independents, as is usual in such a case, and these gentlemen were elected and they have served ably and well here. But permit me to tell you now in behalf of those independent democrats at home they did not start into your camp when they started to follow the independent candidates, and they are not going there. It has been said that the independent leaders from my State have been very kindly received in very high quarters here, and the support of the Government has probably been tendered to them, or at least intimations of that character given, for them to lead down there and overturn the regular democracy. If that has been so, for their benefit you had better keep it a secret, for when it is known by the democrats in the mountains of Georgia that they are in league with the republican party or that there is any purpose to lead them into it, the democrats will drop these independent leaders and they will have no chance for re-election. But I will not do those leaders the injustice to believe that these reports are true or that they would attempt to overturn the democratic party and build up the republican party.

As long as the independents can lead the independent wing of the democracy and you are willing to tie on as the tail to the kite, they can be elected as independents; but when the effort is to carry them over into the republican ranks or to defeat the democratic party, they will not go. Now and then an ambitious man who wants office may go; now and then an aspiring young man may go; but whenever it is understood that your purpose is to reconstruct the South again and to place the lower strata in intelligence of our people above the higher, in other words, to place the ignorance and vice—for there is generally more vice among the ignorant—above the intelligent, the wise, and the property-holders, and when that bugle-note is sounded down there, you will find that the young men will not feel flattered with their associates when they go over into your camp; you will simply drive our people back to solidity again.

My honorable friend from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] turned a fine period or two on that subject the other day, and I should like to refer to it. He speaks of a Senator who said about the commencement of the last presidential campaign, "We come to you with 138 votes, and we ask you to name us a man who can bring us 47 more;" and he adds:

That short paragraph went from hamlet to hamlet and from Maine to California; it was rung nightly, traveling with the curfew bell from Maine to California, and its full meaning was comprehended.

I admit that the very fact that the South was spoken of as solid gave the republicans a rallying cry for a solid North. Suppose, however, a republican had gotten up, as I have no doubt many a one did in the Northern States in the campaign, and said, "Here are fourteen States solid for the republican party, nobody doubts that they will vote republican, to wit, Iowa, Kansas, Massachusetts, Michigan, Nebraska, New Hampshire, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Vermont, Wisconsin, Illinois, Colorado, and Maine; here we present you 149 votes. Name a man who can bring 36 from the doubtful States, and we can elect him." That is simply analogous to the other case.

You have never known a political division yet where there were not certain States that were solid on each side. The South under the old state of things was generally democratic. Who doubted before the war that Massachusetts would vote the whig ticket under the old division? Who questioned that Kentucky would go whig when Henry Clay led it? An intelligent people always know before the campaign is opened that there are certain States that will be solid on each side, and that the contest is to be for the doubtful States.

That is what the solid South means. As long as you have a majority of States North or of States with the help of a few doubtful States that can put you in the majority, and you seek to use that majority to overturn our institutions, and put the ignorance and vice of the South in control over the intelligence and virtue and property of the South, so long as we believe your solid North means that, you drive us to be solid; we cannot disband with self-respect; we cannot do it with safety. Put yourselves in our condition and would you do it? You could not afford to do it. You would not do it in Massachusetts; you would do it in no State in this Union. Whenever you are no longer solid at the North and we hear no more about republicanizing certain States, no matter what the means may be, we shall soon cease to be solid. Present us issues of the character I mentioned awhile ago, tariff, banks, &c., and let those be the only questions, and we will divide as soon as you will, and without regard to color lines. But it seems to be the policy without any regard to what will be the consequences to say that you must republicanize those States, whether they desire to be republican or not, and to do that you must have every ignorant colored man vote that you would not permit to vote in your States; and then if we by kind treatment or any of the appliances that you use at home vote them, and you do not carry the election, there is a great complaint over it.

Let me say another thing in connection with the colored men. You made a mistake, and I apprehend you see it, so far as party power was concerned when you gave them the ballot. Taking the census of 1870 and counting the then ratio of representation, the colored people of the United States represented thirty-six members in Congress and thirty-six members in the electoral college. With that stricken out you would have had an easy triumph. Add that to the power of the South and you do not have an easy one. Count the same vote now; take the census of 1880. We do not yet know what the ratio of representation will be, but count it at three hundred and seven, and then there is within a fraction of forty representatives of the colored race, nearly all from the South. You made a mistake, which I apprehend you would not make again if you could recall it, when you gave us this additional power there; and having made it, possibly you have regretted it; but you cannot retrieve it by attempting to force into power the elements of the character that I have mentioned, which you exclude from the ballot-box at home over the elements in our State such as control matters in yours.

I have already referred to the remarks of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] that the solid South pronounced the fifteenth amendment a failure. We do not. Colored suffrage is not only established, but with us it shall remain established. You gave it to us against our will at the time, at a great risk to society, but we have struggled through the embarrassment and reached a point where the two races are acting harmoniously, kindly, and in friendship together. You have given us about forty members of Congress that we would not have had, and about forty members of the electoral college that we would not have had, and you can never take them from us. It takes three-fourths on a constitutional amendment to get rid of that, and there is not a Southern State that will ever agree to it. We have found that we can work in harmony and in fraternal relations with the colored race who were raised with and by us. They have found that we are their best friends. We intend to work in harmony with them, and we intend to hold the power that you in an unfortunate moment for your party gave us, and we will never relinquish it.

A good deal, however, has been said about a fair count as well as a free ballot. I do not deny that you count fair in Massachusetts and elsewhere in New England. I do deny that you have a free ballot there. I have commented on Massachusetts. A word in reference to Connecticut. If the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] makes a true statement in reference to it, and I quote from him in regard to Connecticut, a man twenty-one years of age and upward must be able to read and must be of good moral character before he can vote. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] says that does not exclude anybody. I do not know; I believe the Connecticut people are very good people. I spent some time with them in my college days; I was treated kindly by them; I have no unkind expression to use in reference to them, but I presume it is a misfortune of every community no matter how steady may be the habits of the land to have some immoral people. I have applied at the Census Office. I could not get the illiteracy of Connecticut or of Massachusetts in the case of persons over twenty-one years of age, for it is not yet ready, as the Superintendent tells me, but I take it for granted that there is a considerable number of men in Connecticut who cannot read, and there are at least a few immoral men there. They are excluded by the laws of Connecticut from the ballot. Therefore there is not a free ballot; in other words, there is not universal suffrage in Connecticut; there is not manhood suffrage there. In Rhode Island the same is true, as is admitted by all. There is a property qualification there for naturalized citizens. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] stated that there are two thousand excluded from the polls there. Then it is not a free ballot when even two thousand citizens are driven away from the polls; it it not a free ballot when a hundred thousand, if that be the number in Massachusetts, are driven away from the polls, or eighteeen thousand if that be the number.

In reference to that good old Granite State of New Hampshire the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] says that both parties resisted the repeal of the Catholic test there until 1877. No man there until that time could hold the office of governor of the State or member of the Legislature unless he professed the Protestant religion. In other words, a Catholic, no matter how intelligent he might be, could not hold either of those high offices because of his religious faith. We have nothing of that in the South. Therefore, I say we have a freer ballot there than you have in New England, and we have as fair a count there as you have. Though there may have been some trouble about a fair count at an earlier period for the reasons that I have mentioned, it is not so now.

The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] said the other day in his speech:

For all true men who uphold the laws the republican party has confidence, respect, and co-operation.

Again he says:

We have no prejudices on account of old conflicts. Whoever is right at the present time is our friend, and we are his.

I say that is a noble sentiment. He does not go back then to the period when there may have been any difficulty about a free ballot or any difficulty about a fair count. He inquires what is it now, and he has to do that to maintain his position in reference to the republican Senator from Virginia. We meet him there, and we have a right to claim his confidence and respect. I claim it for the democracy of Georgia, because we stand right on that platform to-day; I claim it for myself, and I claim the patronage of the Government for my State on that line.

But the honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] used another expression that might possibly exclude me from these benefits. He used this language:

When he—

Speaking of a Southern Senator—

takes his seat on this side and tells you that he does not care for your caucus, that what you do in there is a matter of total indifference to him, I shake hands with him, MAHONE or anybody else; and the more of them the more welcome.

The reason why I cannot claim this good promise, then, of the Senator from Pennsylvania is that, while I stand for a free ballot and a fair count and a faithful execution of the reconstruction measures and the constitutional amendments, and will fight with you there to the end of the chapter, I did not comply with the other prerequisite—I did not take my seat on that side. Gentlemen, I was not elected to go on that side; I deceived nobody in my campaign; I took the advanced position on the night before my election, as my colleague has told you; I laid down in the broadest terms that I would stand for a free ballot and a fair count, that I would stand for doing justice to the colored race, that I would recommend some of them for office, and that I was for the faithful execution of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments. I am entitled, then, to the promise of the Senator from Pennsylvania if I had not come under the exclusion of the Senator from Connecticut, whose requisition is that the Senator shall take his seat on that side.

But you have not always had a fair count, I think; at least, if you have, the majority has not ruled under that count. In 1876 Mr. Tilden carried a popular vote of over a quarter of a million, and if I know anything I know that he honestly carried the State of Florida, for I was there and saw what was done, and he was elected fairly, but he did not get counted in. I insist that it was not a fair count, and the democrats, a majority of them, did not make it either. No, gentlemen, at your door lies the charge that you do not in your own States maintain a free ballot, and you have not in your practices maintained a fair count.

A word in reference to the strange state of things in Virginia. You have seized, and as a party measure I have nothing to say about it, what you consider the readjuster element there, and you are seeking to blend it with the republican element and carry that State. I am not going to discuss the repudiation question there at all. I believe all admit that there is a difference between the funders and readjusters, as they are called, as to $12,000,000 of the debt; but I simply want to say this, that you may drive the people of Virginia into what you may call an error that they do not want to commit, and that you would not want to see them commit. You seek to take advantage of the division on the debt question to carry one portion of the democracy into the republican camp. The democracy of Virginia proper, the property-holders, the educated people, the church-going people, a large majority of them—for there are some on all sides I admit, and I do not make any attack on anybody—but what you usually call the intelligent or ruling class of people as you would say in the other States, have stood manfully up for maintaining the credit of the old State; but they will understand you now, whether correctly or not, as tendering this issue to them: You say, "We intend to take hold of this readjuster element and put the negroes and readjusters and the few white republicans who are there in power." They may reach the point where the supremacy of intelligence, education, virtue, and property for the preservation of society may become more important to the democracy of Virginia than the payment of her debt to your northern capitalists; and they may find it necessary to drop their internal strifes and, if you will have it so, turn overboard this $12,000,000 of the public debt and, if necessary to their reunion and the preservation of their society, tumble $12,000,000 more over with it, or let the whole of it go rather than have ruin brought upon the State by putting her under the control of a class of people a large majority of whom are such as you will not admit to the ballot-box in your own States.

I do not know what the proud people of that grand and glorious old Commonwealth will do, that old mother of States and statesmen; I venerate her name and I glory in her history, for my ancestry on both sides lived upon her soil; but I can see that you may drive the virtue and intelligence of that State to the point that they will tumble the whole debt overboard, if necessary, rather than submit to the ruin of society that you purpose to fasten upon them; and when they do it, you cannot reasonably condemn them. They have been able thus far to fight successfully the readjusters; they may not be able to fight successfully the readjusters with the patronage of the Senate of the United States and the patronage of the Federal Government. In other words, they may not be able to fight the readjusters and the Federal Government; when they find they are not, I presume they will take care of their institutions by letting the debt go if it be necessary. Will you condemn them when they do it? Will you cry "repudiation" if you drive them to repudiate to protect their society?

I have already said that the independent democrats of the South will not dare unite with you, their leaders I mean will not dare do it, for their followers, or the mass of them, who are democrats, will not go with them and will not support them. And now let me say a few words more in conclusion, for I have another single point.

At the end of the war, as I have already stated, we were a conquered people; we had to submit to the terms dictated by the conqueror; and we had to take whatever you put upon us; and it was very hard. We have atoned for our treason, as you term it, and we have been admitted back to these Halls by Senators and Representatives, and we have come to stay here and you cannot reconstruct us again. The condition is very different from what it was then. Now prosperity has been restored to the country. Your northern capitalists did not have money investments there in that day; they have poured in there recently by the millions their money. We open a broad field for investment; we have unbounded resources; we have a climate not surpassed on the face of the earth; our cotton crop alone this year, if it reaches 6,000,000 bales, as we suppose it will, will pour into the south $300,000,000 in gold; our mineral wealth is not probably surpassed anywhere on the globe—I do not speak so much of the precious metals as I do of the coal and the iron and the minerals that make a people great—our commercial importance is every day increasing; our cities are growing; our railroads have become organized, they are penetrating every portion of our country. Your northern capital is coming down there and being invested, and whatever may have been our errors in the past on that subject we welcome you now; come among us; we extend to you a cordial greeting; we invite you to our houses, to our parties, to our bosoms where you come intending to make good citizens, and we share with you this splendid domain that is not anywhere surpassed on the face of the globe. The capacities for the productions of the South in future are limitless. Would you believe it that, according to the last census, the whole acreage of the cotton crop in the South for the past year is a little over half and less than two-thirds of the acreage of the State of Georgia? In other words, you might transfer every acre of cotton last year, if you could put it all together, to my own State, and it would cover a little more than one-half her territory. The capacity, then, for the production of this great staple is simply boundless. Why, take Texas alone, an empire of territory, larger than France, larger than the Empire of Germany, larger than the Empire of Austro-Hungary. We have merely skimmed the surface. Texas alone can produce more cotton than the world will need the next fifty years, and as the necessities increase the production can be expanded indefinitely. Not only that, we are waking up a strong rivalry with you in manufacturing there. The number of pounds of cotton manufactured in the Southern States from 1870 to 1880 more than doubled itself. We are constantly putting up new mills and new machinery, and we are going to manufacture large quantities of it, and your northern capital finds it its interest to come there, and we invite you.

Now permit me to tell you frankly that this is not 1867 and 1868, and when you make this issue of radicalizing those States by overturning their great interests you will not find your northern capital flow so freely into your political coffers to carry your elections. They will say to you, "Nay, you must stop this; you cannot disorganize society there; you cannot ruin the interests of that country without ruining our capital;" and they will not go with you; and let me warn you now that if you are not careful you will lose a great many more votes from the republican party in the next election in the Northern States than you will carry of democrats in the Southern States. The war is over; you buried "the bloody shirt" when you made the republican Senator from Virginia your leader, he being a confederate brigadier, and with that set before the people of the United States they will not enter with you again into another crusade to establish a power in the South that you failed to do when you gave suffrage to the negroes. You will have to recognize our prosperity; we have a better country than you have, and though the blight of slavery may have been upon it according to your estimate; though it was our misfortune, which is removed, it will blight there no more; we intend to go forward and develop and grow up; we intend to try to become your equals in wealth, in intelligence, and then you will respect us.

I have thanked you before and I thank you again for the efforts you have made, the liberality you have shown from New England in coming up and agreeing with us to do your part toward the education of a class that, by the act of war, was turned loose upon us and carried to the polls when they were not able to take care of themselves. I say you did well there; we welcomed you. I have given you credit where I thought you deserved it, and I think you do in that regard; but you will find it is a great mistake if you think the democrats in the South who have followed the independents are going to follow them to your camp; and I think you will find yourselves mistaken in the North when you undertake to upheave our society again and subvert it for purposes of political power. I do not believe your people, and especially the large numbers of them who have investments in our section, will sustain you in it.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] made some quite extraordinary mistakes in his statement of the law and the fact bearing upon the right of electors in Massachusetts. I thought, as his speech was to be reported and printed, he would prefer to have the correction made at the time of the misstatement; but for some reason, best known to himself, he did not care to have his speech go into print and in the RECORD with such corrections as I should be able to make; and on the whole I am not certain that I am sorry. I want that speech with its admissions, with its implications, with its threat, to go far and wide among the intelligent freemen of this land.

Mr. BROWN. That is my purpose.

Mr. HOAR. Other men have denied that there have been denials of the right of suffrage at the South; that there have been refusals to execute the constitutional amendments. When year after year the complaint has been made from men at the North whose own rulers were, under the Constitution, in part to be chosen by the people of those States, that the men whose votes were to determine the policies under which they were to live were selected, not according to the Constitution, not according to the lawful right, not according to the honest majority, it was a slander and a falsehood and a campaign device, according to the answers we got from the South. But now here is their representative standing up and saying that when he was elected to the Senate by the combined votes of republicans and a portion of the democrats of his State he took an advanced position upon the subject of obeying the Constitution that every public officer in his own State had taken his oath to support. In advance of what? The claim which the honorable Senator from Georgia makes to our confidence is in itself a confession.

Another thing the honorable Senator from Georgia has said which I wish to have understood by the people of this country and which I desire to emphasize before it passes from the recollection of the Senate. He threatens us that if the republican party persist by sympathy and encouragement (which is all we have in our power in other States) in aiding the assertion of its right to rule Virginia by the majority of Virginia, for that is all, his party there will be driven to ally themselves, he fears, with those persons who desire to repudiate the whole of the debt of that State, if such there be; and he seeks to excite the fear of northern capitalists—a class of persons of whose temper he has, let me tell him, very little understanding—that if they do not in some way put a stop to this attempt to have an honest majority rule in this country hereafter, they are to lose the debts in which their property is invested. This democratic virtue which we have heard of so long proposes at last to take this leprosy to its embrace if we do not stop sympathizing with what we speak of as "the free ballot and fair count." Why, Mr. President, was ever such a threat uttered in the American Senate? All I want is to be sure that the language uttered by the Senator from Georgia goes into the enduring record of the proceedings of this body unchanged, as it of course will, because the Senator will stand by what he has said.

Mr. BROWN. That is my habit, sir.

Mr. HOAR. That is the Senator's habit, I have no doubt. I rose merely to say in one or two sentences what I have said; but another thing I wish to add. The Senator from Georgia speaks of a process which he thinks somebody somewhere is attempting, which he calls radicalizing the South, putting what he calls its great ignorant classes or strata above its intelligence and its virtue and its property. Mr. President, every class of persons who desire to govern other people unjustly and not of right, arrogates to itself that it is the virtue and the intelligence, from the Czar on his throne ruling alone to the old slave-holding oligarchy ruling by methods as unjust and as tyrannical as ever a single despot used in crushing out the liberties of his subjects. This country is not governed by minorities pretending to be the virtue and the education and the property, except so far as those things have their just and legitimate influence in persuading the majority, counted by the head of the lawful voting classes in the country whose right to vote is determined by the constitution and laws of the nation and of the State. Education, property, virtue, have a wider and more legitimate influence when they appeal to the majority of men voting freely and according to law, than they have under any oligarchy; and that is the doctrine which Jefferson and his great companions, when they performed the one foremost act of human history embodied forever as the rock on which the institutions of this country are built. Education, property, virtue govern in their natural realm, the conscience and the understanding of the common American, and their influence is most exactly measured and is most complete when the votes of free men are honestly counted, man by man.

Mr. President, the Senator speaks of what he calls radicalizing the Southern States, and he says at the close of his speech that northern capital is going down there, is building their railroads, that we of New England have offered to give them the public lands and the patent fees, which we almost wholly pay, to establish their schools, and that our men are coming in there to settle, and he thanks us for all that. Has not the Senator found out that that is exactly what we mean by radicalizing? All we want of the State of Georgia is that she will let us come down there and build her railroads and build her schools, and help till with our surplus population those untilled cotton-fields which he has described, and dig out with our right arms the iron and the coal and the gold and the silver. That is all we ask; but when we come there we want to be permitted, and our sons want to be permitted, to cast a free vote and to utter a free voice. If we happen or they happen to express our opinions on political questions in a way you do not like, all we ask is that you shall answer us by reason and by fair argument and not by shot. If it should occur to son or brother of mine to settle in the State of Georgia and to say of the Senator's colleague such things as he says here in debate of me, we do not want and he does not want that he shall be suddenly informed that he remains only on the condition that he shall behave himself, as the honorable Senator said shall be a useful member of society. We want that judgment how he shall cast his vote and how he shall defend his vote in debate, conforming of course to the law, shall be his judgment, and not the judgment of the leaders of the democratic party.

The Senator talks of our upheaving the society of the old State of Virginia. Does he suppose that a Sergeant-at-Arms wandering about this Senate, or a couple of subordinates, if that should be the number assigned to the State of Virginia under the usages of the Senate, are going suddenly to drive that people or to have any effect upon their political action? All the overturning that is to be done in Virginia is to be done by submitting to the majority of her people arguments which they are to consider fairly before they act upon questions which concern them and especially before they act upon questions which concern them and us alike; and there is no other process of radicalizing. We can give to Virginia nothing but our sympathy in this effort she is making to shake off a dominion as arrogant, as tyrannical, as domineering, as wicked as ever ground to the dust the free instincts of a free people. That is all.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, a few words only in reply to my honorable friend from Massachusetts. He refers to the fact that I complained of the effort to have a majority of the people of Virginia control in the coming elections and in the government of the State. A majority of the people of Virginia and a majority of the people of Massachusetts seem to be two very different sorts of things. He knows just as well as I do that he dare not permit a majority of the people of Massachusetts to rule there; he knows just as well as the world knows that he would not feel that their property was safe there; that their institutions were safe there; that they could live safely there if they permitted the very class of people in Massachusetts to take control that they are trying to give the control to in Virginia, and as I stated in my speech——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator tell me what he means by "take control?"

Mr. BROWN. I mean come to the ballot-box and cast a free ballot and have it fairly counted; that is what I mean by control, the very thing you will not let them do in Massachusetts, General Butler says to the extent of 138,000; and you will not probably fly in his teeth when he lays down a proposition of that sort. As I understand it, he says that Massachusetts is democratic to-day if you would let all your people vote. You want to radicalize Virginia by bringing all the ignorance to the polls there that you will not let vote in Massachusetts, and you know you dare not let it vote there, for if you could safely do it you would let it go the polls. But, as I have already said, you fence them out; you put an inclosure around your ballot-box that they cannot pass. You say to this lower or more ignorant class of people—and they may be as good as any of us, and doubtless would be if they had the same opportunities—"You cannot take part in the government of this State; we have State rights here; we have a right to regulate our own affairs in our own way; we will permit no dictation from Virginia or anywhere else, and we will not let you vote; we intend that Massachusetts shall be a republican State; we do not intend that this great class shall go to the polls and give it to the democrats, where it belongs." No, you know you dare not let them go to the polls. If you dared do it you would not have the position you now have; or if I am wrong in that, if they can safely go, you do them great injustice when you bar them from the polls for party ends, and I suppose that is one of the great points.

In the first place, you feel that your property is safer by not permitting them to go there, and you know your political position is safer. Just make the law of Massachusetts what the law of Georgia is on the subject of suffrage and give "a free ballot and a fair count" in Massachusetts as Georgia gives, and much as I like you I do not believe you would come back here again. [Laughter.] We should be deprived of the benefit of your wise counsels, my friend; we should be deprived of the chapters of advice that we get from you from day to day here; we should be deprived of the lectures that we get over and again, because if the mass of the people of Massachusetts could go to the polls as they do in Georgia, and you would give them manhood suffrage, while I would wish you well personally, I should think you had a very bad chance to get back here. No, you know you dare not do it. While you lecture everybody else on the subject of suffrage and the right to vote, you do not practice it.

You quoted the other day, "Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy." A Pharisee, I believe, was a man who preached one thing and practiced another, who thanked God that he was not as other men, always feeling that he was better than other people, that he had rights which did not belong to other people. Now, to that remark made by the Senator from Massachusetts I will add one from the same Divine Author for his consideration: "Woe unto you * * * Pharisees, hypocrites!" Apply the same rule—and I speak in all kindness to my friend, for I am his personal friend—apply the rule in Massachusetts that you want to apply in Virginia, and you will have trouble; give Virginia the rule that you apply in Massachusetts, and she will have no trouble.

But the Senator reads me a little lecture in reference to my allusion to the fact that Virginia might be driven to tumble her whole debt overboard to protect her society. I say you may drive her to it. I did not make the remark with any view of alarming or intimidating your northern capitalists; they are in a very good condition to take care of themselves. I admit that; but I spoke the words of truth in soberness when I told you that if there is anything in human nature you may goad them to that point.

Again the Senator refers to the fact that I mentioned that northern capital had been flowing into Southern States largely of late. He speaks of republicanizing them doing no harm. It flows in, my friend, under democratic administration. We have reached the point where the democrats have had power long enough to regulate society there, establish justice, and see that the laws are fairly executed. Your people at the North see that, and timid as northern capital and capital anywhere else is, it is coming there abundantly now, and we invite it.

But my friend says, Oh, yes; we invite you to come down there if you will be good citizens, but you must be good citizens according to the democratic idea. Not so, my friend; all you have to do there is to be law-abiding, as you are in Massachusetts, and demean yourself as a good citizen, and you will be treated just as well as you are at home, or anywhere else. Why, my friend, you can come to Georgia in any political campaign we have; go to any county in the State, and with all your bitterness, of which I do not think you are conscious, displayed on the stump, I vouch for you and for our people you will never be insulted. You can do it as freely, as independently, as you can do it in Boston, Massachusetts; there is no trouble on that score. The war is over; the time of violence is over; there is democratic rule there; society is re-established; fraternity exists between the races, and we welcome all good citizens the world over to come there and share with us that beautiful country, and there you can exercise your political privileges just as independently as I can, and the democracy of Georgia stands pledged for your protection.

One word more about an incident of yesterday morning and I have done. The honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] in his speech referred to the fact of a lecture that my friend from Massachusetts had read us some time since on the subject of treason. The Senator from Massachusetts got up and made a reply, in which I see this appears:

> It was an original qualification. However, if the Senator will permit me, I wish to say that the statements which have been made upon this floor and the conduct of the gentlemen on that side warrant me now in imputing what I then declined to impute, and I do now so impute it. I propose to take a coming time to state the reasons of that imputation.

Now, Mr. President, I did not make any reply to that because the Senator has not yet taken the "coming time" to state the reasons. Before I sit down I desire to say that when that "coming time" arrives and he states the reasons, I shall have a few words to say on that point, and I presume it will become my duty upon his own position to prove him a traitor again.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the Senators from Georgia, especially the Senator who has last spoken, seem to have been very much disturbed by a reference which I made to the Scriptures some fortnight ago, which I should be almost inclined to think from the effect it has had on their minds is the first time they ever heard of that publication, [laughter;] but I will not impute that of course to so grave a person as my friend from Georgia who last spoke.

I wish, however, to say in seriousness that this repetition again and again of the suggestion that 139,000 persons, which would be about half the entire registered vote of Massachusetts as cast, are disfranchised or excluded from voting by the provisions of our constitution, is one of the most ridiculous absurdities ever uttered. I undertake to say that if the gentlemen who have alluded to that on this floor, the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] or the Senator from Georgia who last addressed the Senate, instead of taking a brief which somebody got up to make the best he could of a bad cause in which such a result was undertaken to be reached, would look into the facts, would take the census of illiteracy, determine the number of illiterates in 1870 and subtract from that number the proportion which belongs to the foreigners who are not citizens, they would at once reject as absolutely unworthy a man of character an allusion to that matter. That statement was put into a brief used in the other House in the argument of an election case. Gentlemen on the other side have attributed that brief to a well-known citizen of Massachusetts. I know nothing about that; but I do know that the democratic members of the committee of the House to whom that argument was addressed joined with the republican members in rejecting its conclusion. There was, I think, one single member of the entire committee, who was a greenbacker, who did concur with it.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. CALL. I will ask the honorable Senator if he will state what the figures are, as he understands them?

Mr. HOAR. Why, Mr. President, if the Senator means by that that I shall state from memory exactly all these census figures, I say very frankly that I am unable to do so. I stated them on the floor of the Senate once.

Mr. CALL. Approximately, about, anywhere near?

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will have my answer. If the Senator means to ask me what I understand to be the number in Massachusetts of citizens who are unable to vote by reason of the reading and writing clause and the other clauses in our State constitution, I reply that I understand the number to be eighteen thousand and some odd hundreds, the number which the Senator from Georgia took in one of his alternatives. Of that number nearly all were born out of the State except perhaps a thousand or two; I do not recollect the exact number, though I have known it recently. They are usually persons born of foreign parents. I do not say that the one or two thousand are natives of the State, but natives of this country, who are unable to read and write. I never knew in my life a native of Massachusetts, not an idiot, not deprived of the ordinary intelligence of man by some malformation of his body, who was not able to read and write. I never met such a person. No doubt there are such persons, but they are not within my knowledge.

We accompany, as I said before, the provision that men shall be compelled to read the constitution in the English language and to write the name of the voter with a provision at the public charge, unequaled in liberality by any other community in the world, of the instrumentalities for giving them that instruction. The native of Massachusetts has the opportunity during all his years of childhood, the foreigner during the years which after he has moved into the State he is required to reside there before he becomes a voter. Now, how do Senators, with the evidence of the crime upon the suffrage, half admitted and half denied, known to this country and as familiar as any part of its history, undertake to meet that charge? The charge is that men who by law have the right to vote are not permitted to exercise it; the charge is in the language into which the honorable Senator from Georgia himself was inadvertently betrayed when he said, "When the property of Georgia undertakes to vote, the colored people vote," speaking, I think, of what constitutes a numerical majority or nearly so of the people of that State—the class of people whose ballot is to be voted by somebody else! When we are dealing with such things as that, to undertake to repeat again and again this, I will not say twaddle, but such statements as we hear day after day about the disqualifications of persons who cannot read and write in Massachusetts, is a practical confession of the community under consideration that nothing can be said in reply to it.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I only have a few words to say in reply to my honorable friend. As we understand it the vote of Massachusetts is a little over 400,000 as the table represents it. General Butler claims that about 130,000——

Mr. HOAR. The population of the State is only about 1,700,000 by the last census.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from South Carolina gave me what he understood to be the facts.

Mr. BUTLER. My friend will pardon me one moment. I stated what I saw in this table which I have, and which I will indulge the Senator from Massachusetts with reading if he desires.

Mr. HOAR. I say this, if the Senators will pardon me. Let the Senators really look into that question and not take General Butler's brief. If the Senator from South Carolina or the Senator from Georgia or the Senator from Florida will take up that question as they would take up any other, for instance as I have taken the matter of the South Carolina census, which six months ago I had a belief about, which the Senator has heard of before, I will submit it to them. I have studied that matter carefully, and I trust in regard to it the distinguished and accomplished gentleman at the head of the Census Office. I believe his conclusion, and I expect to say so. Now if the Senator will look at this question, if he will think it important enough—I mean the question of how many men are disfranchised in this manner in the State of Massachusetts—I am sure he will agree that it is not a thing that any intelligent man can doubt about if he will look at it. If a gentleman gets up and says "I quote General Butler's brief," and you ask to interrupt him, and he says he will not yield——

Mr. BROWN. I did not give way for the Senator to make a speech.

Mr. HOAR. Merely a word. And if then when the facts are brought out he comes back three days after and flaunts that old brief again, that is a very easy thing to do. I tell those gentlemen there is not a word of truth in that statement, and I know it.

Mr. BUTLER. Then General Butler must be mistaken.

Mr. HOAR. I do not make any logical deduction about anybody; but I say there is not a word of truth in that statement, and I say it is a matter of such absolute demonstration that if the Senator from South Carolina, who, whatever other faults he may have, is not a man who I think would come here with an untrue statement in his mouth and reiterate it, and I do not think any other Senator is, will look at that thing, I will accept his conclusion and forever hold my peace on that subject. There is no doubt about it. You might as well say General Butler said the population of Washington was a million some time. Suppose he had said so; there is not any truth in it.

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator from Massachusetts excuse me for asking him what is the registered vote of his State?

Mr. HOAR. I do not remember at this moment. I desire to be——

Mr. BROWN. You denied the figure I mentioned. What is it?

Mr. HOAR. It is somewhere in the neighborhood of 300,000, undoubtedly.

Mr. BROWN. I take 300,000, then.

Mr. HOAR. I take a fifth of the population.

Mr. BROWN. What is your republican majority in Massachusetts?

Mr. HOAR. The republican majority when General Grant was last voted for——

Mr. BROWN. Take it at the last election.

Mr. HOAR. I am going to give it to you at three elections. When General Grant was last voted for it was a little over 75,000. It would have been 100,000 if it had not been for the horse distemper. [Laughter.] In 1876 it was, if I recollect right, about 30,000. This last time, in 1880, it was about 53,000.

Mr. BROWN. Well, now, but for the horse distemper it would have been 100,000 the first time.

Mr. HOAR. Seventy-five thousand it was.

Mr. BROWN. Then 30,000; then 50,000. Now, suppose we say 40,000.

Mr. HOAR. Why does the Senator say it was 40,000 when it was fifty-two thousand and some odd hundreds?

Mr. BROWN. Well, suppose it was 50,000. Then if General Butler be right and the number that he mentioned as disfranchised should come in and vote, you are badly beaten, you see.

Mr. HOAR. How so?

Mr. BROWN. One hundred and thirty thousand added to the democracy would beat you very badly, and I believe that would be the result.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator——

Mr. BROWN. I have the floor now.

Mr. HOAR. Before the Senator passes from that point——

Mr. BROWN. No; I have the floor——

Mr. HOAR. The Senator asked me a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin in the chair.) The Senator from Georgia declines to yield.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator will make speeches every few minutes if permitted.

Mr. HOAR. I was merely going to ask you if all those 130,000 ignorant people would vote the democratic ticket, in your judgment? That was all.

Mr. BROWN. I suppose you think they would, because your idea seems to be that there is more ignorance in the democracy, and, if so, we might pretty reasonably claim the one hundred and thirty-odd thousand, or whatever the number is. But the Senator says that it is an old story; that it is all bosh; that there is nothing in it; and yet he admits that there is a good deal in it. It comes from a high source. The Senator says himself in speaking of General Butler that he will not draw any logical deductions when the Senator from South Carolina says if it is not true General Butler has made a mistake. It is at least better authority than most of your southern outrages are predicated upon.

I have admitted that there have been southern outrages, but you have grossly misrepresented, you have grossly exaggerated them, and you did not have such men as General Butler as the authority for them. Now, I give you the 138,000 disfranchised in Massachusetts on Butler's brief as a set-off against the very large number of outrages that you have been quoting at the South all the time, and I say I have better authority for the one than you have for the other. But now you admit, recollect, that there are 18,000 disfranchised there for illiteracy. You have not told us how many are disfranchised for not paying taxes; you have not told us how many are disfranchised for whom guardians have been appointed; you have not told us how many paupers have been disfranchised, nor how many for debauchery or for gambling or for drinking to excess, as the statute lays it down, spendthrifts and so on. You have not told us, and I presume you cannot tell us how many. If there are 18,000 excluded for illiteracy, taking all the other heads it is reasonable to suppose that there is a very large number; but if it is only 18,000 and no more, then I say you admit there what does not exist in Georgia and elsewhere, that you do not give "a free ballot" when you exclude 18,000 who are of age there and ought to vote from the privilege of voting.

Now, apply the rule of the honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] of universal suffrage, and you violate it in Massachusetts. Therefore you ought not to be always preaching universal suffrage to us until you get ready to practice it.

You have claimed all the time, I believe, that the negroes vote with you because we went for disfranchising them. We did not accept promptly the reconstruction acts as we might have done in the South but held that the negroes ought not to vote and they went with you because of that. Now, apply that rule to Massachusetts. If you let those whom you have disfranchised vote, it is reasonable to suppose they will all vote with us because you have disfranchised them. If you do that then we have Massachusetts a democratic State by a large majority, if General Butler is anywhere in the neighborhood of correct.

Mr. HOAR. I am glad to find that the well-known citizen of Massachusetts whom the Senator speaks of has become such high democratic authority, and I will say to my honorable friend from Georgia that if he will admit to be true all the outrages in the South for which we have General Butler's authority we will throw in the balance and say nothing more about them.

Mr. BROWN. I take that——

Mr. HOAR. I do not yield to the Senator. I have the floor.

Mr. BROWN. I will make the contract as soon as I can.

Mr. HOAR. I have the floor. The point between us is this, and nothing else will get it out of sight: The Senator on the other side undertakes to defend these outrages, which he says he admits, which consist in the prevention of voting by men who have the right to vote simply because they are republicans, because of their political opinions, by undertaking to draw a parallel between that crime and the constitutional restrictions or qualifications of suffrage set forth in a State constitution. Does the Senator think that a dozen repetitions of this thing, multiplying it by twenty or by eight or ten, as he does every time he is attacked, is going to divert the attention of the American people? I should like to ask the Senator a question, whether, when he had what was called republican inclinations or affiliations, he was not guarded in some parts of his own State from the violence of his political opponents?

Mr. BROWN. I will answer when you give me the floor.

Mr. HOAR. I will give you the floor now.

Mr. BROWN. I will answer the Senator very frankly on two or three points. He says that I admit that there have been outrages South, and then he goes on to deliver the usual lecture about not letting a republican vote now. I said distinctly that a republican could vote now as well as a democrat, that nobody was debarred from the polls. I admitted that there had been some outrages there soon after the war. I admit it now; and now you say if I would admit the outrages South that General Butler had charged there you would admit his statement in the other case.

Mr. HOAR. No, I did not.

Mr. BROWN. Now I will do it.

Mr. HOAR. I did not say so.

Mr. BROWN. I have the floor, my friend.

Mr. HOAR. My friend will permit me to state the difference——

Mr. BROWN. You can be heard after I have yielded the floor. I admit all the outrages that did occur at the end of the war that General Butler recorded, for the sake of this controversy; and then you have agreed to admit that there are 138,000 of your people disfranchised. Then I prove in that way that there is that number there who certainly would not like to go with the party that disfranchised them, and therefore we have 138,000 democratic voters there who are not permitted to vote, and that puts your State largely democratic.

Now, in regard to the time when I had republican proclivities, I will answer the gentleman there, too. I stated very distinctly that there were times there, just at the end of the war and its attending excitements when I took a position for reconstruction, when I did not think my life was safe. I have no hesitation in saying that; but the period was a short one, soon after I had taken my position for reconstruction. There were times in battle when the two armies were meeting each other and firing on each other when no man's life was safe. War was flagrant, and nobody knew that his life was safe a moment.

Just after the war, at the period the Senator speaks of, there was a very high state of excitement. The war was scarcely over, the excitement was very high, people were not then in a condition to do justice, and I admit I did go through a period of danger when I took that position; but all danger of that kind ceased more than two years before I reunited with the democracy. That day has long been passed, and as an evidence of it the very people who would have taken my life then because they thought I was not true to them have since that taken me up, and by a majority of nearly seventy-five thousand of the popular vote in the election of members to the Legislature, and over two-thirds of the Legislature, have sent me here to repel the unfounded charges made against my people by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, what I said to the Senator was that if he would admit the truth of all the charges of southern outrages made by General Butler, we would not say anything more about the other southern outrages. I did not say I would admit what he said about disfranchisement in Massachusetts.

Mr. BROWN. Do not back out, now.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator mean to imply that I do not say what is true when I tell him what I said?

Mr. BROWN. Not by any means.

Mr. HOAR. When the Senator has made his statement——

Mr. BROWN. I simply thought the Senator was playing with words.

Mr. HOAR. When the Senator first undertook to repeat what I said, I called his attention to the fact that he misunderstood it. Let him go and ask the Reporter; he has it down.

Mr. BROWN. I was stating it only as I understood it. I think the Senator knows my feeling toward him well enough——

Mr. HOAR. I know what I said on that subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator spoke of a certain citizen of Massachusetts as his authority, to which I replied that if the Senator would admit all the southern outrages which that person had charged upon the South, I should not find it necessary to say anything about any more. He undoubtedly, and perhaps those about him, understood me to say that I would admit what he said about Massachusetts. In that he was mistaken. If he will look at the Reporter's notes he will find——

Mr. BROWN. I certainly did not intend to misrepresent the Senator, but I so understood him.

Mr. BECK. Let us adjourn. I wish to move an adjournment.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to say a word.

Mr. BECK. I rose to move an adjournment.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will agree to it after I have said a very few words.

Mr. BECK. I am afraid we shall lose both the Senators from Georgia; I am afraid they are both going to be killed unless this thing is stopped. [Laughter.] I withdraw the motion.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, there have been various references to Connecticut within a week or two past that have not disturbed me at all; but I cannot refrain from calling the attention of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] to an oversight upon his part in the way he criticises me for using the phrase "universal suffrage." He must have seen that I used that term in the general sense of conversation and the newspapers, for there is no such thing as universal suffrage, strictly speaking, nor, if he is going to be critical with me, is there even any such thing anywhere as manhood suffrage. There must be regulations of some description, regulations to apply to the term of residence, regulations to apply to the oath to be taken, to the manner of challenging, to the boxes into which the man shall put his ballot, and in other respects, so that there is no such thing as saying that on a certain day every man twenty-one years of age may drop his ballot in the street wherever he may happen to be and have it counted. There are regulations that inevitably tend to exclusion. This is the Senator's oversight. These regulations exclude no man by reason of any of the accidents of humanity, the things for which he is not responsible, the things which the Almighty placed in him or upon him; nor are these regulations with us such that any man of ordinary intelligence may not overcome them. No man in the State of Connecticut is excluded because he was born in a foreign land; no man is excluded because he is black or yellow or red; if only he has the soul of a man he may vote. There is no disability imposed upon him from which he may not recover by his own efforts; and is not that a genuine democracy? By his own will and efforts he may recover from all of them. We have no property qualification. I dislike that exceedingly. We used to have it in the olden time, but we have none now; even the paupers with us may vote. But our regulations are based upon intelligence and good character, "good moral character," the ancient regulation that has come down to us from colonial days. It has its legal interpretation; it bars out only those who may have been convicted by due legal proceeding of some immoral and infamous crime. That is the man's fault; he excludes himself then. There is also this requisition, that a man should be able to read any clause of the constitution to which his attention may be called. That exclusion, if he be an ignorant man, he may recover from, unless he be a man of extraordinary dullness. During the five years probation that the foreigner is compelled to undergo he may learn to read; during the one year's residence which the citizen coming in from another State is required to live among us he may learn to read; he may qualify himself. That is to say, we have no disqualification from which a man of ordinary intelligence and humanity cannot escape of his own will. He is not excluded.

Then comes another difference that we claim to be very material between us and the people of some of the Southern States during these great periods of disturbance. I have never seen or heard of a man excluded from the ballot-box in Connecticut by reason of violence at the polls of any description, nor have I reason to believe that a man has ever been compelled to vote in any other way than his own conscience dictated anywhere in my State, and I have never seen except in three cases, where we hounded it out and where it was committed by democrats, anything like an unfair count, and in two of those cases out of the three the unfair count was upset. The fundamental difference between us and them is that we have no disqualification from which a man cannot escape.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

Mr. BROWN. I beg the Senator from Massachusetts to allow me a word.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator desires to speak, I will give way.

Mr. BROWN. I did not misrepresent the language of the honorable Senator from Connecticut. He used the term "universal suffrage." Of course he has a right to construe it as he chooses, and I have no right to deny that he has made an entirely correct statement in reference to the state of things in his own State. He says that no one is put under a disability there who cannot work out of it if he chooses to do so, if I understand him. It occurs, I presume, in every community, however good the educational system may be, that there are some very poor persons who have to have their children at home to work who cannot educate them. Some are raised up, therefore, in ignorance, without fault on their part. There may be but few who are not permitted to go to the ballot-box. That there are some persons there who are of bad character I have no doubt, but I presume as few in Connecticut, probably, as in any other State. If there are only a few of each class, no matter how few, it serves the purpose of my argument and proves that you have not universal suffrage there, that you have not a free ballot for everybody alike. That was all I intended to say.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am quite content if it is well understood that is all the Senator means.

Mr. BROWN. And one word more on the other point, if you please. While I admit the disturbance there was at the South as a result of the war and during the angry passions created by it, I say that an election there to-day is conducted as fairly, as freely, and as properly as it is in Connecticut or any other State.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ought to have added that we require the qualification of education because for two hundred and forty years we have made schools compulsory. They have been established from the very foundation of the colony in every town and an academy required in each county, and our common schools are open and free to every child in the State, and the law says every child in the State shall go. The policeman or constable who finds a child wandering about of school age, during school hours, is bound to arrest him.

Mr. BROWN. I think your educational system an admirable one, and it does great credit to your people. I have always thought so.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, before moving an adjournment I want to congratulate the Senator from Georgia upon the personal safety which he has established for himself in his own State. He says there was a time when he had republican proclivities and his life was in danger. He says he has changed his politics in that respect, and now he is safe. [Laughter.] I move that the Senate do now adjourn until Monday next at twelve o'clock.

Mr. PENDLETON. I hope that motion will not be carried, and upon it I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate do now adjourn. That motion has precedence of the motion made by the Senator from Massachusetts. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, that the Senate do now adjourn. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. HARRIS called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) I am paired upon all questions with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] Therefore I decline to vote.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE.]

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. BLAIR.]

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. PLATT.]

Mr. GORMAN, (when Mr. GROOME'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. GROOME] is paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.]

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

Mr. JOHNSTON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. FAIR.]

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] on this question. I will announce also that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME.]

Mr. MCPHERSON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. SEWELL.]

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. SLATER. My colleague [Mr. GROVER] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

Mr. VANCE. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] is paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

Mr. KELLOGG. I vote "nay" to help make a quorum.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I vote because my vote is needed to make a quorum.

Mr. HARRIS. It does not require a quorum to adjourn the Senate.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The motion is defeated, I believe.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not know; we have had no information on that point. A quorum is not necessary on this motion.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—17.

Bayard,	Cockrell,	Jackson,	Slater,
Brown,	Coke,	Morgan,	Vance.
Butler,	Gorman,	Pendleton,
Call,	Hampton,	Pugh,
Camden,	Harris,	Ransom,

NAYS—20.

Burnside,	Ferry,	Ingalls,	Miller,
Cameron of Pa.,	Frye,	Kellogg,	Mitchell,
Conger,	Harrison,	McDill,	Platt of Conn.,
Conkling,	Hawley,	McMillan,	Saunders,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Mahone,	Sawyer.

ABSENT—39.

Allison,	Farley,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,
Anthony,	Garland,	Jones of Nevada,	Sewell,
Beck,	George,	Lamar,	Sherman,
Blair,	Groome,	Logan,	Teller,
Cameron of Wis.,	Grover,	McPherson,	Van Wyck,
Davis of Illinois,	Hale,	Maxey,	Vest,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Colorado,	Morrill,	Voorhees,
Edgerton,	Hill of Georgia,	Platt of N. Y.,	Walker,
Edmunds,	Johnston,	Plumb,	Williams.
Fair,	Jonas,	Rollins,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. HARRIS. There was no quorum on the last vote, I believe; 20 to 17 was the vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is right; there was not a quorum voting.

Mr. HARRIS. Then, I suppose, the regular order is to adjourn or have a call of the Senate. I do not know anything the Senate can do in that condition but adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Tennessee must be happy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will proceed to call the roll of the Senate.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and forty-six Senators answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a quorum present, and the question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] that the Senate do now adjourn until Monday next at twelve o'clock. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. HARRIS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE,] but I have a right to vote if it should be necessary to make a quorum. I will not vote at present.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I fear there is some mistake about pairs. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] asked me to pair with him to-day. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] whom I was paired with, and who expects me to pair with him, is not in his seat. So it appears I have two pairs now on hand. Therefore I must ask some democrat who is not paired under the circumstances to help me with one of the pairs.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] is absent. I do not know that he is paired with any one. I have been pairing him with the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] heretofore, and I suggest to the Senator from West Virginia that he transfer one of his pairs to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That relieves me.

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. PLATT.]

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

Mr. JOHNSTON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. MCPHERSON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. SEWELL.]

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. KELLOGG. I vote "yea."

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I vote "yea."

Mr. SAUNDERS. I vote "yea."

Mr. PLUMB. According to my pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] I was authorized to vote if it was necessary to make a quorum. Understanding that to be the case, I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—22.

Burnside,	Ferry,	Kellogg,	Platt of Conn.,
Cameron of Pa.,	Frye,	McDill,	Plumb,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Saulsbury,
Conger,	Hawley,	Mahone,	Sawyer.

So the motion was agreed to; and (at six o'clock and eighteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday next at twelve o'clock, noon.

MONDAY, April 18, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

TESTS OF IRON.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, inclosing a letter from the Chief of Ordnance dated the 11th instant, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 1st instant, a report of the officer in charge of the United States testing-machine upon the resistance to internal pressures of thick hollow cylinders of American cast-iron and of similar cylinders when lined with coiled wrought-iron and bronze tubes; which was ordered to lie on the table.

WESTERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF VIRGINIA.

Mr. JOHNSTON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to furnish the Senate with copies of any papers or documents received from W. S. Lurty, United States district attorney for the western district of Virginia, in relation to the late report of C. C. Lancaster, special agent of the Treasury Department, touching the western judicial district of Virginia.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of the last day's session of the Senate, being the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] providing for the election of certain officers of the Senate, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone the resolution indefinitely, on which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HARRIS. Some days since the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] sent to the Clerk's desk and had read an extract from a communication to the International Review representing the condition and the amounts scaled down or repudiated of the debt of a number of the Southern States, thirteen in number, I believe. In that statement I find the debt of the State of Tennessee stated, to have been in 1842 $3,198,166; in 1852, $3,776,856; in 1860, $20,896,606; in 1870, $38,539,802; date after the war when debt reached the highest point it is stated at $41,863,406. Then in another column, "amount of debt repudiated and scaled down between period when it was highest and June, 1880," $16,177,584 is stated as the amount repudiated or scaled down by the State of Tennessee.

Regarding the statement at the time as coming from an irresponsible newspaper, while I knew it was wholly untrue in respect of Tennessee, I did not deem it necessary to notice the error of statement. But subsequent to that time the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] have both referred to the statement as one prepared by Mr. Porter, of the Census Bureau, thus giving it a semi-official character, and therefore a degree of authenticity that it could never have had as a mere newspaper article. I see the public press is commenting upon it as a fact that Tennessee had repudiated at least to that extent of her debt. I desire to say that there is no truth in the statement so far as applied to Tennessee; that she has at no time repudiated a single penny of her debt.

I hold in my hand, which I propose to have read by the Secretary, a communication from Mr. Porter, of the Census Bureau, correcting the error of the Review article which Mr. Porter as a newspaper correspondent prepared and sent to the paper. This is the official statement of Mr. Porter, from the Census Bureau, and I ask that the Clerk shall read it in order that Tennessee may stand vindicated from the wrong that has been done her by the statement in the Review article and the semi-official character sought to be given to it by the statement of the junior Senators from Massachusetts and Ohio.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 18, 1881.

SIR: In reply to your request of the 15th instant, I have the honor to say that the article "State debts and repudiation," published in The International Review, of November, 1880, was written by me at the especial request of John T. Morse, jr., of Boston, editor of the Review, and cannot be considered in any sense official. The article was a very difficult one to write and in its compilation some three hundred references were consulted. Over eighty of these references are given in the foot-notes and can be consulted and the accuracy of the figures ascertained beyond question. The data used were collected by me as a private individual before the investigation into the financial condition of States and repudiation of debts, which I am now conducting, was begun.

I exceedingly regret that the omission of a foot-note in one of the tables should have done your State an injustice. This foot-note explained that through the inability or neglect of some of the railroads of Tennessee, which corporations had actually been warmed into existence by the State, the creditors of the State had lost a good deal in the depreciation of the bonds and in interest, but that the State had not, up to that date, (November, 1880,) repudiated one dollar, unless the refusal to acknowledge the Mineral Home bonds may be considered repudiation. As none of these bonds, however, were sold, being held by the financial agent of the railroad company at the time the State refused to recognize them, even this, by no method of reasoning, can be construed into repudiation. In the letter-press of the International Review article, (page 584,) I explained the fact that the State had in part liquidated the debt by the sale of railroads; and took the ground that Tennessee would settle her debt upon such terms as would be honorable to the credit of the State and satisfactory to the bondholders. It is gratifying to know that all this has come about, and I firmly believe that with this adjustment will begin an era of renewed prosperity for the State.

According to the somewhat imperfect data in this office at the present time, the history of the State debt of Tennessee may be briefly stated as follows:

At the close of the war of the rebellion the State of Tennessee found itself greatly reduced in wealth, its industries and commerce impaired, many of its railroads destroyed, and its citizens in no condition to meet the demands of a heavy tax. Its Legislature had always been foremost in encouraging commerce, aiding the construction of turnpikes, and fostering legitimate railroad enterprises which were to open up the vast resources of the State. The first bonds were issued as far back as 1833 to the Union Bank of Tennessee, and amounted to $500,000. Five years later, the State issued $2,500,000 of bonds to the Bank of Tennessee. In 1836 the first bonds were issued to a turnpike company, and since then no less than thirty-three turnpike companies have been aided by the credit of the State. As far back as 1838 the first railroad in Tennessee received State encouragement, and from that time until the war broke out the State repeatedly loaned bonds to railroad companies. The bonds were sold and the proceeds used in building the roads. To give some idea of the useful purposes for which the entire debt of Tennessee was created, I respectfully call attention to the following table, in which are grouped the amounts issued according to the purposes of issuance:

Banks	$3,000,000 00
Railroads	29,251,250 00
Turnpikes	1,499,066 66
Capitol	866,000 00
Agriculture Bureau	30,000 00
Hermitage	48,000 00
Renewals	697,000 00
Funding bonds (1866)	4,941,000 00
Funding bonds (1868)	2,200,000 00
New series (1873)	6,641,000 00
	49,173,316 66

During the war the interest on the State bonds issued between 1833 and 1861 went in default, and on the 1st day of January, 1866, I find the debt of Tennessee was as follows:

	Original.	Interest.	Total.
State debt proper	$3,894,607	$849,553	$4,744,160
State bonds loaned	14,006,000	3,769,507	17,775,507
State bonds indorsed	2,207,000	550,680	2,759,680
Aggregate debt and liabilities	20,107,607	5,169,740	25,279,347

The bonds, which amounted, with accrued interest, to $17,775,507, had been issued to the following railroad companies:

Companies to which issued.	Original debt.	Interest to January, 1866.	Total debt.
East Tennessee and Virginia	$1,599,000	$444,700	$2,043,700
East Tennessee and Georgia	1,160,000	272,880	1,432,880
Memphis and Charleston	1,081,000	262,980	1,343,980
Memphis and Ohio	1,493,000	403,110	1,896,110
McMinnville and Manchester	364,000	87,360	451,360
Tennessee and Alabama	853,000	231,581	1,084,581
Mississippi Central and Tennessee	574,000	154,980	728,980
Mobile and Ohio	1,296,000	349,920	1,645,920
Edgefield and Kentucky and Louisville and Nashville	211,000	63,300	274,300
Clarksville, Memphis and Louisville	1,042,000	312,600	1,354,600
Winchester and Alabama	433,000	143,259	576,259
Louisville and Nashville	455,000	126,015	581,015
Nashville and Northwestern	1,455,000	392,400	1,847,400
Edgefield and Kentucky	645,000	200,162	845,162
Central Southern	534,000	128,160	662,160
Rogersville and Jefferson	159,000	38,160	197,160
Mississippi and Tennessee	95,000	22,800	117,800
Nashville and Chattanooga	150,000	36,000	186,000
Cincinnati, Cumberland Gap and Charleston	132,000	31,680	163,680
Knoxville and Kentucky	180,000	43,200	223,200
Bonds issued to turnpike companies	65,000	17,060	82,060
Bonds issued to agricultural bureau	30,000	7,200	37,200
Total State bonds loaned	14,006,000	3,769,507	17,775,507

In addition to this, the State had, as above shown, indorsed $2,207,000 bonds, analysis of which is presented:

Railroad companies.	Original bonds.	Interest to Jan., 1866.	Total liabilities.
Nashville and Chattanooga	$1,546,000	$371,040	$1,917,040
East Tennessee and Virginia	185,000	44,400	229,400
East Tennessee and Georgia	126,000	30,240	156,240
Memphis and Little Rock	350,000	105,000	455,000
Total	2,207,000	550,680	2,757,680

The above debt was partially refunded, and March 12, 1866, the governor issued an official notice to the bondholders of the State that he was prepared to issue to persons holding bonds or coupons, or entitled to interest past due, new bonds in lieu thereof, January, 1866, and payable January, 1892. A large portion of the bonds had been issued to railroad companies that were, for a long time, unable to pay the interest. In 1869, talks of repudiation were heard, on the ground that the internal-improvement act of 1852 forbade the sale of the bonds of the State at less than par, while a portion had been sold less than par by the railroad companies in order to raise money.

In October, 1869, the State comptroller reported that some of the railroad companies to whom the State had loaned bonds, which had been sold and the proceeds used in building the roads—dead to any feeling of gratitude to the State—were intending to swindle the State by refusing to pay interest on the bonds. Having thus depreciated the State securities in the market, it was their purpose to buy the State coupons at a low figure and present them as payment for the interest they owed the State. In order to stop this, the comptroller refused to accept the coupons and suggested the propriety of selling a sufficient number of the State railroads for the bonds of the State, thus lessening the liabilities some eight or ten millions of dollars. November 3 the delinquent roads were offered for public sale, but as there was no bidder they were not sold. The following roads were finally sold, at the dates given and the prices named:

Railroads.	When sold.	Amount sold for.
Edgefield and Kentucky	Aug., 1871	$900,000
Cincinnati, Cumberland Gap and Charleston	Oct., 1871	300,000
Knoxville and Kentucky	Oct., 1871	350,000
McMinnville and Manchester	Aug., 1871	300,000
Winchester and Alabama	Sept., 1871	300,000
Rogersville and Jefferson	March, 1872	33,000
Nashville and Northwestern	Oct., 1871	2,400,000
Knoxville and Charleston	March, 1872	105,000
East Tennessee and Western North Carolina	Nov., 1871	20,000
Memphis, Clarksville and Louisville	Sept., 1871	1,700,000
Tennessee and Pacific		300,000
		6,698,000

Below I have prepared a list of railroads which retired their debts to the State:

Railroads.	Date of retiring.	Amount of debt.
East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia	Aug., 1870	$4,117,000
Nashville and Decatur	March, 1871	2,700,000
Memphis and Charleston	July, 1877	1,875,000
Memphis and Ohio	May, 1871	2,396,000
Mississippi and Tennessee	Jan., 1878	420,800
Mobile and Ohio	Jan., 1872	1,684,800
Mississippi Central	Dec., 1877	1,199,000
Nashville and Chattanooga	Jan., 1874	395,000
Total		14,787,600

In this way the debt was reduced as follows:

1870	$43,052,625 25
1871	33,539,802 25
1872	33,190,938 37
1873	30,632,200 76
1874	27,920,386 45

There were due the State in 1874, from solvent railroads, $3,461,871.75; from indorsed bonds, for which the State was secondarily liable, $2,152,400; from purchases of delinquent roads, $823,217; total amount due State, $6,437,548.75; making the debt, with these credits deducted $21,482,837 70
Amount in treasury at this time was 501,986 45

Leaving the net debt 20,980,851 25

Thus in July, 1874, the debt of Tennessee, after deducting available assets, was less than $21,000,000. The total amount of State debt canceled between August, 1870, and December, 1877, was $21,845,600.

In January, 1877, the commission of the Legislature of Tennessee appointed to confer with the committee of gentlemen who held a conference in New York City on the subject of Southern State debts came to the deliberate conclusion that after adding all the arrears of interest and the interest to accrue to July, 1877, the aggregate amount of State debt should be readjusted by the issue of new bonds at the rate of 60 per cent. of the total—i. e., for every $1,000 the amount of $600 in new bonds should be paid, the new bonds to bear 6 per cent. interest from July, 1877. But this proposition and several others looking to a cutting down of the principal of the debt were rejected by the Legislature, and a bill was passed a few weeks ago providing for the settlement, dollar for dollar, of the bonds and unpaid interest in new three percents, with tax-receivable coupons, redeemable after five years and payable in 1899.

Trusting these rather hurriedly gathered facts may be of some service to you, and believing you will find them reliable, I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

ROBERT P. PORTER,
Special Agent on Wealth, Debt, and Taxation.

Hon. ISHAM G. HARRIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. HARRIS. I simply desired to have the paper read in order that Tennessee might be vindicated against the false statement contained in the newspaper article that has been submitted and so frequently commented on.

In respect to the Mineral Home bonds referred to there, I desire to say that they amounted to $160,000, were issued without authority of law, and while yet in the hands of the railroad company to which they were issued they were recalled. This action, as stated in the paper just read, by any possible rule of construction cannot be regarded as repudiation.

The whole statement so far as it attributes to Tennessee the repudiating any part of her debt is wholly untrue. I do not care to say more. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. SAULSBURY called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. DAWES. What is the motion?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAWES. Before we pass upon the pending resolution?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.]

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) I do not see the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] in his seat. I am paired with him.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] on this and all other questions.

Mr. GROOME, (when his name was called.) I am paired temporarily with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. GROVER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.] I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. BROWN, (when the name of Mr. HILL, of Georgia, was called.) My colleague [Mr. HILL] is absent for a few days and is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.] I announce the pair for the day.

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. COKE, (when Mr. MAXEY's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.] I make the announcement for the day.

Mr. MILLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.]

Mr. PLATT, of New York, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from California, [Mr. FARLEY.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. VEST, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.] I announce the pair for the day.

Mr. WALKER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. HILL.] The pair will continue until his return to the Senate.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. On this question I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.] Were he present, he would vote "yea" and I would vote "nay." I announce the pair for the day.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. My colleague [Mr. SAWYER] is paired for the day with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. CAMDEN.]

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. ROLLINS] is paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES.]

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Bayard,	George,	Johnston,	Pendleton,
Brown,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Call,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Ransom,
Cockrell,	Harris,	McPherson,	Saulsbury,
Coke,	Jackson,	Morgan,	Slater.

NAYS—21.

Allison,	Dawes,	Ingalls,	Platt of Conn.,
Blair,	Edgerton,	Logan,	Sewell,
Burnside,	Ferry,	McDill,	Sherman.
Cameron of Wis.,	Frye,	McMillan,
Conger,	Harrison,	Mahone,
Conkling,	Hawley,	Mitchell,

ABSENT—35.

Anthony,	Farley,	Jones of Nevada,	Sawyer,
Beck,	Garland,	Kellogg,	Teller,
Butler,	Groome,	Maxey,	Vance,
Camden,	Grover,	Miller,	Van Wyck,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hale,	Morrill,	Vest,
Davis of Illinois,	Hill of Colorado,	Platt of N. Y.,	Voorhees,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Georgia,	Plumb,	Walker,
Edmunds,	Hoar,	Rollins,	Williams.
Fair,	Jones of Florida,	Saunders,

So the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone the pending resolution indefinitely.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY,] that the Senate adjourn. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GROOME, (when his name was called.) I am paired temporarily with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. MILLER, (when his name was called.) I will announce for the day that I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have voted on this motion, and I wish to state that I did it in compliance with an understanding with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] that on all questions except motions to go into executive session I was at liberty to vote, but that on motions to go into executive session I am paired with him.

Mr. RANSOM. I believe it has been stated that my colleague [Mr. VANCE] is paired with the Senator from California, [Mr. MILLER.]

Mr. MILLER. I have announced the pair.

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Bayard,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Brown,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Ransom,
Call,	Harris,	McPherson,	Saulsbury,
Cockrell,	Jackson,	Morgan,	Slater,
Coke,	Johnston,	Pendleton,	Voorhees.

NAYS—22.

Allison,	Dawes,	Ingalls,	Mitchell,
Blair,	Edgerton,	Kellogg,	Platt of Conn.,
Burnside,	Ferry,	Logan,	Sewell,
Cameron of Wis.,	Frye,	McDill,	Sherman.
Conger,	Harrison,	McMillan,
Conkling,	Hawley,	Mahone,

ABSENT—34.

Anthony,	Farley,	Jones of Florida,	Sawyer,
Beck,	Garland,	Jones of Nevada,	Teller,
Butler,	George,	Maxey,	Vance,

Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Colorado,	Plumb,	Williams.
Edmunds,	Hill of Georgia,	Rollins,
Fair,	Hoar,	Saunders,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. The Senate having decided that they would not proceed to consider executive business and that they would not adjourn, it seems to me that it is hardly necessary to appeal to the Senate that they now proceed without further delay to the consideration of the pending resolution. I hope we shall now take a vote upon it.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to lay the pending resolution on the table. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt as to the result.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRIS. Pending that motion, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAWES. Why, Mr. President, we have just decided that we would not do that.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt as to the result.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, (when Mr. CAMDEN'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER] for the day.

Mr. GROOME, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 19, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Bayard,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Brown,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Saulsbury,
Call,	Harris,	McPherson,	Slater,
Cockrell,	Jackson,	Pendleton,	Voorhees.
Coke,	Johnston,	Pugh,

So the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to lay the pending resolution on the table, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] on this question.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. GROOME, (when his name was called.) I again announce the fact that I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] until he returns to the Chamber.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 20, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Bayard,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Brown,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Ransom,

Fair,	Hoar,	Rollins,

So the Senate refused to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. HOAR] is paired for the day with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.] I wish to say further that over the resolution I have offered there has been all the consumption of the time of the Senate. The minority of the Senate have resorted to every motion known to parliamentary law to defeat it except one. All of these motions a majority of the Senate have voted down.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I inquire whether the motion to lay on the table is debatable?

Mr. DAWES. The motion to lay on the table has just been decided in the negative.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion to lay on the table has been decided in the negative. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to postpone the resolution indefinitely.

Mr. DAWES. And upon that I have the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts is in order.

Mr. DAWES. I was saying that I was sorry that I had so disturbed my friends on the other side. I have said that the minority of the Senate had resorted to every motion except one to defeat this resolution, and they have therefore been the cause themselves of all this delay in the business of the country. Upon each trial of these motions the majority of the Senate have decided them in the negative. They have been unwilling to resort to the one only motion left, and that is to vote on the passage of the resolution itself. I have only to say that if they will vote upon the passage of the resolution, and if the majority of the Senate shall express the opinion that this resolution should not pass, those who shall happen on that vote to be in the minority will forever hold their peace. This is a struggle to ascertain whether it is the Senate or a minority in this Senate that is to control public business. I therefore appeal to this minority that for once they will try and vote upon the legitimate question whether this resolution shall pass or not; and if the majority of the Senate shall say now that it should not pass we will proceed at once to the public business that the pending question on the resolution has obstructed these many days. It is because some persons in this Senate, not constituting the Senate itself, are unwilling to submit to what a majority of the Senate shall say upon the passage of this resolution, that all the delay in the public business has been caused.

It is not the question whether one man or another may occupy for the summer, or even for a longer period, any particular office about the Senate. That is not of the slightest consequence. So far as I am concerned and so far as I desire to see action upon this resolution, I do not care one copper whether it be that this man or that man shall occupy this office or that office, but I do desire to have it settled whether the Senate shall rule itself or not. I do desire to have it settled before the country whether this is a government of majorities or not; and when that shall be determined, whether it shall be that the present officers remain in their places or that others shall take them, it matters not with me, provided that principle which has been assaulted in the opposition to this resolution (unconsciously in the outset, I am quite certain, by those enlisted in opposition to it) is recognized and acted upon. Certainly those gentlemen cannot fail to see clearly now that the opposition to a vote on this resolution has come to be an announcement to the country that no longer shall the Senate rule itself and no longer shall this Government be administered by its majority, but that those instrumentalities established for the protection of minorities, not for the destruction of the will of the majority, they will lay hold of for the purpose of overturning the very institutions of this Government under which we live.

That is why I am here constantly pressing upon an unwilling Senate the consideration of a resolution which in and of itself, beginning and ending with it, is of very little consequence to me or to any one that I may have represented in pressing the resolution; but beyond, far-reaching beyond it, which no man can control in the future if we let go now, is the question whether it be legitimate in this Government whenever a measure does not meet the views of a minority—and all measures to that extent are alike—whether the people will sanction and uphold the doctrine that a minority in opposition to that measure shall resort to methods within their reach not only to convince the judgment and the understanding of the majority, (always open to them and always proper and praiseworthy and commendable in this government of thinking men,) but also to methods that do not appeal to the understanding and judgment and conscience of a majority but defy the will of that majority.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I should like to ask the Senator whether or not, previous to the close of the last session, he did not sit in his seat day after day to prevent the majority from carrying out their wishes to go into executive session for the purpose of confirming a hundred and more appointments that were then upon the table? Did not he and every Senator on that side of the House sit in their seats and refuse to vote? I should like a direct answer to that.

Mr. DAWES. Has the Senator got done?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. One other question after that is answered.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator still retained the floor; I did not know whether he was through or not.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator understands.

Mr. DAWES. That is not a new question, Mr. President. The ability to put that question on the other side of the Chamber seems to constitute the entire staple upon which justification of the present attitude of that side of the House is sought. Can the Senator find no other justification for his own act than what he himself considers a bad example on this side? Has the Senator no other reason to go before the American people in justification of what he is now doing than his ability in his own judgment to say "you're another?" If the Senator's statesmanship rises no higher, if the Senator can build up a democratic platform on which to rise (if the Senator from Ohio will allow me) to that upper sky in which the democracy are in the distant future to dwell, then the bad——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, rose.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator may be impatient, but I have not forgotten his question.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I take it the Senator will not answer it whether he has forgotten it or not. He knows he did it and I do not believe he intends to answer directly, though I hope he will.

Mr. DAWES. Well, the Senator ought to be told that he who doubts is in trouble.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I did not catch what the Senator said.

Mr. DAWES. I desired to suggest, before I answered the Senator's question, to him that that was an old, worn-out interrogatory.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then why does the Senator continually repeat over and over again the charge——

Mr. DAWES. If my friend will try to compose himself in his seat I will answer.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. We have never been able to get an answer from the Senator from Massachusetts; no matter if the question is worn out, he has always avoided an answer in some way.

Mr. DAWES. Now, if my friend has really and in fact resumed his seat, I will go on and say that I was trying to impress upon him—I do not think I am encouraged by the result, but I will suggest it to the other Senators on the other side—that it is not much of an interrogatory after all. It has been tried over and over again, and I say to the other side that if they have no further justification for the proceedings of the last six weeks, more or less, than what is suggested by the interrogatory of the Senator from West Virginia, they are in a position most miserable.

Suppose they can say that this side of the Senate in the last session did do that which they did not approve of themselves and which they condemned themselves, does that justify a proceeding of this kind with the avowed purpose which is here patent? Now I want the Senator from West Virginia, who comprehends so clearly always everything that is said here in the Senate, to see this difference. The proceedings on the other side are with the avowed purpose—the Senator understands what "avowed" means—of defying and thwarting the will of the Senate itself. This is declared. It is declared by the distinguished Senator now in his seat that before this Senate should say for itself whether it would vote on this resolution, the humble individual who presented it should be grayer than he is now, and that it should not be done till December. That is the avowal of the distinguished Senator and his associates on that side. They have resorted to these dilatory motions, not for time, not that the Senate may be full and a fair vote had. There was none of this dilatory spirit on the other side when there happened accidentally to be four seats empty on this side; there was what they have seen fit to call on this side "an indecent haste" at that moment; but the moment——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I fear my friend from Massachusetts has mistaken the question. He appears to be answering now for this session. I asked as to the last session, and we have not got the answer yet.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, "an indecent haste" when four seats were empty; but when they were full the haste had disappeared. That is the distinction which I know I have but to state and the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, quicker than any associate of his on that side, will see and feel and be the quickest to recognize it.

Now he asks me what I did in the last session. I will tell him what according to my recollection I did not do. I never voted (or refrained from voting) to keep the Senate out of executive session in the last session of the last Congress at any time. There was never a moment, according to my recollection, when any Senator moved to proceed to the consideration of executive business that I was ever found either withholding my vote or voting against the motion. If the majority of ten on that side did not go into executive session they need not undertake to lay it to the door of this side of the Senate. No filibustering, that occurs to me now, on this side prevented the other side from putting to a vote of the Senate the question of going into executive session whenever they pleased.

Now, sir, I trust I have answered the Senator. I have suggested to the Senator to look about him for some new interrogatory that has a broader and a wider scope and application than this; but as the Senator is wedded to the old ways he can find nothing but to repeat that interrogatory; and I say to him that in my judgment it is not a satisfactory answer to the American people for the democratic side of this Senate to say "We will thwart the majority of the Senate of the United States; we will defy it and prescribe ourselves," as the distinguished Senator from Ohio did with a care which almost indicated that he spoke the result of a caucus, "This we will permit you to do; that you may do; the other thing you may do; but this thing you shall not do." That in substance was what was announced to us as the result of the last apparent conference of the other side, that a minority shall put upon paper and submit a cartel to the Senate of the United States, saying to that Senate of the United States, constituted by the Constitution, whose will is spoken by a majority, which we all swear to submit to, "A few specified things we will permit the Senate of the United States to do, but this thing does not meet the approval of a minority of the Senate, and that minority serves notice on the Senate itself that the Senate shall not do it."

With these remarks, sir, designed solely——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hope the Senator will not take his seat until he answers my question.

Mr. DAWES. I will finish this remark, however, and hold myself on the witness stand.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have waited very patiently.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I thought I would make one last appeal to the judgment and to the patriotism of the other side of this Chamber and see whether they were determined to carry on this work of attempting to overthrow the fundamental principles of this Government fighting over a matter of no more importance than the selection of a couple of officers to stand at this door or in the Secretary's office——

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope the Senator——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I trust the Senator from Massachusetts will be allowed to answer me first.

Mr. DAWES. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will withdraw his remark about the "last appeal." We have heard that appeal so often that we are delighted with it. I hope he will not announce that this is the "last appeal." We want to hear it again. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. I was really in the hope that I should not be called upon to trouble the Senate with another remark.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President——

Mr. DAWES. I cannot yield to the Senator from West Virginia just now. I must satisfy my friend from Delaware. I was, when I got up, of the opinion that our friends on the other side could not have realized what they were doing, and that coming to look at it like statesmen they would see that this was not only a wrong cause in which they were engaged, but that sooner or later they must give over any such contest as this with everything in this country at stake upon it; but the Senator from Delaware indicates by his remark that there is no such thing as giving us a reasonable ground to hope that the scales will fall from their eyes and that they will see things as they are. I express my sincere regret at the remark of the Senator from Delaware. I will now hear the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to say that at no time during the closing weeks of the last session, within six weeks I think he said, did he refuse to vote to go into executive session. Did I understand him aright?

Mr. DAWES. I meant to say that so far as I recollected I never then voted against going into executive session; but the Senator's memory and his solicitude in reference to my vote will make him more reliable than myself in that respect, and he may be right. I would not contradict him.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think the RECORD will show that not only the Senator from Massachusetts but every Senator who sits on that side of the House refused to vote more than once, perhaps a dozen times, on a motion to go into executive session. The Senator either sat in his seat and refused to vote, or went into the cloak-room when the roll was called on such motions. I think the RECORD will show that.

Mr. CONKLING. When was that?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The latter part of last session. The Senator from New York well recollects it.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator recollect the particular occasion?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think there were half a dozen occasions. I think the Senator from Massachusetts, upon reflection, probably will withdraw his remark that he never refused during the last session, say the last two weeks of that session, to vote to go into executive session. I am not sure about his record, as I have not looked into it, but I am sure there was not a Senator on that side of the House who did not refuse to vote more than once, and perhaps half a dozen times.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to make one suggestion?

Mr. DAWES. As soon as the Senator from West Virginia is through I will.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia has the floor.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I yield.

Mr. DAWES. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. While the colloquy has been going on, I have taken occasion to look at the proceedings of the last night of the late session. Without going back to the former votes, this I find: On a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business the yeas were 36 and the nays none; three gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber voting with the democrats, the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] and the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] In a few moments after the refusal of the other side to vote, except those three Senators, the yeas and nays were called on another question, and twenty-two republican Senators voted, to wit, Messrs. ANTHONY, BALDWIN, BLAIR, BURNSIDE, CAMERON of Pennsylvania, CONKLING, FERRY, HILL of Colorado, INGALLS, JONES of Nevada, KELLOGG, Kirkwood, LOGAN, MCMILLAN, MORRILL, Paddock, PLATT, PLUMB, ROLLINS, SAUNDERS, TELLER, and Windom, and in a very few moments again a motion was made to go into executive session by Mr. RANSOM, of North Carolina, and there were 33 votes in the affirmative and none in the negative. We lost all our republican allies that time except Mr. FERRY.

Mr. BURNSIDE. How many democratic allies did you lose?

Mr. BECK. Another motion was made in a few moments, and the yeas and nays being taken, there were 33 yeas and 1 nay, the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] voting "nay" that time.

Mr. CONKLING. What was that vote on which the Senator says I voted?

Mr. BECK. A motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business. Twice there were no votes in the negative, and the third time one.

Mr. DAWES. While the Senator is going along will he not, as he has the RECORD there, tell us where the ten majority were?

Mr. BECK. They were paired, a good many of them, with gentlemen on the other side who were not here. You say you now have a "constitutional majority" consisting of thirty-eight Senators, and yet your vote is only twenty-one this morning. Suppose we had done as you did then and gone into our cloak-rooms and not voted this morning, where would your "constitutional majority" have been? They would have been absent, a good many of them. Twenty-one is as many as the Senator has been able to vote this morning. We were not able to vote thirty-nine on the occasion referred to, and therefore we could not proceed. To-day you can vote only twenty-one, and therefore you cannot proceed if we were to be as ill-natured—but that is not a good word—as independent as you were then. The Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. CONKLING. What day of the month was this?

Mr. BECK. The 3d day of March.

Mr. CONKLING. At what time in the day?

Mr. BECK. Late at night.

Mr. CONKLING. What does the Senator mean by "late at night?"

Mr. BECK. The RECORD does not show the exact hour.

Mr. CONKLING. The RECORD does show.

Mr. DAWES. The record of a motion to adjourn near there will give the time.

Mr. BECK. It was the last night of the session.

Mr. CONKLING. The RECORD shows the hour.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to set my friend right.

Mr. BECK. In looking over it I notice that the Senator from Massachusetts seems to have been absent all the time. On the next morning, however, at half-past nine o'clock, when the yeas and nays were called, the Senator from Massachusetts is found voting on the yeas and nays. I expect, from the look of the RECORD, that he was not present in the evening, because he did not vote on either side even when gentlemen on the other side were voting. I merely rose to say that I happened to pick up the RECORD while he was speaking and I saw the facts about it.

Mr. DAWES. I made the remark to the Senator from West Virginia precisely as I understood the facts. I have no recollection now of any desire on my part during the last session to keep the Senate out of executive session at any time. There have been times when at the last hours of the session I thought it was more desirable to proceed with the legislative business than to go into executive session then, when we could not accomplish anything in executive session; but on the particular occasion to which the Senator has called the attention of the Senate I unfortunately accommodated a Senator on the other side, according to my recollection now, and paired and went home. I was not present until about nine o'clock in the morning, and then I resumed my place and voted. But so far as the Senator from West Virginia or any Senator on that side has supposed that there was any parallel between my action in the last days of the session and the avowed and determined purpose of the Senators on the other side, not to substitute the legitimate business of one kind for the legitimate business of another kind, not for the purpose of getting an opportunity to have a full vote, not for the purpose of getting a fuller discussion, but for the avowed purpose that the will of the majority, whatever it may be, shall not be expressed in this Senate. That is the avowed purpose. It is to that I have addressed my remarks this morning.

I do not so far as I am concerned care at all, it is not so far as I am concerned the weight of a feather whether this resolution be voted up or voted down; but what concerns me is the great question beyond that, swallowing up everything else, vital in the struggle to maintain the integrity and power and will of this Government that has been going on among the American people for twenty years against that fatal error, assuming all phases and adopting all devices and resorting to all methods if thereby the will of the majority as it speaks through the Constitution and the laws of this land may be perverted and defied and trampled down. It is that great question which concerns me, and it is not the little petty consideration of whether this or that gentleman shall occupy this or that petty office about this Senate Chamber. And it is a question that did not originate with the session of the Senate; it lays further back. The American people did hope they had settled it when it took the form of violent opposition; but by degrees it has been forced upon the American people in many ways and by many means and methods, until here in this Chamber it is openly avowed and the democratic organization through its leader upon this floor openly prescribes upon paper what the will of the majority shall be permitted to carry out and what that majority shall not. When such a statement is made to the American people they will not stop to inquire much into the merits of the one or the other, but they will inquire, and they will not give over the inquiry until the people themselves will so answer it that it will not be resorted to again—they will inquire whether it be true or not that this is a Government of majorities. Whether the majority be one or one hundred thousand matters not; it is the decree of this Government that that majority is omnipotent under it, and he who refuses to obey that will sets himself up against his Government in a vain—I believe a vain, certainly an unholy—attempt to overthrow it.

I hope, sir, we may have a vote upon this resolution and let the majority determine whether it shall be adopted or not.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts has said over and over again that this question was not who should occupy the offices; I understood him to say that two or three times. Is not that the question pending, who shall occupy these offices? I ask the Senator, if that is not the question, what other question is pending? From the day he introduced his resolution down to the present time it has been a contest for who shall occupy the offices. I ask the Senator if that is not the case?

Mr. DAWES. No, sir. I most respectfully say to my distinguished friend from West Virginia, no, sir.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then, what is the question?

Mr. DAWES. From the day the resolution was taken up for consideration until this hour it has been nothing more nor less than whether the Senate shall rule itself or not.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator himself introduced three or four resolutions naming three or four different men who should occupy these offices, and he is only trying to get out of the way that which is in it to come to a vote on those particular persons. And now I should like to ask the Senator this question: Suppose that we should ever reach—which I do not know that we shall very soon—the main resolution, which is to turn out the present officers of the Senate and proceed to elect new ones, what then? He says he does not care a fig who occupy the offices; that is not the question here; but I ask him directly, would he vote for any republican except those who are named in the resolutions? Would he vote for any man in the United States except those he has already named? Yet he says he does not care who occupy the offices. I take it there is not a Senator on that side of the Chamber who will vote for any persons except the particular men named; and one of them would not even vote for the man proposed to be expelled from the Virginia Legislature because he was a debt-payer.

Mr. DAWES. How completely the Senator from West Virginia meets what I have said! How his side of the Chamber and the waiting democracy of this country must rest satisfied that an answer, which can be met nowhere, as a justification for resisting the majority of the Senate, has at last been discovered, and it lies in the fact that the Senator wants to know whether I would vote for any other republican or not! That is the answer to a grave allegation laid directly at the door of the Senator from West Virginia that he avowed here in substance—not three legislative days have passed since he avowed in substance—that this Senate should never determine for itself a question whether it would rule itself or not. Whether I vote for one republican or another, the Senator has but to try me and then I will satisfy him. Let the vote be taken, and whoever shall command a majority of the Senate on that vote commands me, and I shall be most cheerfully acquiescent in the will of that majority.

Sir, I am not one of those who have spent the last generation seeking how this government of majorities may be overthrown. What little I have been able to do in my life-time has been to build up and strengthen the will of the majority of this nation expressed according to the Constitution which I have sworn to support. I have never been found in any enterprise, large or small, grand or petty, on any field or in any presence, the purpose of which has been to upset the will of the majority, however it might not conform to my own judgment or my own choice. If I cannot appeal to the judgment of men, if I cannot reach the consciences of men, if I cannot persuade men to think and act with me, I will abide the time when what would seem to me to be a clearer insight in public affairs and public considerations shall induce men to think more as I think and act more as I shall act. But, sir, I do not know, consistent with my duty to my country, any method that it is lawful for me to adopt the purpose of which is to overthrow the will of a majority legally and constitutionally expressed in this land. If I cannot obey that will so expressed, I will go under a flag that is not lifted by a majority, under a flag that does not float at its head "The will of the majority rules where this flag floats."

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, it would be amusing to listen to the gravity and solemnity of manner and language in which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] presents his views this morning in reference to the action of the minority in resorting to means prescribed by the rules of the Senate for the purpose of defeating an object to which they are opposed if we did not know that the Senator sometimes indulges in that kind of harangue. Everybody knows in the Senate Chamber that at the very commencement of this session, for nearly two weeks, that side of the Chamber resorted to the same motions that we are now making for the purpose of preventing a clear majority in this body from organizing the committees of the Senate. No one can deny that. The records of the Senate itself disclose the fact that for nearly two entire weeks the republican side of the Chamber resorted to the very tactics of which they now complain of us in order to prevent a clear majority of this body from organizing the committees of the Senate; and everybody knows that during the last session, toward the close, all these tactics, all these motions, were resorted to by the republican side of the Chamber to prevent the majority of the body from doing just what it desired. It is very amusing, I say, with this knowledge resting in the mind of the Senator from Massachusetts, that he rises here and gravely undertakes to lecture us on doing what he and his party have done so recently.

We have reason to believe not only that the minority then acted in this manner, but that it was the predetermined purpose of their caucus to act in this manner whenever their wishes were not gratified. I hold in my hand what purports to be the proceedings of a republican caucus during the last session of Congress, when another question was before the Senate—I refer to the question of the seat of the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. KELLOGG.] I do not know that this is a correct account of the proceedings of that caucus, for I have never attended a republican caucus, and expect it will be a good many years before I do; but it was published in a paper of this city, purporting to be the proceedings of a republican caucus, and I propose to read a few lines from it to show that the subject of how to resist the majority was a subject gravely considered in the republican caucus:

> The republican Senators held a caucus this morning for the consideration, principally, of the Kellogg case. There was a full attendance—

Of course, if the attendance was full, the Senator from Massachusetts was there—

> Senators CONKLING and Blaine, being among those present, Senator ANTHONY presided. The proposition of the democrats to call the Kellogg case up to-day was mentioned. Senator CONKLING made a speech, insisting upon the republicans fighting the attempt to oust KELLOGG with all the means at their command. Senators Blaine, HOAR, and others coincided in this view. It was decided that when the resolution declaring KELLOGG not entitled to his seat was called up the republicans would make a motion to lay it on the table finally; that if this motion prevailed, all right, but if the democrats defeated it, then the republicans would filibuster against the Kellogg case until the 4th of March, if necessary; that they would adopt any and all sorts of tactics to prevent consideration, and thus throw the responsibility of an extra session for the passage of appropriation bills upon the democrats. Some remarks in regard to the usual or characteristic timidity of the democrats were indulged in to the effect that this timidity would move the democrats to let the Kellogg case go by the board rather than force an extra session.

I say I do not know that this is a correct statement of what occurred in a republican caucus; but if it is true, then it shows that in reference to another case the republican caucus, with a full attendance, gravely came to the conclusion that they would resist the will of the other side of this Chamber, which was then in the majority, by every and all means, resorting to every kind of tactics. With this knowledge of the action of his own party, is it not singular that the Senator from Massachusetts should rise here and lecture us about obstructing the will of the majority of the Senate?

Perhaps the Senator may still be relying upon what they were pleased to term in that caucus the usual "timidity" of the democratic party. I think he will find before this question is settled that if there was ever any timidity that timidity has gone. We have learned that our duty to the country as well as to our party is to resist with determined purpose and determined effort measures so wrong and iniquitous as we believe that to be which is now pending before the Senate.

I did not rise to discuss this question. I may hereafter at some future time give my views more at length upon the general question, but I simply rose now to call attention to the fact and to emphasize the fact that while the Senator from Massachusetts assumes a gravity in the presentation of his views this morning as if we were in rebellion against the Government, we are but practicing what he has practiced not only in the commencement of the present session but at the last session, what he as a member of the republican caucus if he was present, and the statement says there was a full attendance, determined in caucus to do, to resist to the last effort until the 4th of March the object and purpose then desired to be accomplished by the democrats in the Senate.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, the statement that the republican party as a party filibustered at the end of the last Congress I desire now to contradict. I have heard it several times, and I beg now to state that the charge is entirely incorrect. The opposition to an executive session was aided by members of the democratic party on that side. Some of them withheld their votes and others absented themselves without pairing. I acted in concert with some of them myself. It is well now that the whole truth should be known in that matter.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Senator from Kentucky knows very well that there were democratic votes withheld at that time, and it was simply for the purpose of aiding some friends on this side of the Chamber to defeat certain nominations which were distasteful to them. The country had just as well know that. It was not a partisan matter at all. Some of our friends here desired to defeat certain nominations made by the late President because they were not in accord with their views. They solicited aid from both sides of the Chamber and they received aid from both sides of the Chamber. I myself left the Chamber once or twice because I felt bad to sit here and not vote. It seems the Senator from Massachusetts acted in perfect good faith with himself and either was absent or paired all the time. So we did not vote as a party and we did not pair in that matter as republicans and democrats; we paired as friends to those appointments and as opposed to them, and I now say here that to my absolute knowledge democrats on that side of the Chamber withheld their votes.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Will the Senator name the democrats?

Mr. BURNSIDE. I do not think it would be exactly fair; but if the Senator presses it I can name them. I will name two if the Senator presses it, but I do not think it is fair. Of course I do not blame them for it. I know what I state to be the fact, and I do not propose to sit under an imputation of that kind without letting the country know the true state of the case. If I am pressed I will name not only democratic Senators who absented themselves, but democratic Senators who withheld their votes.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think the Senator is wrong if he says any democrat ever withheld his vote. Democrats may have been absent, however.

Mr. BURNSIDE. They went out for the specific reason that they desired to accommodate Senators on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not know that.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I know that perfectly well, and I am not going to sit here and allow an imputation of that kind to be made without contradicting it. It was not a party affair, and I announce to the country and to that side of the Chamber that it was in no sense a party affair. I can name Senators very readily if gentlemen wish me to do so. If the the Senator from Kentucky will consult the records he will find that taking out all the pairs——

Mr. BECK. I have the RECORD, and I assert that the RECORD shows it was absolutely a party vote.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Then the Senator from Kentucky will compel me——

Mr. BECK. There were thirty-three democrats on one side, three times voting "yea," and none on the other side voting at all.

Mr. BURNSIDE. How many democrats failed to vote who were not paired?

Mr. BECK. I do not know about that.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The RECORD will tell you; look at that. Look at the RECORD and see how many democrats failed to vote who were not paired. That tells the story.

Mr. BECK. Then the story will be told to-day, that out of thirty-eight republicans they can only vote twenty-one. Are your men away to-day, or why is your vote so small?

Mr. BURNSIDE. This is a partisan affair, and we are voting every man or pairing every man, and we clearly stand before the country in that light. I announce that I am going with my party, and you announce that you are going with your party. I say distinctly and positively that the action to which the Senator from Kentucky refers, and which has been so often quoted on this floor, was not a partisan affair in any sense. No man thought it was a partisan affair at that time. It was simply a question as to whether we would aid some of our friends on this side of the Chamber to defeat some nominations which President Hayes sent to the Senate. That was the question and the only question.

Mr. BECK. As the Senator has reiterated so often that it was not a partisan affair, and was not this that or the other, the fact is, and the yeas and nays as recorded show the fact to be, that every vote——

Mr. BURNSIDE. But, Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. You have got your statement before the country, now let me state the facts as I understand them.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I wanted to make the statement of the Senator from Kentucky a correct statement; that is all. I should like to have the Senator state how many democrats failed to vote who were not paired, and then he will have stated the whole case.

Mr. BECK. There were thirty-three democrats in this Hall and every one of them voted "yea;" there were twenty-three recorded republicans in this Hall who voted on another question, and every one of them refused to vote. That was the number recorded as present; and the Senator from Rhode Island was one of the twenty-three, for his name stands recorded as one of the twenty-three who three times refused to vote, no democrat refusing to vote, no democrat voting in the negative, on three roll-calls every republican sitting with his arms folded, the Senator from Rhode Island among them.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I ask the Senator now——

Mr. BECK. I desire that record to go to the country as a fact not to be obliterated. I can read the yeas and nays again as I did a few minutes since and show the names. There may have been some democrat paired or somebody who was not here.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator allow me to correct him with reference to myself? I did not sit here with my arms folded. I did just what some democrats did; I went out into that hall and I met democrats there and I talked with them on that subject, and we told each other that we were out there for that purpose, to prevent a quorum. I did not sit here and fold my arms.

Mr. BECK. Look at the RECORD; there is no getting away from it. Recollect that was at the close of a Congress when the republicans were endeavoring not to postpone action upon nominations, not to postpone business, but absolutely to prevent and destroy all possibility by that Congress of acting upon these nominations at all. It was to reach twelve o'clock on the 4th day of March so that all that business should fall with the Congress that then had it under consideration.

If there is anything revolutionary or treasonable in conduct looking to delay, surely it is far worse for a party to seek to destroy altogether and to render it utterly impossible for the business to be considered, than to do what we are doing now, to postpone it until a regular session of the same Congress. We have this indorsement from all the past records of the country except once in 1853 when it was thought to be an easy way to get rid of a Sergeant-at-Arms against whom there were charges, that officers of the Senate never were removed at an executive session, and as I showed a few days ago, even in 1861, in revolutionary times, when the republicans were charging that the officers of the Senate were what they called rebels, many of them placed in position by men who had left the Federal Union with their States, and when they were heaping all sorts of epithets upon their heads for their conduct, so steadily did they even then adhere to the traditions of the Senate that they would not remove one of the Senate officials at the executive session called by Mr. Lincoln on the 4th of March of that year. It is because after telling us for three weeks that all you asked or contended for was to have the committees organized so as to proceed to business, when we had surrendered to you our committee-rooms and our clerks and had given you the power you asked or suggested, and after that you seek to do something else, to form a coalition with parties in Virginia, to throw Federal power and patronage into that State to defeat the regular democracy in a State contest for State officers by an unholy combination, as the country understands it.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to ask him a question? I desire to know whether the Senator from Kentucky or the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] speaks by the authority of his party. The Senator from Kentucky has just announced that his only purpose is to postpone action until the regular session. The Senator from Ohio only a day or two since, in a very careful and elaborate speech, announced that we should not proceed to this business now or at any other time. I desire to know which of the Senators speaks by authority for his party?

Mr. BECK. I speak for myself. When the regular session comes in which these things are generally considered and can be fairly acted upon, I expect to consider this question. I desire to say this to the Senator from Vermont, that Mr. Riddleberger, in my judgment, will not even in December be elected Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate. The Virginia election will then be over, and I hope some republican Senator—if he does not somebody else—will tender to the Senate for Sergeant-at-Arms some man who is a conservative republican, a gentleman who has fought through the war in the Federal Army, who will be here with his wounds to attest his gallantry and who will treat both sides of this House decently, and then republicans can vote between the repudiating much-abused rebel brigadier, Mr. Riddleberger, and a candidate such as I have described who will be tendered to you, I think, by a republican Senator, and I feel sure he will get every vote on this side of the Chamber. You may as well understand that in December next you will not be able to place Mr. Riddleberger in power in this body, and any promises he may make in Virginia this summer of what he will do next December will prove to be as delusive and fallacious as what you desire to do now. We do not intend to have men placed over us—after all we have said, and said honestly and earnestly against them, our servants shall not be allowed to punish us.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to have the Senator answer a question.

Mr. BECK. I will answer anything I can. I did not expect to say a word at this time.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator tell us whether he means to say that he will not in December submit to the will of the majority?

Mr. BECK. I do not. I said I would, but I would make such an issue in December as against that man that you are now seeking to place in power in order to carry an election in Virginia that you will find it extremely difficult to stand up to your contract if you have one.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator mean to announce that the reason of all this opposition by the southern Senators is because Mr. Riddleberger is not a Union soldier?

Mr. BECK. No, sir; it grows out of this: that you in the opinion of this country— I am not going to say anything that will make you challenge me. [Laughter.] I have learned from the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] which he made the other day about the offers, the corrupt offers, that were said to be made by us to the Senator from Virginia, when he contradicted them so flatly, to be careful; I feared that you might have to call upon me to act as your second.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Virginia said he would not disclose what was said in his room unless he was invited by the other side, and nobody invited him.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Virginia said with a good deal of emphasis (look at the RECORD, I looked at it carefully) that many things the Senator from Massachusetts said about what democratic committees had waited on him and what offers had been made to him were not true, and when you come to look at it carefully the Senator from Massachusetts will observe that if he is spoiling for a fight there was very nearly a fighting point right there. But as I am not disposed and as I do not propose to say anything that will cause the Senator from Massachusetts to have any difficulty with me——

Mr. DAWES. I yielded to the Senator when I had the floor, and I know he will yield to me.

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. I want to understand clearly what it is that the Senator from Kentucky is fighting for, whether he is fighting for December or fighting in behalf of the Senators from the Southern States on the other side, to get a Union soldier in place of "a rebel brigadier?" I want to know what he is fighting for. He has declared now that his fight will end in December. I think he will have to settle that with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] has said; but if he will let the country know that he is fighting now in behalf of Union soldiers for the first time, the country will hail him as a recruit.

Mr. BECK. I said before that I propose to make no personal issues with anybody, but if the fact is true, which many people believe to be true, that the attempted election of this man is the carrying out of a foul bargain, then the people of the country will stand by any party that struggles to prevent the consummation of it. The Senator can judge by the votes on this side perhaps what their opinion is upon that subject, and when December comes and they still seek to carry out what a great many people think is a foul bargain, then we have a right to prevent a man against whom we have said so much, and whose political career we so much oppose, from being our Sergeant-at-Arms, and to give the republican party a man, a decent man, a gentleman, a soldier, and a wounded soldier at that, to vote for; and we will be content with him and will vote for him if you will give up the man who will be obnoxious to us and who will make himself very disagreeable to us, as we know he will, for two years, when we have a right to have a servitor of this body who will be decently kind to us all, and we propose to present such a man, if he is not presented by the other side, as we think he will then be.

Mr. DAWES. Does not the Senator think the best way to determine that is to submit it to a majority?

Mr. BECK. We will submit to a majority, so far as I am concerned, whenever we get into a regular session of Congress; but when the President calls us together to transact executive business, when we are in extraordinary session convened to do only what he shall advise us is necessary for the public good, when we have an organized Senate, and good, honest, competent officials, I deny that the Senator from Massachusetts, if he has made such a bargain as the chairman of his caucus, has a right to divert us away from that legitimate business to disorganize the Senate and to place officers over us whom we do not think ought to be there either because of their fitness or for any other cause, or because of any bargain that may have been made. I repeat that we are not to be diverted from the business for which we were called together to follow him or to consummate any outside arrangement that may have been made. That is the issue between the two parties. When we meet here every morning we advise you that we will go on with the regular executive business. There are some three hundred nominations, many of them important ones. We are ready to proceed with them; they are all republicans; your President is a republican; he has called us together. You have not and you know you never have had a constitutional quorum in the Senate; you have not got it to-day, and you cannot get it. Why should you tell us that we are obstructing public business because we will not follow you to do what the President has not asked you to do, what he never would have convened you together for if that had been the business or an essential part of it, and when you refuse to do anything that you were called together to do? I deny we are obstructing anything that is legitimate at this session, under any precedent or construction of the presidential call under which we are here.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator said a few moments ago that he had chosen his words or said in substance that he had chosen his words with great care, and that he was not going to use any words that would permit the Senator from Massachusetts to call him to account. Does he mean to say that he has so chosen his words designedly that while I cannot call him to account he intends to convey the same idea? When he says, "If the Senator from Massachusetts has made any bargain, then so and so," does the Senator mean to say, "I have selected those words with care so that the Senator from Massachusetts cannot call me to an account for them?" Is that what the Senator means?

Mr. BECK. I have said this——

Mr. DAWES. I will tell the Senator what he said. He said, "If the Senator from Massachusetts has made any bargain"——

Several SENATORS. "Any foul bargain."

Mr. DAWES. "If he has made any foul bargain," as I am corrected, "then so and so." The Senator prefaced it by saying that he was not going to use any words which would permit the Senator from Massachusetts to call him to an account, intimating that the Senator from Virginia the other day negatived some things that I had said. I only want to repeat them to him and ask him if I am to understand that he has carefully chosen those words to prevent my calling him to an account?

Mr. BECK. I have said this, and I have repeated it, that I have never charged any bargain on this floor with any one and I do not propose to do it. I will express my opinions whenever I am in a canvass, and that is one reason why I invited the Senator from Massachusetts to go to Virginia with me. I will express my opinions very freely and take all the responsibility of what those opinions may be when I am in that canvass, but upon the floor of the Senate I shall not express any opinions, no matter what they are, that will give any Senator the right to make a wrangle with me that may turn into a personal quarrel. If we go outside of this Chamber on the street anywhere whatever my opinion is I will tell it to him and if he does not like it then perhaps he can knock me down if he can, or take any other satisfaction that he would like, but I have no expression of my opinion to give to him now. I say there is an opinion in the country——

Mr. DAWES. I want to say a little further, if the Senator will permit me, that I had supposed my relations with the Senator were such that he would not come into the Senate and say that he was going to be very careful in the words that he should use; he would come just as near as he could to an offensive charge against me, but would use words for which I could not call him to an account. I did not expect that from the Senator, and I called his attention to it to give him the opportunity to say that he did not mean any such thing; but the Senator does not say it. I want to call his attention to it again, for I am not here to pick a quarrel, nor am I here to permit any Senator, without saying something myself, in any language he has a mind to choose, to say that which goes to the country with that interpretation upon it. It only makes it worse, in my opinion, for a Senator to get up here and announce beforehand that he has been very careful to use words that, while they will mean one thing, are not words that he can be permitted to be called to account for. I know the Senator knows better than to charge me, directly or indirectly, by inference or otherwise, with anything dishonorable in this transaction, and if the Senator says otherwise he had better say it openly and fairly, and then he and I will understand ourselves from this day as I supposed we had understood ourselves heretofore.

Mr. BECK. I have endeavored to say as fully as I knew how that I made no charge about it, for I know nothing about it. When I said I desired to use the words carefully, I meant to exclude any possibility that anybody might think I meant to make any such charge.

Mr. DAWES. That is all?

Mr. BECK. That is all I desired to say.

Mr. DAWES. That is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. BECK. Because if anything I said looked as if I made a charge by indirection, I did not intend it; I should never have done it in that way against the Senator.

Mr. DAWES. That is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. BROWN. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] this morning repeats the usual charge that the democratic members of this body are obstructing the will of the majority unconstitutionally. The staple of the speeches on that side of the Chamber for the last two weeks has been that the will of the majority must rule absolutely, and that it is the duty of the minority to yield in all cases to the will of the majority. The honorable and distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] laid that rule down very broadly in the speech that he made some days since, and quoted the old adage about the voice of the majority being the voice of a god. There is no such adage as applicable to Congress, to the Senate, to the Government of the United States. There is an adage in reference to the voice of some other tribunal that has been said to be invested with the power of the voice of a god; that is the voice of the people, who are our common masters; and when that voice has spoken we on this side will be ready to yield. It is to that voice we make the appeal, and there is where we intend to meet you. When the people have spoken on this subject we shall obey their voice, and we meet you on this issue and appeal to the people. The people write to us and communicate to us through various channels to stand firmly here and prevent the carrying out of a measure that they believe is improper, that they believe is wrong, that they believe had its origin in that which was not right, and that they desire to have a reckoning about with all their representatives. They say this is a measure that they do not want passed. There are various surroundings about it and circumstances connected with it that do not commend themselves to them, and we stand here as their representatives and say you cannot pass it.

Mr. DAWES. What representatives?

Mr. BROWN. The representatives of the people who can utter the voice that I speak of, and that the Senator from Ohio spoke of a few days ago, which is so potent when it is uttered.

But, Mr. President, I say that this is not a government of majorities; that there is no truth in the proposition laid down that the majority have a right to rule in this country. They do have, subject to certain restrictions and regulations and constitutional qualifications; but there is no such thing as an unbridled majority being the government of this country. The Senate is not constituted upon any such proposition or doctrine. The State of Rhode Island according to the last census (and I speak from memory for I have it not before me) has a little more than 270,000 population all told; the State of New York has over 5,000,000 population. The State of New York has a population more than eighteen times greater than the State of Rhode Island, and yet the State of Rhode Island is represented on this floor by the same number of Senators that represent the State of New York.

That is not only true, but the voice of the majority of the whole people of the United States cannot change it without the consent of the State of Rhode Island. If every member in each House of Congress when it is in session, every member of the Senate to-day, and every man, woman, and child in the other thirty-seven States of the Union should do everything in their power to change that rule, it is fixed and immutable without the consent of the State of Rhode Island, because the Constitution of the United States says expressly that no State without its consent shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate. If this were a government of the majority without constitutional restraint, then the majority of the Senate and of the House, with the President and the people at their back, could deprive the State of Rhode Island of the same representative power here that the State of New York has. It cannot do it.

It is not a government of majorities, again, because both Houses of Congress may pass a resolution or a bill and the President, as on a notable occasion recently, has the power to veto it, and it then takes two-thirds of both branches to enact it into a law. If the majority ruled here there would be no such power. The majority of the two Houses and the whole of the people at their back cannot control it in that case.

Near the end of the last Congress, the democrats being in power, we passed a funding bill to fund the portion of the debt of the United States that was falling due this year at 3 per cent. It was the voice of the majority of both Houses, and from the tide that has rolled back to us here from the people it was the voice of a large majority of the people; yet a republican President interposed his veto and the measure fell to the ground and did not become the law of the land, greatly, as we think, to the detriment of the best interests of this country. Why did not the majority rule then? One man on the republican side said, "It shall not be so without two-thirds," and action was stayed at once, because we did not have two-thirds. There are a great many other restrictions upon the powers of the Congress of the United States. The Constitution expressly provides that—

> The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it.

Therefore, when there is no rebellion and no invasion the Congress of the United States, with the President to aid them and all the people of the United States, cannot suspend the writ of habeas corpus; I care not what majority requires it, it can only be done when there is insurrection or rebellion, and at no other time, however urgent might be the will of a united Congress with all the people at their backs. The Constitution provides that—

No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed.

Therefore, if the whole Congress and the President unite in passing such a measure and it should have the sanction of the swelling tide of popular opinion in its favor, it would be absolutely null and void. It is a thing which cannot be done. Further:

No capitation or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken.

No matter how decided Congress is, or how unanimous Congress is upon it, it cannot be done. No matter what the will of the majority may be in its favor, that majority cannot rule and it cannot be carried out. Further:

No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State.

No matter how unanimous the Senate or the House or both combined with the President may be, it cannot be done because the Constitution says it shall not.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator has overlooked what I said—a majority speaking through the Constitution.

Mr. BROWN. I will come to that before I take my seat. I will not neglect you on that point.

Mr. DAWES. One would suppose by his argument that the Senator had forgotten it.

Mr. BROWN. No, sir; I have not forgotten it; I am not in the habit of forgetting that sort of thing a great deal, as I go along. I am particularly anxious to accommodate my friend from Massachusetts on this question, and therefore I will try not to forget it before I sit down.

No preference shall be given—

Says the Constitution—

by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.

The whole Congress may pass a law, it may be unanimously passed in both Houses and the President may sign it, to violate that provision, and it is a nullity; no amount of majority, no amount of popular clamor in its favor, can do it. Further:

No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States.

The whole Congress might determine to pass an act granting a title of nobility to my good friend from Massachusetts; we might all be in favor of it and the President might cheerfully sign it; but it is a nullity when passed, because that is one thing about which the majority cannot rule; they have no right to do it.

But you may say in reply that the Constitution could be changed so as to give the power. That is true except in the case of the representation of a State in the Senate; that cannot be changed at all without her consent. It may be changed in these other matters, but what does it take to do it? The ordinary machinery prescribed by the Constitution must be put in motion first, and then it must have the assent of three-fourths, not a majority simply, of the States before it can be done.

Therefore this is not a government of a mere majority. The very object of the Constitution is to throw restrictions over the will of the majority and to control that majority for the public good. The great object of the Constitution is not to carry out the will of the majority so much as it is to protect the rights of the minority.

But my honorable friend from Massachusetts says that the majority within the rules, as I understand him, laid down for our government here, is to control. I have no objection to that.

Mr. DAWES. Then vote on the pending resolution.

Mr. BROWN. When you can get to it in accordance with those rules, we shall take that vote, my friend.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator must feel himself engaged in a patriotic duty?

Mr. BROWN. I do feel that I am doing a very patriotic duty here. The democratic Senators on this side all feel, as I understand them, that it is a patriotic duty that we are doing to prevent this most mischievous conduct——

Mr. DAWES. "O, wad some power the giftie gie us"——

Mr. BROWN. That you could see yourselves as others see you. [Laughter.] The Constitution of the United States says:

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings.

There is a constitutional grant; there is authority given to the Senate to make rules. The Senate has exercised that power, and it has made rules to govern its proceedings. We on this side have the right, and the minority at all times have the right, to resort to and enforce every rule that is made in conformity with the Constitution in the transaction of business here. Whenever you can carry a measure in accordance with these rules and we cannot prevent it in accordance with the rules made under this provision of the Constitution, then you have a right to carry it, and not till then.

Mr. BLAIR. May I ask the Senator a question? I understand him to say that anything which may be constitutionally done may be opposed constitutionally so long as the rules adopted by the Senate are conformed to. Is that the position of the Senator?

Mr. BROWN. Well, sir, draw your own deductions from it.

Mr. BLAIR. I think that is a fair statement of the Senator's position.

Mr. BROWN. I shall not yield for the Senator to make a speech; I will not yield the floor.

Mr. BLAIR. I was asking a question.

Mr. BROWN. I will not have a speech interjected into my speech.

Mr. BLAIR. Will you permit me to ask a question?

Mr. BROWN. You can get the floor when I am through.

Mr. BLAIR. Surely the Senator will allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. BROWN. I will go on with my speech now, and I will hear you with great pleasure when you get the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) Senators will please address the Chair.

Mr. BLAIR. I have nothing to say, only that a courtesy of that kind has never been refused me before.

Mr. BROWN. I have refused to permit the Senator from New Hampshire to interrupt me.

Mr. BLAIR. I thought the Senator stood here inviting questions——

Mr. BROWN. No, I had not——

Mr. BLAIR. And somewhat tauntingly inviting questions as to his position that he might elucidate his constitutional views. I rose to ask him a question, in accordance with the universal custom of the Senate, so that I might understand him.

Mr. BROWN. I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia has the floor and cannot be interrupted without his permission.

Mr. BLAIR. I shall not ask the question if I trespass on the courtesy of the Senator, and he declines to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia declines to yield.

Mr. BROWN. I prefer to hear the Senator when I am done.

Mr. BLAIR. I simply say that I desire to ask a question in order to comprehend the Senator, not to reply to what he was saying at all.

Mr. BROWN. I say I do not yield.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand it; but I wish the Senator to understand distinctly that I did not claim the floor to make a speech.

Mr. BROWN. Have I the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia has the floor, and cannot be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. BROWN. If I have the floor I propose to hold it.

Mr. BLAIR. There is not the slightest difficulty, and I say to the Senator that I only desired to understand his position.

Mr. BROWN. Have I the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire will take his seat. The Senator from Georgia has the floor and declines to be interrupted.

Mr. BLAIR. He has been interrupted several times, I have observed.

Mr. BROWN. I was proceeding to consider that provision of the Constitution which declares that each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, and I had stated that the Senate has determined those rules and that both sides of the Chamber have a right to insist upon the execution of those rules and on a conformity to them. I lay down the proposition that we have not in a single instance transcended those rules. We have not made a motion here in violation of them. We have not made a motion on which we could successfully be called to order under any one of those rules. Therefore, we are proceeding according to the rules laid down in conformity to the Constitution; and, proceeding in that way, if we can prevent the passage of a measure that we consider to be mischievous and wrong in the highest sense of the term, we propose to do it and to appeal to the people on this issue. Not only so; we have another constitutional grant for what we have been doing, that has been so much complained of. The Constitution says:

And the yeas and nays of the members of either House on any question shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the Journal.

It is a constitutional right, then, that one-fifth have, whenever they indicate a desire at any time, to have the yeas and nays entered upon the Journal of the Senate. How do we violate the Constitution, then, when we act in strict conformity to the rules made by the Senate in accordance with the power given by the Constitution, or how do we violate the Constitution when on any question one-fifth desire that the yeas and nays be entered upon the Journal? Have we gone outside of that? Clearly we have not.

Therefore we have violated no rule of the Constitution, no rule of law, no rule of this Government, in any act that we have done here, and I repel the charge that we are obstructing legislation by an unconstitutional use of power. We are acting in strict conformity to the Constitution and laws and the rules of the Senate, and we propose to continue to act there as long as we think the public interest requires it. We have invited gentlemen on the other side again and again to go into executive session. We were called here for that purpose, and republican Senators will not be able to shift the responsibility before the people by going before them and telling them that they considered the election of these officers in the Senate, under the very peculiar coincidences that brought them before the Senate, as paramount to the appointment of a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States when that court is adjourning from day to day without a quorum, some of its members not being able to attend; that you regard it more important than you do to fill a vacancy upon the Court of Claims; that you regard it more important than you do to appoint a judge in the fifth judicial circuit; that you regard it more important than you do to appoint public ministers and consuls; that you regard it more important than you do to act upon treaties now before us that are pressing. Take the Chinese treaty. There is a limit beyond which it falls if it is not acted upon. You consider it more important here to elect Mr. Gorham and Mr. Riddleberger than you do to act on a treaty with that great power. Not only those treaties, but numerous very important nominations are before the Senate. Yes; you regard it more important than you do that a republican administration shall move off in harmony with the usual machinery and usual organization.

We have stood here from the very first hour, ready to go at any time into executive session with you to act upon the appointments which have been made. We presume that your President must be somewhat embarrassed by the course you take in not acting upon them. We throw no obstacles in the way; we say, "Go forward in the business we are called upon to transact, and we will go with you." But no, you make the point that you will do nothing else until you have acted upon the cases of Gorham and Riddleberger and two other officers of the Senate. If you choose to stand upon that ground before the country and to take the responsibility of considering their election more important than that the Administration should have its appointments acted upon, and that the treaties should be acted upon, we are ready to meet you before that tribunal to whom the adage does apply that the voice of the people is the voice of a god. We have no fear on that subject. We have told you that we will obstruct you in no other way; that we have an opinion about this transaction which we need not express here, but which we will express upon the stump, and we intend to go there; we intend to obstruct it by every legal constitutional means within our power, and prevent it until an appeal can be made to the people.

You talk about December. You will care nothing about it in December. After you have heard the voice of Virginia speak this fall, I apprehend you will scarcely come here and stand for the election of Mr. Riddleberger in preference to any other business of the Senate. It will not be hard, I think, after that time to find another man for whom you would quite as cheerfully vote as you would for Mr. Riddleberger. Therefore we do not apprehend that there will be the slightest difficulty upon that subject.

But suppose we do obstruct your action, is it revolutionary? Is it unconstitutional, as the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said? What clause of the Constitution do we violate? What provision in it do we violate? What act have we performed that has not been in strict accordance with the Constitution? None whatever; and if we prevent this action we simply prevent it, as the passage of many an act is prevented, by the use of constitutional means, and by seeing that the rules of the Senate in our favor are executed until you fail. It is not denied, I believe, that on certain occasions, on certain votes taken during the last night of the Forty-sixth Congress, every Senator on that side who was in his seat sat there and refused to vote. Now I say in that case your action might well be characterized by the honorable Senator from Ohio as unconstitutional. Why? Because you violated one of the rules made by the Senate for the government of its conduct under the provisions of the Constitution. In other words, you sat in your seats and refused to obey or carry out one of the rules of the Senate that the Senate made in obedience to the Constitution. That is Rule No. 16, which reads thus:

> When the yeas and nays shall be called for by one-fifth of the Senators present, each Senator, when his name is called, shall, unless for special reasons he be excused by the Senate, declare openly and without debate his assent or dissent to the question; and in taking the yeas and nays upon any question the names of the Senators shall be called alphabetically.

There is no rule of the Senate which says we shall not move to go into executive session, there is a rule which says we may move to go in; there is no rule which says we shall not make a motion to lay on the table, there is a rule which says we may make it; there is no rule which says we shall not make a motion to adjourn, there is a rule which says we may make it; there is no rule which says we shall not call the yeas and nays; both the Constitution of the United States and the rules of the Senate say on the desire of one-fifth the yeas and nays shall be taken and recorded; but there was a rule of the Senate which said that when you sat in your seats and when your names were called refused to vote you did a prohibited thing. You violated the rules of the Senate in that transaction. We have in no case violated them in the action we have taken here. I repel the charge, then, that we violate any constitutional provision, any law, or any rule of the Senate in the action we take, and I charge that you did violate the rules of the Senate when you sat in your seats and refused to vote.

A word more about majorities. The republican Senators are great sticklers now for the will of the majority. You did not stickle for it in 1876. Mr. Tilden was elected by more than a quarter of a million majority of the popular vote: impartial history will record that he was elected by a majority of the electoral vote. Did that majority rule? Who got the benefit of the violation of the rule, if you say a majority must rule? The present President of the United States was not elected by a popular majority; the republican party in the United States had no majority when he was elected; you had, according to the American Almanac, less than a thousand majority for your candidate over the democratic candidate, and there were over three hundred thousand votes cast for other candidates. You lacked nearly one hundred and sixty thousand votes of having a popular majority; and yet you rule this country, and you take yourselves all the offices of this country under that minority rule, and then you daily flaunt it in our faces here that a majority must rule, and that we are violating principle because we do not submit to a majority of the Senate, where, as the Senator from Kentucky has said again and again, you have no constitutional quorum, though by the vote of the Vice-President you have a bare majority. When it suits the purpose of the republican party that a minority rule, then that is the doctrine, and then you act upon it; when it suits your purpose for a majority to rule, as in this Senate to-day, then it is a great crime on the part of the democracy not to submit to the will of that majority!

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts said this morning in reply to the Senator from Kentucky that he had heard over and over the reply that was made. Have we not heard and has not the country heard the speech of my honorable friend from Massachusetts again and again and again about the right of the majority to rule here, short, pithy, pointed, and humorous as he makes his speech? But we meet you by saying you have the right to rule whenever you can pass the measure without the violation of any of the rules of the Senate, which are made under the express grant of power of the Constitution of the United States. If you undertake to go forward with your Vice-President and pass it over our motions here, you violate the Constitution and rules of the Senate. Go forward, then, and pass it, pass it constitutionally, pass it in conformity to rule, and we have not a word to say; but we will say that when you pass it you have to do it in a constitutional form and in obedience to the rules of the Senate, and we intend to keep strictly within those rules while we are preventing this great wrong in a question about a few office-holders. That is worth looking after. It is our duty to see to it that you shall not in violation of precedent throw them out of their positions at this time; but the deeper principle, the higher rule, is, that there is a great moral question here involved, and we propose to be controlled by that; we propose not to permit what we consider a great wrong, a great piece of injustice; in a word, we propose not to permit a transaction that the people regard as the result of bargain and sale to be enacted as long as we can prevent it; but in preventing it we will confine ourselves strictly within the limits laid down by the Constitution, the laws, and the rules of the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I wish to ask my question now. I will not do it in an interrogative form, however.

The Senator from Georgia starts out in his address to the Senate with sundry quotations from the Constitution itself, prohibitory in their nature, restricting the province within which the Government itself may act. Of course we understand that ours is, in a certain sense, a government of limited powers. Powers not limited in their scope were granted; but its powers are limited in numbers, and certain prohibited powers on which the Government cannot act at all are specifically set forth in the Constitution. The honorable Senator, as the basis of a constitutional and legal argument, stands up and asserts to the country that, because we cannot act by a majority of the Senate upon a subject-matter which is not within the scope of the General Government at all, therefore within the scope of such powers as are granted to the General Government, the Senate and the House do not act by a majority, sometimes a two-thirds vote, sometimes a bare majority as constitutionally prescribed! Now if the honorable Senator thinks that is an argument, it is impossible, it strikes me, for any person by any elucidation whatever to establish the absurdity of it. I think no one can fail to see that the premises in no wise lay the foundation for the conclusion drawn.

He then goes another step and he refers us to the provision in the Constitution that the two Houses of Congress may establish the rules of their procedure, and he says the Senate has established, as one of the rules of its proceeding, the right of the minority to interpose, at any stage of proceedings almost, a motion to go into executive session, a motion to adjourn, and certain dilatory motions which have precedence of the main question ordinarily pending; and, because in accordance with that provision of the Constitution, the Senate and the House in like cases also provide under their rules of procedure for dilatory motions, therefore such motions may be interjected, may be interposed at all stages of proceeding, not for a week alone, not for a single year alone, but forever to absolutely thwart and prevent, at the will of sixteen out of the seventy-six members who are present, any action whatever by the Senate upon such subject-matter as is embraced within the scope of our constitutional powers, that subject-matter which concerns the existence of the Government and the nation itself.

Now, let me ask the honorable Senator—and he may answer it as we go on if he chooses, or he may wait until I am done, or he may ignore it altogether—if the pending question was one upon an appropriation bill, and if war were raging to-day, and the existence of the Government depended on the passing of that bill within a week, or within twenty-four hours, or within one hour, would he claim that under these rules of the Senate (which would be applicable then just as much as they are now) we could interpose a motion to go into executive session, a motion to adjourn, a motion to adjourn to a day certain, any dilatory motion whatever, in order to break down the existence of the Government itself? And yet that is his position, and he argues it gravely to the country. Why, sir, to state it in the proper form, it is simply this: that the very rules which under the Constitution we are allowed to form in order that we may execute our duties under the Constitution may be interposed to thwart the discharge of those duties, to ruin the Constitution, and to destroy the existence of the nation itself! Is it not so? It does not require a majority to set those rules in motion; a minority may do it; and under these very rules sixteen may call for the yeas and nays interminably upon these dilatory motions when the Senate is full, and a less number can ordinarily do it; and, if the yeas and nays are not insisted upon, a still less number may make these motions and the question may be taken in the ordinary way without a record of the vote, and thus interminably the Senate be prevented from reaching the serious business of the session, as is now the case.

The honorable Senator cannot claim, it seems to me, that this is an argument, or that he has replied to the position of this side at all by considerations of this kind. I did not suppose that the Senator designed to take that position, and I rose a while ago to ask him if I comprehended his position. I stated it tersely. He declined to be interrupted. He failed to correct his position at any time during what he has subsequently said.

Now, Mr. President, while I am on my feet I feel that I ought to say one thing, although it is not strictly in accordance with the views which have been enunciated from this side of the Chamber. I hold, I think with the sentiment expressed by the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] the other day—I think he gave utterance to it—that every individual Senator is in the last resort to determine upon his conscience whether he will vote or whether he will not vote in this Chamber. I believe that is the highest form of constitutional right, and I do not charge the Senators on the other side with any revolutionary intent because they fail to vote, because they interpose dilatory motions; by no manner of means. It depends wholly upon the purpose with which this thing is done; it depends upon the nature of the pending measure. Why, sir, suppose the question pending were one which involved the existence of the country itself; suppose there were a proposition pending to dissolve the Union, I being opposed to it, and (to make the illustration precise and accurate) that without my vote that measure could not pass, that without my vote that measure would be defeated; does anybody stand here to say that I am discharging my duty under my oath to support the Constitution and to preserve this nation when I cast my vote and pass the measure although I vote against it, by creating a quorum when by withholding my vote that measure would be defeated and the country and the Constitution saved?

The honorable Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. BURNSIDE] and other Senators on the floor have made haste to confess that they did wrong near the close of the recent session and during the earlier days of the present session when they declined to vote, and thereby broke a quorum. Now, I say my belief is that upon the individual conscience of each Senator depends the question whether he will vote or not, as much as it does which way he will vote; and I would not conceal this thing and go to the country on a false issue. I say to-day that if the Senators on the other side have a question here sufficiently important, if what is involved is in their opinion, in their honest, conscientious conviction, of sufficient importance to justify them in thwarting the regular operations and the orderly procedure of the Government and the public business, if they so believe they are justified in staying where they are until next December, until the end of time for that matter. It is a question what the nature of the measure is, how important that measure is, whether they shall interpose these dilatory motions; and it is also a question with the majority, if we have a majority, whether we will let the rule which perverts the action of this Chamber and thwarts the will of the majority longer to stand on the rules of the Senate, for the constitutional power to make rules is a constitutional power to change rules. If the rules at any time are unreasonably used to thwart what in the judgment of the majority is the proper and legitimate business of the session, the majority has the right to change the rules, and we ought to change them whenever the rules to govern the transaction of the business of the Senate under the Constitution are used to destroy the Constitution and prevent the proper action of the Senate. In that event it is the duty of the Senate, by virtue of that power which would be inherent in the body if it were not specified in the Constitution itself, to change the rules. That we have the power to do, as I believe.

But, Mr. President, however that may be, I am not here to make a lengthy, careful, constitutional argument. I rose originally for no purpose but to ask a question, but being up I would, so far as I am concerned at least, place this debate where it ought to be, as I believe, and I say that if the Senators on the other side are justified in their own consciences in the course they take there is nobody to say ay or no to them, let them do it, and it becomes then substantially a question of intellectual and moral and physical endurance, and if they succeed in wearing us out, if they succeed in thwarting the purpose of the majority and great ill comes to the country, upon them will be the responsibility.

If no particular harm comes to it, and if as the result of this prolonged debate opening up the issues of the past, reviving history, and bringing to the recollection of the American people what has occurred during the last twenty years, the "solid South" that we hear so much of is broken and broken forever, then I say thank God for the dead-lock, as I do to-day. I look upon this as a great and high and immortal opportunity, and I thank God that it is here. I do not want this dead-lock to close till next December unless this debate is fully closed long ere that. I am here in that spirit. I am here because I want to be here. The talk that the executive business is important I appreciate; but I think there is a vastly higher issue before the American people to-day, and every executive nomination may rest where it is till next December, so far as I am concerned, unless we can succeed in enforcing this great, high, and all-important first duty—the enactment of the will of the majority of this body. If Senators can succeed in defeating the will of the majority at this time by interposing dilatory motions, I ask any one, I ask the Administration, I ask the country, how it is, with this narrow majority, that we are ever to enact a single proposition into law which they may see fit to oppose? The right to interpose these dilatory motions on this question implies it upon all others; and if the moral courage, the pluck, and the stamina of the minority are to gain this primal victory the very first time an issue has been raised between the existing majority and minority, I would like to ask anybody when the time is coming that we shall not be obliged to yield whenever sixteen of the minority may see fit to say that a measure shall not pass? It had better be settled now and settled for at least one Congress. So long as the parties are so closely balanced as they are at the present time, it had better be settled while we have time to do it. We have several months before us. It had better be settled now whether or not the majority is to rule upon important as well as non-consequential questions.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President——

Mr. BROWN. I will state to the Senator from Rhode Island that the Senator from New Hampshire has been asking me a question a quarter of an hour long.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Senator from New Hampshire has been making a speech and the Senator from Georgia finished his speech some time ago. Mine will not be more than five minutes long. I think the new speech of the Senator from Georgia will keep that long.

Mr. BROWN. Very well.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I do not think the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] dealt with his usual candor in debate with the question I asked him; and now I desire to say to the Senator that I will take three or four votes that were given at the period of which he spoke. They are in the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 5, beginning at page 48. As I stated before, the question then at issue with the Senate was in no sense a partisan question. These are the proceedings of the last day of the last session, March 3. I desire to say again that the question at issue then was as to whether we should sustain certain Senators here who objected to certain nominations that had been sent to the Senate by the President of the United States, a republican President. The Senators on that side of the Chamber know that that was the issue, and I want to prove now that it was in no sense partisan.

Mr. VANCE. I move now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

That is on page 48. On this motion the yeas were 27, the nays 8; absent 40. Of the yeas four were republicans; one of the nays was a republican, myself, and seven democrats. Of the forty absent thirteen were democrats, without the single announcement of a pair, except of one democrat, the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMPTON.] Understand now that of the yeas there were four republicans; of the nays one was a republican, myself, and seven were democrats; and of the absentees thirteen were democrats with but one pair announced.

Now, I will take the next vote, on the motion of the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] to go into executive session. There were 33 yeas, and 6 of these were republicans. There were 3 nays, 1 being a republican, and that was myself. So in those two cases I voted; two democrats, Mr. McDonald and Mr. Eaton, making with myself the 3 nays. The absentees were 39, of whom 13 were democrats, and no pairs were announced at that time. On another motion of the Senator from North Carolina to go into executive session, the very next vote, the yeas were 36, of whom 3 were republicans, nays none, absentees 39, of whom 9 were democrats. On that occasion I did not vote. As I said before I was in the hall, and I do not pride myself on that occasion in the least degree. As I have said several times I do not think it was a respectable thing for a Senator to do, and I shall never do it again. But I mean to say this was in no sense a partisan vote. If the democrats who were in the Capitol at that time had voted in full, they would have made a quorum every time. That I announce without fear of contradiction. Now, I should like to know of the Senator from Kentucky why he did not answer when I asked him if he would not state how many democrats were unpaired and absent.

Mr. BECK. Now I will answer that again as I did before, that twenty-three republicans answered to their names on the roll-call immediately afterward as present, on pages 52 and 53, and refused to vote with the exception of the three whose names I read, Mr. FERRY, Mr. HOAR, and Mr. MORRILL, the Senator from Rhode Island himself being one of the twenty-three who afterward answered to their names, but had not voted. There were thirty-three democrats who three or four times voted. How many were absent without pairs I do not know.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The RECORD shows.

Mr. BECK. The RECORD does not show, and let me state why. I announced this morning that I was paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] There have been half a dozen votes taken since and I have not announced it since that time, and I do not propose to announce it any more to-day. So at the beginning of that day perhaps the pairs were announced, and they were announced no more.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Let me say to the Senator from Kentucky that he cannot find a single pair with the exception of General HAMPTON's announced during that whole session.

Mr. BECK. The custom of the Senate is to announce pairs once in a day or two.

Mr. BURNSIDE. They were not announced once for all. You can pick out the pairs, and I will except them. General HAMPTON did announce his pair, and he is the only one that made such an announcement.

Mr. BECK. Perhaps the announcement had been made a week before, the gentlemen having gone home for the rest of the session; but there were certainly thirty-three democrats voting and no republican. But waive all that, what is the meaning of it? Suppose that was not a party question; suppose both sides should say that, does it not only give the question of filibustering more respectability?

Mr. BURNSIDE. I do not think it does in the least degree. If every man in the Senate did it, I would say it was no more respectable. That is just my opinion about it.

Mr. BECK. Why, Mr. President, I was in the House of Representatives once, when the force bill was up, and we filibustered for forty-six and a half hours.

Mr. BURNSIDE. You had the previous question there, which we have not here.

Mr. BECK. And we defeated the bill, so that it never did become a law. We believed that it was a bad bill, and we filibustered until the majority of nearly two-thirds had to give way. At the last session of Congress, when our party in the House of Representatives could not bring in their one hundred and forty-six democrats to make a constitutional quorum, (which you have not got and do not pretend to have here,) the republicans in that House filibustered until the majority had to give up and quit. So when it was sought to bring up the funding bill on divers occasions the same thing occurred in the other House at the last session. We have done it over and over, and you have done it over and over.

Mr. BUTLER. Let me suggest to my friend that that filibustering in the House by the republicans came very near defeating the appropriation bills at the last session.

Mr. BECK. Of course it did; and but for the fact that we sat up here in the Senate night after night until two or three o'clock in the morning, as my friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] knows, and he knows how we all suffered under it, the appropriation bills would have been defeated because of that very filibustering in the House.

Mr. BURNSIDE. We are not accountable for that. The House can manage their own affairs. We have no right to discuss that here.

Mr. BECK. We can discuss what the last House did.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I do not know about that; the Senator has had more experience than I have had.

Mr. BECK. Oh, yes, we can speak of what is past. It is just what Senators have done over and over, and it is what, if the Senator from Rhode Island is right, he and some brother democrats did when they walked out into the hall; I hope they did not go any further without inviting me. [Laughter.] It only shows that both sides recognize it is as being a thing that is not unusual, and all the talk about going to the country, about treason and revolution because we will not allow you to turn out two or three good officers and put in two or three others, some of whom we know are very bad, and to affect an election in an adjoining State and to make what some of us think false pretenses—to call that revolution and treason, in the language of the former Senator from Ohio which has become classic in this Chamber, "won't do;" "it won't do."

Mr. BROWN. I only wish to say a few words in answer to the question propounded to me by the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. BLAIR.] I think when the Senate saw the question and the scope it took they were satisfied that I was quite right in not suspending my remarks to permit the honorable Senator to propound it while I was speaking. I have heard some of his questions before on this floor. I thought I knew it was going to be a very long one. In other words, while it purported to be a question, I foresaw that it would be a speech, and with all kindness to the Senator I declined to yield, because I preferred to conduct the debate more orderly and I preferred to go on making my remarks and then let him come along and make his. I think that is the better plan; and I believe if he has weighed his question himself and thought it over he will not blame me for having declined to yield, as it might have come in at an inopportune time when we consider its great length.

But the honorable Senator stated, during the time he was propounding the question, that he knew no argument by which he could show the absurdity of my position. I knew that before he got up. I knew there was no argument by which he could do it. I could have saved him that trouble because I made an argument on constitutional questions where I was right, and there is no argument in such a case that can show the absurdity, there being none. Again, the Senator propounded this question: Suppose there were war, and an appropriation bill was on its passage, would it be right to propose dilatory motions there to prevent its passage? I say not by any means—not at all; it would be unpatriotic to do it, it would be wrong to do it, and I would not do it, and the Senator from New Hampshire would not do it. Everybody then, I suppose, would have but one idea about the thing, and the idea would be to hasten legislation instead of retarding it. But on the other hand there may come up numerous cases where the minority may feel that there is an attempt on the part of the majority to oppress the minority or to enact some very bad legislation or some fraudulent legislation. That is a very different thing, and especially when you take a time when there is profound peace, a time when the country is quiet, a time when Congress is not in session, a time when you are not taking up anybody's business but your own, a time when it costs the people of the United States very little to have us sit. Our salaries are the same, though it is a matter of some personal inconvenience to Senators to remain here. But to analogize our conduct here when we are attempting to prevent what the country thinks a fraudulent transaction—whether it be so or not I do not say——

Mr. BURNSIDE. I say to the Senator from Georgia that the country does not think so.

Mr. BROWN. Then I will say a large proportion of it does.

Mr. BURNSIDE. A large proportion does not; a large proportion of the country does not believe anything of the kind.

Mr. BROWN. I take issue with the Senator. The Senator is wrong. From what I see a vast majority feel it so. The republican press is divided. If the Senator will read his own papers he will find it so. Some of the most influential of the republican papers have condemned your course here.

Mr. BURNSIDE. What republican paper has called the Senate a fraud?

Mr. BROWN. Some have gone so far as to call it a corrupt bargain.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I do not know it. What one? Will the Senator be kind enough to state?

Mr. BROWN. I do not recall all.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I only ask for information. I would make no charge of that kind unless I could name the paper.

Mr. BROWN. There have been so many of these assaults made on your position that I have not kept track of them all.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I would not make an assertion of that kind unless I could name the paper. The Senator from Georgia may pursue any course he pleases; but I would make no such assertion as that unless I could name the paper that had made the charge. I do not mean to say that no paper has said it; but I have seen none that has said it.

Mr. BROWN. I know the Senator will not say none has said it, because there is no difficulty about proving that; they have done it.

Mr. BURNSIDE. It is very easy to name what paper has done it.

Mr. BROWN. I have seen so many that have disapproved your course that I do not remember all.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Many have disapproved our course, but no republican paper has said there is a corrupt bargain or anything that approaches it. I deny that such a statement was made until I know what paper it was that made it. I take exactly what the Senator from Georgia states here, and I say that I do not believe any republican paper has said there was anything like a corrupt bargain on this side of the Chamber unless the Senator will name the paper.

Mr. BROWN. Do you believe any republican paper has condemned your course here?

Mr. BURNSIDE. A great many; that I admit; but they are dealing fairly with us, and I took occasion to say in a short speech I made the other day that the very moment they understood the case they would be unanimous in support of our position. I have received a pile of letters that high [indicating] this morning on my return telling me to "stick, stick; we understand now what you are doing."

Mr. BROWN. I will reply in a short speech that I am going to make just now that I state here that a still larger majority of them will condemn your course hereafter, and I want to put that on record, for while I am no prophet I want to predict a little about this. I put it on record now that a still larger proportion of the republican newspapers will hereafter condemn you, and that a large majority of the people now condemn you and will hereafter condemn you.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I do not believe it.

Mr. BROWN. I do. Then in reply to what the Senator says about letters, I get them until it is oppressive to read them, saying "stand all the time; never yield." I get them from the North, the East, the West, and the South; I receive them from every section.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Then if all the Senators feel as the Senator from Georgia and I do, the Senate will stay here until December.

Mr. BROWN. I have never said that I would not. I said on an early occasion here that we had till December. I do not know whether we shall remain that long or not; it just depends entirely on whether you hold out or not. It is a question of endurance, as it was announced, and if it becomes necessary we can divide into squads and fight you just as well as the whole can fight you, and we honestly believe we can endure with you, and we propose at least to try it. We believe we are backed by a vast majority of the people in this case; we believe the people disapprove this transaction of yours, and we intend to appeal to the people upon it and ask their judgment.

Now, in the event that we are wrong about it what is the result? The people will condemn us and not send us back here; we put our party further in the minority.

Mr. DAWES. May I ask a question?

Mr. BROWN. In a moment. If we are right about it, we believe the people will condemn you and hurl you from power. That is just the issue we have made up.

But I was going on, in replying to the Senator from New Hampshire, to state that this is a very different sort of thing from throwing obstructions in the way when there is war or rebellion or trouble of any character, or when appropriation bills ought to pass, or even where the two Houses are in session and legislative business is going on. It happens to be a time, as I have already said, when it is a matter of convenience to Senators, and it is as good a time as any to test what are the rights of the minority in this country on questions where they believe that the majority is attempting either to oppress them or to enact legislation that the country will disapprove, no matter for what cause.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator allow me to make a remark to him?

Mr. BROWN. I would rather the Senator should wait until I am through.

I say, therefore, that there is nothing in this action of ours that is revolutionary. There are no wheels of the Government stopped. You stop them by refusing to go on and act upon the executive business. We do not stop them. We have simply stopped you from doing an act that we cannot approve, and that we believe a very large majority of the people do not approve, an act that the democratic press, so far as I have seen, with as great unanimity as they were ever united on any question, disapprove; an act about which the republican press are, to say the least of it, divided.

In this state of the case we justify ourselves in our course here by saying that we keep strictly within the rules laid down for the government of the Senate, the rules laid down in conformity to the Constitution that gives us the right to make rules. If we were violating those rules or running over them by any revolutionary movement, you would have a right to censure us; but if we can prevent your action in this particular matter by adhering to those rules and enforcing those rules, we say we intend to do it. It is just as well to tender the issue squarely and meet it squarely. It is our intention to do it and to go before the people on that very issue. It is just what we mean exactly, and we do not want to deceive anybody. On all other matters, though—and we have announced it again and again—pertaining to the duties of the Senate, we say we will interpose no obstacles in the way. You say you will not go on with the business of the session because you prefer to test this question with us as to whether the majority here in this matter can rule. I say there never was a fairer time to test it than the present executive session, as to whether the minority shall submit and not use the rules that it has a right to use to prevent a transaction that the minority view in the light that it does this, without saying what it is.

Now, one word more. My honorable friend from New Hampshire said in reference to the sitting in their seats and not voting of the republican Senators the night before the end of the last Congress, that it was a matter of conscience. I do not make any issue on that; but he says then it was a matter of obligation. The sixteenth rule, as I have already read, referring to a call of the yeas and nays, provides:

> Each Senator, when his name is called, shall, unless for special reasons he be excused by the Senate, declare openly and without debate his assent or dissent to the question.

It is true I have no right to construe that rule to bind anybody's conscience, but I think it imposes a duty, and it is my duty when I am here to vote when my name is called unless I am excused by the Senate. I do not say what a man's conscience might not justify under certain circumstances. I will not say that the Senator from New Hampshire is not conscientious in his view, because I have no right to question his motives, and I certainly have no wish to do it; but naturally, if you can sit here and refuse to vote right in the teeth of a rule that says you shall vote, and justify it on a score of conscience, we have a right to sit here and make motions that the Constitution and rules of the Senate say we may make, and make them as often as we please, in view of our responsibility to the populace on a question of this character, and we have a right to claim on our part the exercise of our own conscientious convictions. Our consciences are very easy on this particular point, because we believe we are right.

Mr. McPHERSON obtained the floor.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to make an observation in response to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. McPHERSON. I yield.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia, ostensibly replying to what I said, has gone into an argument to prove that what I said was correct.

Mr. BROWN. Not at all; the very reverse.

Mr. BLAIR. I stated that I sat here and declined to vote because I thought I was justified in doing so near the close of the last session and early in the present session. I said, the question whether a man should vote or not was for him to determine for himself in every instance, and that I justified the Senator from Georgia and those with whom he acts in voting as they please, in making such dilatory motions as they please, or, if they come to that, in declining to vote at all. It is for each one to determine for himself whether, in each specific act that he does, he ought or ought not to act one way or the other.

As an illustration of my position—and I prefaced it by saying that I was aware that my views on that point were not such as had been enunciated from this side of the Chamber by some individuals, at least—I stated that I must have the right to decide whether I would vote or not in the last instance, because if I have it not in one case I have it not in any, and if a question was pending here which involved the disruption of the Union, I being opposed to it, which measure could pass by my voting against it, thus making a quorum, which would be defeated by my withholding my vote and thus breaking a quorum, I should violate my obligation to maintain the Constitution by voting under those circumstances.

That is the position I took, and the Senator makes an argument to show that I am right, ostensibly replying to the main proposition which I laid down on that subject. If other Senators look at this matter differently, it is for them to utter their sentiments. If he, as he says, or his party has said, at least, dissents from that view of it, we shall see between now and next December whether he is consistent with his own doctrines or not. In order to meet this, as he asserts it to be, nefarious bargain, a measure which has been undertaken to be put through by the majority, he may find it necessary to break a quorum by withholding his vote; and does he say that he will make a quorum and elect Mr. Riddleberger rather than withhold his vote and prevent the consummation of this great crime, as he calls it?

Mr. BROWN. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

Mr. BLAIR. But the Senator cannot, when speaking with reference to this individual case, lay down a principle and say he will be bound by it to-day and not follow it to its conclusion. The honorable Senator ought to know, with his profound knowledge of law, with his great experience, and his vast abilities he does know, that principles are inexorable in their operation, and if they are good to-day they are good to-morrow, and if he proposes to fashion the conduct of a principle to-day he ought to be willing to be bound by it to-morrow. I am not one of those who get up here to apologize for my having withheld my vote on that occasion. I think I discharged a duty; and the honorable Senator from Rhode Island, if he thinks he did do a wrong thing on that occasion, does well to confess it and say he will never do so again.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Let me ask the Senator one question, because I am seeking information now.

Mr. BLAIR. I may not be able to give it; I can give my opinion.

Mr. BURNSIDE. How does he get rid of the rule of the Senate which says that when the vote is taken on a question if a Senator fails to vote his name shall be called and he shall then vote?

Mr. BLAIR. If that rule of the Senate is binding on me more than my obligation to maintain the Constitution under my oath, I ask why you can affix no penalty to it; why does it come to this, that in the last resort the man who does not vote is beyond your power? It has been demonstrated in the State Legislatures over this country hundreds of times, and hundreds of times in both branches of Congress, and certainly very many times in the other branch. How does it happen if that is a rule the violation of which is a violation of the constitutional oath, that there is no penalty that anybody has ever been able to devise to enforce it? And yet everybody concedes that if an individual member decides that he ought not to vote, and does not vote, the body is helpless.

Mr. McPHERSON. May I ask the honorable Senator what the ruling of the Chair was in that case?

Mr. BLAIR. He said you could take a horse to water, but you could not make him drink.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Chair held at that time, when republican members of the Senate refused to vote, that the Chair had no power to enforce the rule, or to call on any Senator to give his reasons for not voting, that that must be the action of the Senate; and thirty different republican Senators refusing to vote left the Senate without a quorum, and the Senate could not make an order in regard to them.

Mr. BLAIR. Why could they not? If it was wrong in those Senators, that is, if it was a wrong of which this body could take cognizance, why did they not do it? Why have they not done it previously? I ask the Senator if he knows of any obligation that has no penalty for its violation.

Mr. McPHERSON. I am not discussing that question with the Senator; I am discussing a question of fact. At the last session certain Senators on that side, in fact every republican Senator, refused to record his vote when his name was called.

Mr. BURNSIDE. That is a mistake which I desire to correct.

Mr. McPHERSON. Almost every one.

Mr. BURNSIDE. No, there were several who were paired with democrats as is proved here by the RECORD; on one occasion six republicans voted, on another occasion four, and on every occasion but one I cast my vote.

Mr. McPHERSON. There was not a sufficient number of Senators voting to make a quorum.

Mr. BURNSIDE. It was because enough democrats absented themselves without pairing to prevent a quorum, and they were acting in precisely the same interest that the republicans were acting.

Mr. McPHERSON. On the motion of the Senator from Connecticut, Mr. Eaton, not now here unfortunately, a certain Senator on that side was demanded to state his reasons why he did not vote. The Chair held at the time that it was not in the power of the Presiding Officer to compel a Senator to give his reasons, but it was the duty of the Senate. What Senate? A Senate without a quorum? A Senate without the power to do business, without the power to call a Senator to account simply because you refuse to vote to make a quorum? Still you do not call that revolutionary!

Mr. BURNSIDE. I will state to the Senator from New Jersey that I think the ruling was wrong.

Mr. McPHERSON. Very well.

Mr. BURNSIDE. If I had been in the chair I would have tried to make Senators vote.

Mr. McPHERSON. How could the Senator, on an appeal from the ruling of the Chair, enforce any order of the Senate without a quorum?

Mr. BURNSIDE. The presiding officer has a right to exercise his authority. I do not say how it can be done.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to know what has become of my rights? I have not yielded the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor, and must not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. BLAIR. Not for the purpose of a personal discussion, I should like the views of anybody on this question, how I can be held to have committed any parliamentary offense, any parliamentary crime, how I can have committed incipient revolution, how I can be held to have broken up the Government when I withhold my vote if I do it from conscientious motives although there may be a rule of the Senate which rule affixes no penalty whatever? I say the fact that here is a rule which has prevailed in almost every parliamentary body that has existed under any free government requiring of members that they should vote, and that yet in every such body, probably, certainly in the vast majority, that rule has been violated, and there never has been found yet any power to affix a penalty or to compel action or to avoid the result of non-action by the creation of a remedy by making a quorum in some other way, proves the correctness of my position. I would like to have any Senator indicate to me how it can be possible that that failure to vote is an offense, and yet during all these years and in all this experience there should not have been found some way to inflict a penalty. That is not a crime, in other words, which is not followed by a penalty of some kind, and I say the fact that this is the case, properly considered, proves clearly that it is, as I said, in the last resort a question for every member of a legislative body to decide for himself in what way he will best conserve the public good, whether by casting his vote or by withholding his vote.

Am I to pass a measure which would ruin my country by giving my vote upon it when by withholding that vote and breaking a quorum I defeat that measure? I made that supposition as an illustration of my position as justifying the right of the Senator from Georgia to vote until December on dilatory motions and make them himself if his conscience demands that of him. I see no other higher or possible rule by which the individual legislator can regulate his conduct. If I am guilty of discourtesy here in this body I may be expelled for it. If a casual word, offensive to my colleagues or my neighbors, my peers, in debate, may be the means of causing my expulsion, is that an offense for doing which no penalty whatever can be inflicted? By no manner of means. The rule must be as I state it, and Senators do not meet me unless they see fit under the pressure of existing circumstances to admit that their own record in the past is wrong. If they conscientiously think so, and then thought so, perhaps they were doing wrong. I hold to the right and the duty of confession and reformation; but I do not confess until I see that I am wrong. When I feel that way, I confess and I think I am willing to reform.

The Senator from Georgia lays down this proposition, that the republicans in this body are the party who are impeding the public business. Let us look at that. What is the pending question? Upon what question am I speaking to-day? That is the public business which is before the Senate, is it not? The executive business is not at this moment the pending public business; it is not before the Senate; it is on the table of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It ought to be the business before us.

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly it ought to be, and but for the Senators' conduct it would be. Who is it that obstructs public business here? The motion to postpone indefinitely (a legitimate motion) the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, that we proceed to the choice of the Secretary of the Senate, is the public business that is pending. We ask for a vote. If nobody interposes an objection, that vote will be taken in a minute and the business will be transacted, and the next thing in order will come up and that will be transacted. Now what prevents our taking that vote? Some democrat rises and moves to adjourn; some democrat rises and moves to go into executive session; some democrat rises and moves that when we adjourn we adjourn to a certain hour to-morrow, earlier than the usual hour of meeting; and they pile these motions one on top of the other, and any other dilatory motion that happens to occur to the ingenuity of gentlemen they interpose; and these are the questions, and these being the public business must be disposed of under the rules of the Senate. Is not that so?

Here is my honorable friend from Massachusetts pressing and pressing day after day for a vote on that which is the question before the Senate, the resolution which he offered that we proceed to the choice of a Secretary. If that vote was allowed to be taken, if no dilatory motion was allowed to interpose, it would be disposed of in five minutes. Everybody concedes that; and yet we have been here four weeks on it. What has occasioned this month of delay? Take the position of the Senators themselves on the other side who allege that we, the majority here, delay what they call the public business, the executive business, which is only a part of it under any circumstances. All the delay which we interpose against the transaction of that business as they admit, unless they place here these dilatory motions in the way, could be disposed of in half an hour. Then why are we here a month? Who interposes obstacles every time to our due and orderly procedure?

Do Senators on the other side ask us to submit to any sense of obligation in the way of official duty which is not equally binding upon them? You say that we should yield. Are we not as many as you, and with the casting vote which the Constitution provides in cases of this kind are we not a majority? Why should we yield to your opinions when you charge us with crime, with dishonor, with infamy? And then are you, gentlemen, to spread such a charge broadcast over the country and do it in such a way that you are not offensively responsible, and by that sort of mystification all the while evading the real issue? I ask you, Senators, why is it that thirty-nine should yield to thirty-eight? I imagine that we entertain for ourselves as much self-respect as you do for yourselves, and we yield you that you are honorable men, that you are conscientious, if you choose to put it so, and that you are conscientious in voting, if you had them all here, your thirty-eight votes to prevent the choice of a Secretary of the Senate, but then arises this practical question: we have thirty-nine, we have one majority, we claim to be as conscientious as you, actuated as strongly as you are by a sense of public duty, and ought you not to yield after you have taken sufficient time, as I grant you have the right, to exhaust the subject so far as legitimate debate is concerned? Whether that point is reached yet or not, it is not for me to say; that is for you to say. But the fact that you interpose these dilatory motions two, three, four, half a dozen times or a dozen times a day, shows that debate is exhausted, and you interpose these motions because there is no further occasion for debate.

Can you claim under these circumstances that it is we who are obstructing the public business? I do not so understand it. I will sit here, as the Senator from Georgia intimates he will, through the summer if necessary in vindication of what I believe to be a great and important principle, a principle which we ought to carry out in the conduct of the Senate. I believe it is a duty to do it. I believe that, for many reasons which I have not previously alluded to, it is an obligation resting upon us and of primary importance to demonstrate our disposition to enforce the rule that the majority shall govern, even if we fail to do it.

Mr. BUTLER. Right there may I ask the Senator from New Hampshire one question?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand him to announce the proposition that the numerical majority have the absolute, unchallenged, inherent right to rule in all things.

Mr. BLAIR. On such questions as may properly be submitted to the majority of the body, certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask him if he announces that proposition generally?

Mr. BLAIR. I do not announce any proposition that I do not consider pertinent to the debate. I do not care to launch out upon an indefinite field of discussion and of theoretical speculation.

Mr. BUTLER. I understood the Senator to say——

Mr. BLAIR. I believe that upon whatever matter is legitimately before the Senate under and by virtue of the provisions of the Constitution, within the legitimate range and limits of the powers of the Government, the majority of the Senate has the right to rule, always leaving to every individual the right to judge for himself how he shall vote, or whether he shall vote at all.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I understand the Senator——

Mr. BLAIR. Let me say to the Senator that I do not understand at all that it is my duty if I disbelieve in a measure to vote in order to enable the real majority to keep a quorum and thereby accomplish their end.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I understand the Senator to take the ground that, the minority conscientiously believing that a measure proposed by the majority is wrong, the mere fact of opposing it is not revolutionary.

Mr. BLAIR. I have tried to say that several times. The Senator has heard no charge of revolution from me. I think this question ought to go to the country upon the broad issue as I have endeavored to indicate it. I do not think Senators on the other side are guilty of treason because they choose to sit here until next December to prevent our enacting this measure. It might be so if the result of that act was the destruction of the Government or if the act was perpetrated with hostile designs on the Government in its essential powers. Then it would be either treason in fact or treason in spirit as the case might be.

Mr. BUTLER. I agree with the Senator in that.

Mr. BLAIR. I was speaking this last time because the honorable Senator from Georgia when I said the same thing got up to present his side of the question as though I had quarreled with him, whereas I had laid down the identical proposition which it appeared he had been replying to.

Mr. McPHERSON. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts, the leader of that side of the Chamber, to a matter which I fear he has forgotten. I wish to say to him by way of suggestion that having run this show now for six long weeks, judging from the thin appearance of the galleries to-day the public have lost sight of his entertainment; and inasmuch as the prince of showmen has advertised an opening here to-day, would it not be well for him to exercise the usual brother showmen's courtesy to his distinguished contemporary and close his show and permit the public to visit a good honest entertainment, one in which there is no fraud, no humbug? Now, if the honorable Senator wishes to make atonement to the public on this point, I will yield to him to make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. McPHERSON. If you wish to make a motion to adjourn I will yield; if not, I will make a motion to adjourn myself, but for quite a different reason.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. McPHERSON. I will yield to the Senator to make that motion if he will do so.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I take it that every Senator will follow his own inclination, and that there is nothing to hinder the Senator from New Jersey from going to Barnum's circus if he feels that either his inclination or his duty requires him to go there rather than to perform what he has sworn to perform here. Nothing, I assure him, that I can do, or propose to do, will interfere one straw's weight to prevent the Senator from following his inclination to the circus. I did not observe, as it passed through Pennsylvania avenue, any of those little animals that would be likely to attract the Senator's attention; but still I have no doubt he will find there enough to satisfy him. As for myself, I feel as if there was something else to be done.

I observe that the Senator from Georgia drops into prophecy as Mr. Wegg did into poetry, and he is laboring under an impression that the people are behind him. I want to say in reference to that, that I do not think the Senator from Georgia is a success as a prophet. The Senator has had visions before which seemed to fill his whole horizon for the moment, and caused him to turn very short corners, and, if rumor is correct, the Senator has had a revelation since he left his home and came here to discharge these duties and sees now what he did not see then.

Mr. President, I cannot undertake to follow the Senator in his propheşying. It is a matter for him to determine for himself. I am quite willing to finish up this work with the Senator and appeal to the people, and if he has any confidence in his own prophecy he will make haste to join me and finish it up, in order that we can make an early appeal to the people. The Senator's falling back, shrinking from the discharge of his duty, claiming all the time that the people are against us, is a confession that the Senator has not confidence in his own prophecies. If he thought we were committing suicide in this action of ours, if he really believed we were doing that which the people would condemn, if he had any confidence in his own appeal to the people, he would not throw any obstruction in the way. He has gone through with the Constitution and the rules to satisfy himself; I cannot say certainly but what he had some expectation that he would satisfy somebody else. I am not certain about that, but I have no doubt that he did it with a determination to satisfy himself that he could use rules prescribed under the Constitution for facilitating the proceedings of the Senate to thwart the proceedings of the Senate. I have no doubt having satisfied himself, reasoned himself into the idea that because he could use rules of the Senate made expressly to facilitate the proceedings of the Senate to thwart those proceedings, he concluded that ten chances to one he was acting constitutionally. I would not disturb the Senator in that conclusion for all the world. I have never seen anybody in my experience here sit down so completely satisfied as the Senator from Georgia seemed to have done with his Bible in his hand, that new Bible; new to him, I am free to say; that to which he has consecrated himself anew in a sense in which I could not do it; that to which he is giving, not his first love, but a new love, after the prophecies in which he has indulged for the last twenty years have flitted for a while before his vision and filled his horizon and then disappeared like the mist of the morning. Men never will learn experience; men never will learn to devote themselves to that for which they have a gift. They are prone the world over to think they are best fitted for that for which all the world else thinks they are least fitted; and the Senator from Georgia, I know, will take it kindly when I say that I fear that he is not an exception.

Why, let me appeal to the Senator, assuming for once that he does believe in what he says, assuming for once that the Senator is sincere, and I have no doubt he is for the moment, in all he says and all he does. Following the interesting history of the Senator's last twenty years, full of novelty, breaking out in a new place everywhere when least expected, I never had a doubt but what sincerity was at the bottom of it; and he will understand me that I am not reflecting upon that, but assuming that he is just as sincere to-day as he ever has been; I appeal to that sincerity when I say that, if he believes that the people are going to condemn our action, then let him join with me in the consummation of it; let him vote against it himself, and he and I will appeal to the people. Let us make an end of it. Do not let us hang back from it, saying that the people are condemning it. If I believed that any measure of the other side, having control and the power under the Constitution to claim it, was fraught with a certainty of public condemnation, I should satisfy myself with having done all that the Constitution required of me to convince that majority of their error in appeals to their judgment and to their conscience, and, if I failed in them, recording my vote against it, and turning from their deaf and reluctant ears to the people, from whom there is no appeal. I submit to the Senator that it would be wise for him to come to the same conclusion, and not resort to revolutionary measures, to means that the Constitution condemns; not resort to methods which, followed out to their legitimate results, would certainly subvert and overthrow the institutions of the country, to prevent an appeal to the people. Sir, he who does that stands confessed as a man having no confidence in his own prophecy.

Now, Mr. President, nothing hinders our taking a vote upon this resolution, and I hope we may do it, so that the Senator from New Jersey may not feel that he has been deprived of that which is nearest his heart.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, before we take that vote I should like to have a word to say in reply to my friend from Massachusetts. I have no doubt he will be willing to hear me a few minutes before taking the vote, as he thinks it is so near the consummation of the great act of his life. He for the last month or two having been placed in the lead of republican Senators here, he occupies a very important position, and he has shown himself a very skillful leader. We all have admired greatly his tact, his humor, his wit, his good nature, and all that versatility of talent for which the Senator is distinguished; and his cordiality, kindness, and kind-heartedness we all appreciate; we feel almost oppressed with the weight of our obligations in these respects. Still, when he undertakes to read us lectures occasionally, he is not as successful as a lecturer as he is as a parliamentarian or tactician, and not as familiar sometimes with certain books as he ought to be as a leader.

There is one old book that I wish he would familiarize himself more with. He says I got up here with a new Bible in my hand. It is a good book and I ought to read it more than I do, and I try to read it sometimes, but I wish the Senator would use this book that I have. It is the Constitution and the rules of the Senate, not so good a book as the Bible; probably I had better have been reading the better book; but I would commend it to the Senator as worth while for us both to consult more. I presume the Senator has read while he is charged with the great burden of passing this measure through. Sometimes he speaks kindly and gently to us, as softly as the zephyrs, at other times he uses a little the lash of the revolutionist and tells us we are now revolutionary in the matter. Indeed, he has coaxed us in a great many ways and terrified us once in a while, but still we have not been able to see exactly that it was our duty to follow him. Whenever he convinces us that this is a proper measure for us to act upon and that it ought to take precedence of all other measures, we will come in then and transact it most freely; and while we may vote against it we shall let him have a vote when we reach a point where it has proper precedence; but I see the forty-third rule of the Senate defines the precedence of different measures and motions here. It says:

When a question is pending, no motion shall be received but—

Then follow the motions. Here is a question pending, to wit, a resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, this is pending as he claims and he seems to think that because he has got it under the order of his caucus before the Senate and it is pending, therefore it has precedence over everything else. My friend forgets that there are a dozen motions almost that take precedence of it that we have thought proper to make from time to time because we believed they ought to have precedence:

1. To adjourn,
2. To adjourn to a day certain, or that, when the Senate adjourn, it shall be to a day certain,
3. To take a recess,
4. To proceed to the consideration of executive business,
5. To lay on the table,
6. To postpone indefinitely,
7. To postpone to a day certain,
8. To commit,
9. To amend;

which several motions shall have precedence in the order in which they stand arranged; and the motions relating to adjournment, to take a recess, to proceed to executive business, and to lay on the table, shall be decided without debate.

There are really nine motions laid down in the forty-third rule that all according to the rules of the Senate have precedence of the resolution which the Senator from Massachusetts is insisting upon and that he means to try to pass. Here every day he puts that resolution at us and some one of these other motions occurs to us as more important than that, and when we move them he cannot get up and say and he has not appealed to the Chair, "my measure has precedence to yours." No; because it is true ours always have precedence. We could not make the motions but for that, and could not get a vote on them; we could not be heard if we did not have precedence; and yet the Senator stands here persistently from day to day and from time to time and from week to week and insists on going on with a measure that does not have precedence under our rules.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. BROWN. No, I am not.

Mr. DAWES. I will show the Senator his mistake.

Mr. BROWN. I shall be glad to be put right on the matter.

Mr. DAWES. I shall attempt it any way. I said the Senator thought he was doing his duty by availing himself of these rules which he has just read, which were designed to facilitate the proceedings of the Senate, to thwart the will of the majority. That is what I stated. The Senator did not observe what I said. It was that he felt that it was his duty to avail himself of rules laid down for that purpose, to overthrow the will of the majority. That is what I said to him. Now, if the Senator will address himself to this point, he will enlighten me: What does he make these motions for? Does he make them for the purpose which the Senator from Ohio avowed and the Senator from West Virginia avowed? Is he cooperating with his associates on that side, or do those who make them—he does not make them—use them for the purpose which they avow, that is, that this Senate shall not do certain things?

Mr. BROWN. Now I will reply to that with a great deal of pleasure because the Senator puts it in a forcible light as he always does. I am always delighted to hear him. He has a particular measure before the Senate that he has reported as the leader of his caucus, as the leader of his party; and in caucus they have determined that the most important thing on the face of the earth now to be done is to elect Mr. Riddleberger and Mr. Gorham and their associates to these offices. They have concluded that that must be done and that it must take precedence over everything else. On this side of the Chamber we have concluded that that is not important at all; we think it ought not to be done. The Senator comes in and makes his proposition to go on and do that; we differ from him and think it would be much more important to go ahead and do the business that the President called us here to do; to go into executive session and transact the important business of the country, which does look more important than Riddleberger and Gorham, and we make then a motion which really takes precedence of his, that is entitled to precedence, which is a motion to go into executive session, that we make oftener than any other because that is right in the line of duty; that is a proposition to do the very work we are called here to do, and it takes precedence of his measure, and we have a right to a hearing upon it. We think his measure is an exceeding unwise one and it looks strange to us that the Senator from Massachusetts will come up, and after his proposition has been so often superseded by another motion that has precedence, taking the lead, refuse to learn something by this experience.

He says some men are very slow to learn, well satisfied with themselves always, and he undertakes to apply it to me; and he says men do not prophesy aright and make mistakes. Now we really think on this side that the Senator learns wisdom by experience slower than almost any man of his profound depth we have ever seen. We have again and again assured him that here is much more important business that ought to have precedence; we have invited him again and again to go into executive session and do that business—a motion that he does not deny has precedence over his resolution; a measure that I think the country will not deny is vastly more important than his; and still here he is from day to day and from day to day pressing it upon us in preference to other motions that we make and have a right to make that have precedence.

Therefore we are not obstructing the business of the country. We are trying to do that which we have a right to do, that it is important to do. We want to appoint judges for the courts, and ministers and consuls to conduct our foreign intercourse, and to act on treaties and all these important measures, and we bring them up in a way that they antagonize the Senator's measure, and yet the Senator from time to time learns so slowly that really we must lose our patience but for his extreme good nature and the extreme love we bear him. We might once in a while talk sharply to him, but we cannot. Day after day we try to give line upon line and precept upon precept; we try to get him to come up and abandon the error of his ways, to go into executive session, to do the business, to allow the motions that have precedence under the Constitution of the United States, which gives the right to make rules, to take precedence; and still the Senator will not do it, and then he gets up and undertakes to read me a little lecture about my propheseying.

I have sometimes made mistakes in prophecies, no doubt about that; and I am not sure but that the honorable Senator himself has on some occasions; I do not propose to say whether he is not a good prophet, but I think he knows a great deal and sees a great deal into futurity, and yet I cannot help believing that on this occasion my prophecy will turn out to be true. I think, for the reasons I gave a while ago, when we make this appeal to the people we shall be successful. We have to look just that far into futurity. We may be wrong. If we should be, and the people condemn us, we will yield with as good grace I suppose as you ever saw gentlemen do. We will say you were right, because the popular voice says so.

One more remark, however. The honorable Senator went on to say that I had received some new revelation from home if reports be true, and have changed my position. In that the honorable Senator is entirely mistaken, permit me to say. I have received no new revelation; I have made no change of position; I stand to-day precisely where I stood when I was a candidate for the Senate; I stand upon the very platform I stood upon then. I have been carrying it out in the utmost good faith as I understand it; I intend to continue to do so. So I have stood for the execution of the constitutional amendments, a free ballot, and a fair count. I intend to continue to stand there, and I have had no new revelation on the subject. I have had a great many letters saying, "You are right in this matter; go ahead, go forward." And if the Senator will excuse me, I will say that I have had some of them from prominent republicans in my State, and I have had it from the month of prominent republicans in my State here in this city that they thought their party was not acting wisely, that they believed I was doing right, and that they thought I ought to stand right where I had been standing. If by a new revelation the Senator means that I have since I have gotten into this fight been informed from home by everybody on one side and a portion of the other side that I ought to continue to stand here, I am willing to confess there is a new revelation, but to no other extent. I stand exactly on the platform I stood on when elected, and I think I shall continue to stand there.

Now, if there is any question the Senator wants to put——

Mr. DAWES. What I wanted the Senator to explain was this: while he was dwelling upon their anxiety to proceed to public business as manifested by constantly making a motion to proceed to executive business, I wanted him to explain why his side alternated that motion with a motion to adjourn and not do anything?

Mr. BROWN. Because by that——

Mr. DAWES. Wait a moment. Just one-half their motions are to proceed to executive business and the other half of them are to do nothing; and why did the Senator insist upon it that they show their anxiety to do executive business when just half the time they are moving to do nothing? If they cannot do that particular thing, they will not do anything. That is the interpretation of their motions. I know the Senator will say that is the only way they can defeat the will of the majority; I know that very well; but let me assure the Senator he had better quit this attempt to overthrow the will of the majority. It puts him in an absurd position as well as an unpatriotic one when he gets up so anxious to do something else. The RECORD shows that just one-half the time he is trying to do nothing, and when he gets up and says rather than do what the majority desire to do he will do nothing, then the RECORD shows he is trying to do something else. So his record has no consistency in it except that inconsistency which always follows those who are in this business of attempting to overthrow the will of the majority. Bent on that, they resort from time to time to measures for that purpose which are inconsistent with themselves and consistent in nothing else except the purpose of undertaking to command the majority.

Mr. BROWN. Now, Mr. President, I have heard with great pleasure my friend from Massachusetts, and while he was lecturing me awhile ago for prophesying, he turns right around and does it himself, and prophesies that I had better quit. He is wrong about that. I had not; it would be a false prophecy. You will find it is better for me to go on just as I am going. If I were to quit I should commit a great error. Your prophecy is wrong, my friend; I had not better quit. I cannot agree with the Senator, but I do not believe his expectation will be realized; I feel very sure it will not.

Now, he says we make two motions where we really make half a dozen; one is to go into executive session; then the next is to adjourn. Do you know the reason of that? We want to defeat a very mischievous motion that you have here, and we try all the time to get you to go into executive session and do the business you ought to do; but when you will not do that, we take it for granted, of course, that, as you will not go on with the regular business of the Senate, you are willing to adjourn, and to try that we make a motion to adjourn; and when you will not do that, as we do not like your proposition, we move to lay it on the table or postpone it indefinitely or something of that sort; and on the supposition that you ought to go into executive session and do the business of the country when you have it to be done, we suppose it is for some reason you are not ready now, and we think if we would adjourn then and give you time to consider it, you would go into executive session the next time we gave you a chance. Hence we make the motion; and now you refuse to do it. We have the right to make all these motions; they all take precedence; but really we have great difficulty in knowing which one to make. I want to suit the Senator from Massachusetts and would like to make such a motion as would suit him; but we cannot tell whether he prefers to adjourn or to go into executive session; hence we have to guess about the motion.

Mr. DAWES. I will tell the Senator confidentially what motion I want him to make——

Mr. BROWN. Let it be between us.

Mr. DAWES. And that is to proceed to take the vote on the pending question.

Mr. BROWN. In great confidence I will say to the Senator in reply that just now I would not prefer to do that. I think we had better go into executive session and do that business which is more important for us, and therefore I move that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator from Georgia will listen to me a moment, I should like to ask one question, not with a view of getting into a debate for I do not desire to do that. I understood the Senator from Kentucky in the discussion of this question to say that the other side were determined on their course because of the fact that the election of Mr. Riddleberger was such an outrage on the Senate and the country that they would not submit to it. I want to ask the Senator from Georgia if he agrees with that proposition stated by the Senator from Kentucky; if that is the reason of this obstruction to proceeding to the public business? Is the fact that Mr. Riddleberger would be elected Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate the reason?

Mr. BROWN. That is simply one of the reasons. There are other very strong reasons. We do not choose to go on because we do not think Mr. Riddleberger ought to be elected; we do not think the other gentlemen nominated ought to be elected, and we do not think that the present gentlemen ought to be displaced. Then as to other private reasons we may have, we do not choose to tell them. They are sufficient to govern our conduct, and upon them we shall appeal to the people at the proper time; and governed by those reasons which are satisfactory to ourselves we do not choose as long as we can prevent it to have this resolution carried out.

Mr. LOGAN. Now one other question. If it is a fact that the Senator from Georgia states his opposition and that of his colleagues correctly, that the obstruction to the public business means that Mr. Gorham shall not be elected because it is wrong to elect him, that Mr. Riddleberger shall not be elected because it is wrong to elect him, that Mr. Johnson should not be elected because it is wrong to elect him—if that be true I ask in all seriousness if it is a wrong perpetrated upon the Senate and upon the people of the country to elect these men to these offices, tell me what will change the state of the case next December if the same men are before the Senate and the same men to go out that are to go out now? If that is the principle that this election shall not take place because it is wrong for these men to be elected, please tell me what change will take place between now and December to make it right that they shall be elected then? That is what I want to get at.

I have heard all this poetry; it is very entertaining, day after day; but there is something always in a case that has some nut in it if you get at it. I want to get at the point. We can hear these speeches on other occasions, if necessary, but the question is to get at the point. If it is wrong now will it be right in December? That is the question I want some gentleman to answer.

Mr. BROWN. The wrong is of a character that we can now very properly resist it. In December there might be something else so important that we would then permit you to take the responsibility of the wrong and do it then, but at present there is no such responsibility as that upon us. There might be a usage that made it proper in December when Congress was in session that we should not throw any obstacles in the way of having a vote on this question. Those reasons do not exist now. Now it is in conformity to usage not to elect; then it might be in conformity to usage to elect; therefore there might be very decided reason in one case why we should stand and in the other why we might ultimately give way. I do not say we would; but there is still another reason, and that is that we have no idea we shall be troubled with Mr. Riddleberger when we meet in December.

Mr. LOGAN. It just comes to this—and it is easy to get this whole thing in a nutshell so that we shall understand one another—that there may be a usage or there may not be. We know there is no usage. So far as this is concerned elections have taken place at executive sessions and at regular sessions, so that there is no violation of usage. It is not that. That point is not well taken. If there is no violation of usage the question resolves itself back to the proposition I stated first: if it is wrong in principle to elect these men now there is nothing that would make it right in December; and when you admit the proposition that it is wrong now but may be right in December you give your whole case away and admit that you are obstructing public business just because you have the power to do it. If you say these men are unworthy to be officers to-day they are unworthy to be officers in December, and when you say the principle is correct for you to obstruct business to-day it is just as correct for you to do it in December. So, then, the principle upon which you are acting is not correct and cannot be held to be correct by any people who understand that which is right or understand logic and reason.

You say Mr. Riddleberger will be out of the way in December. How do you know he will be out of the way? That is a strange reason to give. That is no reason at all.

Another proposition I want to put. It is said Mr. Riddleberger is the block in the way. Mr. Riddleberger is not on that table in the resolution that you are obstructing. The resolution pending is for the election of Secretary of the Senate, which you vote against every day. You never have reached the proposition for the election of Mr. Riddleberger once, and yet you have been discussing for a month the question as to Mr. Riddleberger's right to be elected when you have never been asked to vote on that proposition. In ten minutes or in five minutes any one who understands this proposition can puncture that bubble which you have created here and show that there is nothing in it. It is all a fallacy, and the country will so understand it. The principle if right now is right forever; if you stand by it now, you are as much bound to stand by it in December, just precisely. It will not do to say that some business may arise which will cause you to yield; it will not do to say that, for you have said right here—and when I say "you" I mean the Senators on that side; I do not apply it to any particular individual—you have said time and again that you would obstruct the public business here for the purpose of preventing the election of these officers. If you are justified in your own consciences in doing that now for the purpose of preventing a great wrong, you are just as much justified one year from to-day in performing the same act. If there has been a bargain made, as you have indirectly charged, but not alleged, and therefore you cannot agree to this great wrong, will there be any less a bargain in December than there is now? Will there be any less a justification then than now, I should like to know.

Why, sir, if I may use the expression, this pretense which is presented to the country is a shallow pretense; there is nothing in it. As far as any bargain is concerned, there is not a republican on this side of the Chamber but knows that there is no foundation for any such insinuation or innuendo. I have heard many things said here that I myself knew the contrary of. It was intimated by the Senator from Kentucky that messengers were passing between the caucus and the Senator from Virginia. I do not wish to disclose anything, but only to say to him that his informant did not know what he was talking about. That is all.

Mr. BECK. Do you mean that I said messages were going from the caucus to the Senator?

Mr. LOGAN. Some person——

Mr. BECK. I am not the man.

Mr. LOGAN. It was said here the other day on that side of the Chamber.

Mr. BECK. I have never alluded to that at all.

Mr. LOGAN. I may have been mistaken in the person, but it was said here the other day. I do not care about discussing that, and I did not rise to discuss anything except to present one proposition, and it is the only proposition that I want to present. I do not want to talk for hours about a thing that has but one point in it. All the point there is in this proposition is whether you are justified in obstructing the public business to prevent an outrage upon the country, as you say, if you will not be justified in doing the same thing in December. That is all there is in this whole thing. If there is a justification now there will be a justification then; if there is not now there will not be then. If your action is correct now you will be bound to continue it in December, and on and on; and the people will so understand it.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I hope we may have a vote on the pending question.

Mr. CONKLING. Question on the resolution.

Mr. DAWES. Let us vote on the resolution and then adjourn.

Mr. BROWN. Before we pass upon the resolution I simply want to say a word or two to my friend.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Georgia seems pleased with the idea that we are going to have a vote on the resolution.

Mr. BROWN. As it is going to be passed right away, I suppose having waited a good while it may wait a few minutes longer. I see the impatience of my friend from Massachusetts, and I regret very much to throw any obstacles in the way; at the same time I ask to trespass for a moment.

I have not said in reference to December that it would not be proper for us to stand on our position then. That is not the ground. I intimated that there was important legislative business to be done at that time and we might permit you to take the responsibility then of doing a thing that we thought was a very bad thing to do; but I will state to the Senator distinctly that judging from what we hear on both sides from the people, between now and December there will be no room for dispute about this thing. We are not afraid of having it to meet. If we have it to meet then we will try to meet it manfully and act then upon our convictions. In that connection I say as I said awhile ago to the Senator from New Hampshire, "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." For the present we have good reason, as we think, for doing what we are now doing. We propose to do what we are now doing, and not to obstruct the public business either. The Senator twice repeats that.

We are standing here the advocates of the transaction of the public business. We are ready every and any moment to go on with the public business—the public business that on any Senator's motion takes precedence of the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, and as we think much more important public business. Therefore we are not obstructing what we consider important public business; we are trying in a legal and constitutional way to get at the transaction of the most important public business, and we are trying to reach it by rules that give it precedence.

Mr. DAWES. Now I hope we may have a vote on the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN,] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business

Mr. HAMPTON. Before that motion is put I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois one question. I have made no reflection nor given any intimation as to any bargain. The Senator from Massachusetts the other day said that there had been no conferences between republican Senators and the Senator from Virginia. I understood the Senator from Illinois just now to make in substance the same statement. Now I wish to ask those gentlemen——

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me I will say exactly what I did state. I said that I understood some Senator the other day, and I thought it was the Senator from Kentucky, to make the statement that he had heard that during the session of the caucus communications were going on constantly between the Senator from Virginia and our caucus. I said that was not true and that his informant was mistaken. That is what I said, and that is all I did say.

Mr. HAMPTON. I wish on that very point to ask the Senator a question, because I do not wish to do anybody injustice. I have been informed that while the republican caucus was in session the Senator from Virginia was in the committee-room of the Committee on Private Land Claims and that there were communications made between the two committee-rooms. I ask both those Senators (it would relieve my mind of a great deal of anxiety and doubt about this matter) to state whether that was so or not, if he was not there at that time or where he was.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator ask me?

Mr. HAMPTON. You said that there were no conferences.

Mr. DAWES. I simply say that I never heard of it before to-day. It may have been so, but I never heard of it before to-day. I never heard he was ever in the committee-room of the Committee on Private Land Claims, or that anybody ever had any conference with him about the thing. I stated here in debate that the Senator from Virginia took his position without conference with anybody, coming to his own conclusion. I cannot repeat in exact words what I said; but what I intended to say, what I said in substance was that the Senator from Virginia chose his own position without conference with us, without conference with anybody, judging for himself through what instrumentalities he could do the great work in which he was engaged. That is what I said in substance. As to the particular interrogatory of the Senator from South Carolina, I say distinctly I never knew of his ever having been in the committee-room of the Committee on Private Land Claims and to have conferences; still he might have been; I never heard of it before.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator desires me I will say if there were any conferences going on at the time during the continuance of the caucus, I never heard of them. That is all I can say.

Mr. President, one word in answer to the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN.] I do not give his words, but substantially he said that the object they were trying to pursue might change in such a manner that in December they would not be required to proceed in the way in which they are doing at this time. He also said that they were following the Constitution and the rules for the purpose of getting at public business. Let us see if the eminent lawyer from Georgia is correct. The Constitution provides that—

> The Vice-President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote unless they be equally divided.

What follows—

> The Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a President pro tempore in the absence of the Vice-President.

A Vice-President being elected and he being the presiding officer of the Senate, then the Constitution provides that the Senate shall choose their other officers. That is a constitutional provision; and exactly what we are attempting to do in the Senate now is under that provision of the Constitution to choose the other officers. What other officers? Other than the President of the Senate. That officer has already been chosen. Then the Constitution says "The Senate shall choose their other officers," meaning precisely what we are trying to do—a Secretary and other officers necessary for the business of the Senate; and this Senator stands here and says we are not following the provisions of the Constitution, but they are trying to carry out the Constitution in their manner and way of doing, that is, by obstructing the majority of the Senate in proceeding to do exactly what the Constitution requires them to do.

The Senator says that these officers may be chosen at a regular session, not at an executive session. There is nothing in the Constitution of that kind; there is nothing in the rules of that kind; there is nothing in the precedents of that kind, for they have been chosen both at regular and executive sessions.

Then when Senators say they are complying with the Constitution in what they are doing, the Constitution speaking for itself says they are not, for the Senate is required to proceed to the election of its other officers after the Vice-President is elected to act as the presiding officer of the Senate of the United States. This is exactly what we are trying to do. The resolution that you are obstructing is to do what? Not to elect any individual, but to proceed to the election of officers of the Senate, as provided for in the Constitution.

Mr. BUTLER. We have officers.

Mr. LOGAN. So we would have officers if we were to remain here for five years, until they are changed; but does the Senator pretend that the Senate has not a right to change its officers? Does he pretend that?

Mr. BUTLER. I make no pretension at all about anything, Mr. President.

Mr. LOGAN. Then it is not necessary to say "we have officers." We all know that. Even the most ignorant of us here knows that much without being taught by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HAMPTON. I must say with all frankness that I do not think the answer that was given by the two Senators was as frank as the answer that is always given by the Senator from Massachusetts. If the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Illinois say that they were not aware of any conference on that occasion, I would ask another question, and it is this: Whether the Senator from Virginia was not up in the committee-room of the Committee on Private Land Claims?

Mr. LOGAN. You can ask the Senator from Virginia. Perhaps he will tell you.

Mr. HAMPTON. I will ask the Senator from Virginia. I ask whether there had been any communications at all between himself and the caucus during the pendency of their meetings.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Virginia spoke for himself the other day, in which he stated that while no Senator from either side approached him with any improper propositions Senators on both sides conferred with him in his quarters and in their own.

Mr. HAMPTON. Did any confer with him in the Private Land Claims Committee room?

Mr. DAWES. Wait one moment. He said that Senators conferred with him from both sides in their own quarters and in his, and he would not without their permission disclose what they said further than this, he would say that the propositions made to him were not improper. So I assume from his statement that there were conferences with him of some kind or other, proper conferences because he said they were, and because I assume that no Senator on either side would hold anything but a proper conference with him. Proper conferences were held with him by Senators on both sides. I used this statement the other day in reply to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] solely for the purpose of saying that there was nothing about the Senator from Virginia, nothing in his political position or personal character, that prevented Senators of the other side from conferring with him about the organization, until they found that he would not go with them. Now the Senator from South Carolina goes farther and wants to know of me if he was not in the Private Land Claims Committee room while we had a caucus, and I have responded frankly that I never heard of it until now.

Mr. LOGAN. Suppose he was?

Mr. DAWES. I was going to say further that if he was there, I do not know anything in either the laws or the Constitution of the land, or anything relative to his personal integrity, which should make it improper for him to be there. I do not know that he was there; I have not the slightest evidence that he was there; but I do not know why the Senator from South Carolina or any Senator on that side should hold a rod over the Senator from Virginia and say he shall not go into the Private Land Claims Committee room. I hold somehow or other the notion that the Senator from Virginia, coming here with the commission of his State, has got all the rights of any other Senator and any gentleman on this floor. Until I see something in him that will forfeit them, I do not think there is any occasion for me to be catechised as to what he does consistent with either. If the Senator desires anything that I know about it, he is just as welcome to it as my own brother.

Mr. HAMPTON. I think the Senator from Massachusetts misunderstood the scope and spirit of my inquiry.

Mr. DAWES. I saw it just as clear as day.

Mr. HAMPTON. He always does that—as clear as mud. The question that I asked him was not in reference to the right of the Senator from Virginia to go into that or any other committee-room. He has all the rights and privileges and immunities that pertain to any other Senator upon this floor.

Mr. DAWES. And he has one other that the rest of us do not seem to have, and that is to be abused by the men who tried to win him.

Mr. HAMPTON. And to be praised by the men who did win him. The point that I made was, as I said very frankly, to try to disabuse my mind of any suspicion in regard to the matter. I will say, with the frankness that becomes me, and I mean it in entire frankness, I have been told that when the republican caucus was in session in an adjacent room the Senator from Virginia was in that committee-room, and that there were communications made between himself and the caucus.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

Mr. HAMPTON. I am not through. I heard somebody reply that there were communications.

Mr. DAWES. No; nobody said that.

Mr. HAMPTON. I do not know about that. I simply wanted to ask that question; and to ask another. If there were no conferences, if there were no communications, if there was no expression on his part of any wish in regard to the organization of the Senate, how does it happen that he says he alone is responsible for the nomination of Mr. Riddleberger as Sergeant-at-Arms?

Mr. DAWES. I do not see any sequitur in that. Suppose he was in the room of the Committee on Private Land Claims?

Mr. HAMPTON. Was he or was he not?

Mr. DAWES. Suppose I should admit that which I do not know a word of, which I never heard of before, that he was in the committee-room of the Committee on Private Land Claims and that somebody from the republican caucus conferred with him, then the Senator from South Carolina gets up here and asks how that can be and he say he is responsible for Riddleberger. I want to ask the Senate, and I am almost tempted to ask the Senator from South Carolina a few questions. I should like to know if the Senator from Virginia is a leper what Senators who were of the committee to adjust the committees on the other side went to his room for and held conversations with him and conferred with him?

Mr. BAYARD. Who did?

Mr. DAWES. I should like to know what Senators on the other side who were not of the committee to arrange the committees of the body were conferring with a political leper for? I should like to know further when he began to be a political leper? Senators on the other side say they never dreamed till after they had been here two weeks but what the Senator from Virginia was going arm-in-arm with them. With all his sins upon his head they never dreamed but that he was just as good a democrat as sits on that side, until our good friend there in an unguarded moment said he had chosen a seat on this side. Then all at once the scales fell from their eyes, and they saw the Senator from Virginia in all the enormities of a political leper. They had wooed him, they had sent committees to him, they had begged him, their national committee had gone and conferred with him, they had told him they would give him five out of eleven electors of his own choice if he would only go in with them; and then they told him they would give him six; and then they told him that he might have anything he wanted if he would stand with them. They told him that they were with him in this fight and this idea about the public debt, which is frittered all away between him and his colleague now, as both admit that one-third ought to be paid by West Virginia, and it comes down between them all to just a difference of interest, one side professing that they ought to pay the whole of it and doing nothing toward it, and the other saying "We are willing to pay half of it." That is the difference between them. That is all the sin there is on his head except that he will not go with the regular democracy. But this is the trouble: up to a given time, a time so sudden to them, as sudden as the revelations to Saul of Tarsus on his way to Damascus to persecute the saints, as sudden to them as all that, it was that the Senator from West Virginia became unworthy of public association with them.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Not West Virginia.

Mr. DAWES. I mean the Senator from Virginia. Oh, the Senators from West Virginia have never fallen into any such category. I owe them an apology. There is nothing that is christened democratic that the Senator from West Virginia ever hesitated a moment except as to its size before he swallowed it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Except as to what?

Mr. DAWES. They do not pay debts at all——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. May I ask the Senator as to what he excepts. I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. DAWES. There is nothing so enormous in democratic doctrines, nothing which so shocks the public sense and conscience that democrats ever avow, that I have ever heard the Senator from West Virginia hesitate a moment in swallowing except as to its size, and then he took it by degrees. [Laughter.]

But all I have to say is to marvel that the Senator from Virginia on my right was such a good man all through last summer's campaign as to receive more attention from the national committee, from those who held high position, from him who held the third office in the gift of the nation, and from those who have splendid mansions here in this city thrown wide open for his entertainment when he came here that he might not be beguiled by the blandishments of republicanism. Of all that astonishes me as I grow older and witness wonder after wonder among the democratic performances, nothing has surpassed this wonderful revelation that, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, a great and good leader like Peter the Hermit came to be a Judas, a leper, as the distinguished Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] in his abundant and what somebody has called reeling rhetoric, has called a leper, a political leper, all at once. Had he chosen a seat on the other side, had he concluded to vote for the organization——

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. President——

Mr. DAWES. I hope I have not offended the Senator. It was out of admiration for that rhetoric that I alluded to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. LAMAR. Whatever may be the opinion of the Senator I must try to bear it even as well as I can. I simply rose to state that I applied no such epithet to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. DAWES. All the difference was that this doctrine which he has avowed for a year and a half and which the democratic party has been struggling to take with him and his vote for a year and a half was a leprous one; but having proposed to take him with it, if they supposed they could take him without it, cannot we take him without it?

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. DAWES. I want to get along with the Senator from South Carolina. I owe an apology to the Senate. I came into the Senate with a solemn determination not to open my head to-day, but the Senator from Georgia has been too much for me.

Mr. CALL. May I ask the Senator a question? Will he please state his authority for saying that the Senator from Virginia for a year and a half has expressed opinions on the subject of "a free ballot and a fair count" different from the State of Virginia? What is his authority for that statement?

Mr. DAWES. May be I have got the time a week too long; possibly I have got it four days longer by the almanac.

Mr. CALL. I will say for three months.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator, I have no doubt, took alarm the first moment he heard of it, and he can tell what day it was better than myself.

Mr. President, I do not look upon the Senator from Virginia, he will allow me to say, as perfect. I do not agree with the Senator from Virginia in very many things. The Senator from Virginia is far from being up to my idea of what is required. But the Senator from Virginia is about a good work, a great work, a work which will grow upon his hands, and whether he or those whom that work affects know it or not, he will grow in grace as he grows in strength, and he will go on in that great work from step to step if he is true to it and to himself. I am not here as one to see how much there is about the Senator's position that I cannot agree with. I would rather turn and see how much of it there is I can agree with. When I find that work to be what it is represented to be here (and I do not propose to ask the Senate to listen to its repetition) I am not to be diverted from association with him in that work because he has been doing other political work at other times and in localities that I have nothing to do with; but it is because I gather re-enforcement in that work to which I am myself devoted and those with whom I am associated at the hands of the Senator from Virginia and those who co-operate with him.

We are told to-day for the first time a new feature of this opposition to the will of the majority, and that is that this shall be postponed till December; that Riddleberger shall be eliminated from this contest, and then Senators on the other side will consent that the will of the majority shall be obeyed. Then it has come to this, that over one man, the question of Sergeant-at-Arms, this fight is continued, inspired, as was said by the message of the ex-governor of Virginia to the Senator on the left, that it was necessary to beat off the will of the majority till December in the interest of a democratic campaign in Virginia. That is the confession to-day, that the whole public business of the nation, the will of the majority provided for by the Constitution, everything must be held at bay in the interest of a democratic campaign in Virginia in the coming summer. That stands to-day as a confessed new phase of opposition to the will of the Senate itself.

I am willing to take these phases as they come up, each one of them; I am willing to present them to the American people and to take their judgment upon them. For the last twenty years those who espouse this cause have been appealing to the people. The people have heard their appeal each four years, and the last appeal has had judgment rendered upon it more emphatic than any other. The gentlemen need not worry themselves; we have no hesitancy in meeting them before that tribunal. All we are anxious about, all that we insist upon in the hearing of that appeal, and that we are determined to have, is that the people shall have the opportunity honestly and fairly to be counted when judgment is rendered.

I hope the Senators will not hesitate to join with me to-day in making up that appeal to the people. Do not let us hesitate one moment. Let us make it up and go to the people and tell them that on one side are the republican party enlisting with them the Senator from Virginia so far as he is doing any portion of their work, and on the other is arrayed that same old Bourbon element which for twenty years has been fighting the Government itself and its majorities.

Sir, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 19, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

TESTS OF IRON.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The President of the Senate laid before the Senate yesterday a communication from the Secretary of War, inclosing a letter from the Chief of Ordnance, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 1st instant, a report of the officer in charge of the United States testing-machine, and it was ordered to lie on the table. I now move that the report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] providing for the election of certain officers of the Senate, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone the resolution indefinitely, on which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt as to the result.

Mr. HARRIS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this vote with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL.]

Mr. WALKER, (when Mr. GARLAND'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. GARLAND] is paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. GROVER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.] I make the announcement for the day.

Mr. HARRIS, (when his name was called.) I agreed to pair with the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] in the absence of that Senator. I do not see him in his seat, and I shall therefore decline to vote unless he makes his appearance before the roll-call is concluded.

Mr. MILLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired for this day with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.]

Mr. PLATT, of New York, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from California, [Mr. FARLEY.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. RANSOM, (when Mr. VANCE'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. VANCE] is paired with the Senator from California, [Mr. MILLER.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COKE. I announce for the day that my colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.]

Mr. BECK. I desire to announce that I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. CAMDEN, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I wish to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. SAWYER,] and I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. On this subject I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. ANTHONY. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.]

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to say that my colleague [Mr. ROLLINS] is paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. KELLOGG. I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] on this question.

Mr. JONAS. I am paired for a few moments with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. EDGERTON.]

Mr. INGALLS. My colleague [Mr. PLUMB] is paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST.]

Mr. ALLISON. I am paired this morning with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. KELLOGG. I understand that there is less than a quorum of Senators who have answered to their names. Having paired with the understanding that I could vote to make a quorum, I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Bayard,	Gorman,	McPherson,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Groome,	Morgan,	Slater,
Call,	Hampton,	Pendleton,	Walker.
Coke,	Jackson,	Pugh,
George,	Johnston,	Ransom,

NAYS—21.

Blair,	Harrison,	Logan,	Platt of Conn.,
Burnside,	Hawley,	McDill,	Sewell,
Conger,	Hill of Colorado,	McMillan,	Sherman.
Dawes,	Hoar,	Mabone,
Ferry,	Ingalls,	Mitchell,
Frye,	Kellogg,	Morrill,

ABSENT—37.

Allison,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jonas,	Sawyer,
Anthony,	Edgerton,	Jones of Florida,	Teller,
Beck,	Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Vance,
Butler,	Farley,	Lamar,	Van Wyck,
Camden,	Farley,	Maxey,	Vest,
Cameron of Pa.,	Garland,	Miller,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Wis.,	Grover,	Platt of N. Y.,	Williams.
Cockrell,	Hale,	Plumb,
Conkling,	Harris,	Rollins,
Davis of Illinois,	Hill of Georgia,	Saunders,

So the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

MICHAEL BOYTON.

Mr. McPHERSON. I have this morning another of those petitions referring to the case of Michael Boyton, the reception of which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] resisted so earnestly the other day. I presume he will have no objection to my offering this petition and having it referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DAWES. Not the slightest, Mr. President.

Mr. McPHERSON. The petition is from the Paterson Land League reciting the facts of the arrest and false imprisonment of Michael Boyton. I ask that it be received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will be received and so referred.

Mr. DAWES. I congratulate the Senator on having come here this morning refreshed from his recreation of last night and disposed to attend to the duties of the Senate.

Mr. McPHERSON. I do not hear the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. I have had sent to me from an association of Irish-American citizens of Indiana a petition similar to that just presented by the Senator from New Jersey. I ask leave to present it and move that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection the petition will be received and so referred.

PROPOSED EXTRA SESSION OF CONGRESS.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to offer a resolution, and I ask to have it read for information at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That in the judgment of the Senate the public interests require that Congress be convened in special session immediately.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the resolution go over, Mr. President.

Mr. BLAIR. I offer it merely to be read for information at this time. I wish in connection with it to ask for the reading of a document, and then to submit a few remarks to show the purpose which has actuated me in submitting the resolution. I should like to have the Clerk read the paper in full which I send to the Chair.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

CIRCULAR.

Worsted Stockings.

[1881. Department No. 32, Secretary's Office.] TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., March 29, 1881.

To collectors and other officers of the customs:

The following decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Victor et al. against C. A. Arthur, collector of the port of New York, is published for the information of customs officers and others concerned:

"The question in this case is whether stockings of worsted, or worsted and cotton, made on frames, and worn by men, women, and children, imported after the Revised Statutes went into effect, June 22, 1874, are dutiable as knit goods under Schedule L, class 3, sec. 2504, or as stockings under Schedule M. The two provisions under which the parties make their respective claims are as follows:

"Schedule L.—'Flannels, blankets, hats of wool, knit goods, balmorals, woolen and worsted yarns, and all manufactures of every description composed wholly or in part of worsted, the hair of the alpaca, goat, or other like animals, except such as are composed in part of wool, not otherwise provided for, valued at not exceeding forty cents per pound, twenty cents per pound; valued at above forty cents per pound and not exceeding sixty cents per pound, thirty cents per pound; valued at above sixty cents per pound and not exceeding eighty cents per pound, forty cents per pound; valued at above eighty cents per pound, fifty cents per pound; and, in addition thereto, upon all the above-named articles, 35 per cent. ad valorem.'

"Schedule M.—'Clothing, ready made, and wearing apparel of every description, of whatever material composed, except wool, silk, and linen, made up or manufactured wholly or in part by the tailor, seamstress, or manufacturer, not otherwise provided for, caps, gloves, leggins, mitts, socks, stockings, wove shirts and drawers, and all similar articles made on frames, of whatever material composed, except silk and linen, worn by men, women, or children, and not otherwise provided for, articles worn by men, women, or children, of whatever material composed, except silk and linen, made up or made wholly or in part by hand, not otherwise provided for, 35 per cent. ad valorem.'

"In U. S. vs. Bowen, 100 U. S., 513, we held that the Revised Statutes must be treated as a legislative declaration of what the statute law of the United States was on the 1st of December, 1873, and that when the meaning was plain the courts could not look to the original statutes to see if Congress had erred in the revision. That could only be done when it was necessary to construe doubtful language. We applied this rule in Arthur vs. Dodge, 101 U. S., 36, to the construction of the revision of the tariff laws.

"It is also well settled that when Congress has designated an article by its specific name and imposed a duty on it by such name, general terms in a later act or other parts of the same act, although sufficiently broad to comprehend such article, are not applicable to it. (Movius vs. Arthur, 95 U. S., 144; Arthur vs. Leary, 96 U. S., 112.)

"It is conceded that stockings made on frames have been dutiable eo nomine since 1842 and by four different statutes: 5 Stat., 549, chap. 270, sec. 1, subdivisions seven and nine; 9 Stat., 44, chap. 74, sec. 11, Sched. C; 12 Stat., 194, chap. 68, sec. 23; Id., 556, chap. 163, sec. 2. Now, when we find, as we do in Schedule M of section 2504 'stockings * * * made on frames, of whatever material composed, except silk and linen, worn by men, women, or children,' it seems to us clear beyond question that goods coming within that specific description are dutiable in the way thus provided, rather than as 'knit goods * * * composed wholly or in part of worsted.' It may be true, as suggested, that if there had been no revision and we had been required to construe the statutes as they stood before December 1, 1873, a different conclusion might have been reached. We have not deemed it necessary to institute such an inquiry, for it would be contrary to all the rules of construction to say that where in one part of a section of a statute it was provided that 'stockings made on frames, of whatever material composed, except silk or linen,' should pay duties at a certain rate, it was not plain such articles were not in any just sense 'otherwise provided for' in a preceding clause of the same section fixing the duties to be paid on 'knit goods composed wholly or in part of worsted.' The judgment below was before United States vs. Bowen, supra, was decided here.

"The judgment is reversed and a venire de novo awarded."

Under the ruling of the Supreme Court in this case, caps, gloves, leggings, mitts, socks, stockings, wove shirts and drawers, and all similar articles made on frames, of whatever material composed, except silk and linen, will be classified for duty at the rate of 35 per cent. ad valorem as against the provision in Schedule L for flannels, blankets, hats of wool, knit goods, balmorals, woolen and worsted yarns, and all manufactures of every description composed wholly or in part of worsted, or any other provision of law. Where duties have been exacted on the class of goods referred to, in excess of the rate of 35 per cent. ad valorem, and the provisions of section 2931 have been complied with, certified statements will be forwarded for refund of the excess of duty so exacted.

Where suits have been instituted for the recovery of the excess, you will require a certificate of their discontinuance and include in the certified statement the proper interest and accrued costs.

These instructions will be treated as applying only to cases in which the duties were exacted under the provisions of the Revised Statutes, and not to cases in which duties were assessed under the laws in force prior to the passage of said statutes.

Very respectfully,

H. F. FRENCH,
Assistant Secretary.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, in this connection I wish to read to the Senate a letter received by me yesterday from one of the largest firms engaged in hosiery manufacture in the country, who reside in the town of Laconia in my State.

Mr. McPHERSON. May I ask the Senator the object of all this reading of letters and communications? Is it to show a reason why we should have a special session of Congress?

Mr. BLAIR. It is.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator from New Hampshire has now become aware of the fact that the tariff needs revision?

Mr. BLAIR. Yes.

Mr. McPHERSON. In the monopoly features of it, I suppose?

Mr. BLAIR. Yes, wherever they exist. Does the Senator desire any more information?

Mr. HARRIS. I would suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire, inasmuch as his resolution has gone over under objection, and I suppose it will be perfectly competent for him to call it up to-morrow if he desires to do so under the rule, that any debate on the resolution had perhaps better be postponed.

Mr. BLAIR. I will say to the Senator that I explicitly stated that I offered the resolution to be now read for information, and designed after making an explanation of my reasons for offering it, to then have it go over under the rules. I hardly think the Senator will deem it necessary to exclude me from the privilege of saying a very few words explanatory of the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. By no means would I if I had the power. I was simply suggesting to the Senator that his resolution had gone over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution having gone over the Senator can only proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRIS. The question before the Senate is debatable, and the Senator has a perfect right to discuss the question in any form he pleases. It does not require unanimous consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee withholds his objection and the resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. I was simply saying that I have a communication from one of the largest firms engaged in hosiery manufacture in this country, and perhaps the leading firm in my own State. It is perhaps not essential to say—although there is no impropriety in stating—that they are leading democrats of the State of New Hampshire, most excellent citizens of course. In a matter of this sort no man should know the politics of a constituent, and I present their case precisely as I would that of anybody else. I suggest this matter, however, in order that if possible what I have to say may receive slightly more definite attention from Senators on the other side. The letter is as follows:

LACONIA, NEW HAMPSHIRE, April 16, 1881.

DEAR SIR: We desire to call your attention to a recent decision of the United States Supreme Court by which the duty on hosiery has been changed so that it now stands at 35 per cent. ad valorem. This change means ruin to our hosiery industry in this country, inasmuch as it reduces the duty from fifty cents per pound weight and 35 per cent. ad valorem to a simple ad valorem duty of 35 per cent. An examination of the annual reports of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics shows that the average duty on fine wools, or class 1 under Schedule L, equals 70 per cent. This decision makes the duty on all knit goods made of wool by machinery 35 per cent. ad valorem. Supposing all goods were honestly invoiced at a full foreign valuation, and leaving out of the question the difference in cost of labor and interest on capital, there is a premium of 35 per cent. in favor of the foreign manufacturer on all the wool of which such goods may be made. To state a special case it would be as follows: Cost to an importer of a stocking weighing two pounds, value $3 per dozen, under Schedule L of tariff before decision was made, $5.05 per dozen; cost of same stocking under the decision just made $4.05. In other words, the decision has reduced the tariff on stockings $1 per dozen; on shirts and drawers the reduction amounts to $4 to $8 a dozen according to the weight of the goods. Such a reduction is ruinous to Laconia, Meredith, Belmont, Tilton, Franklin, Lake Village, and hurts Manchester severely. It strikes many other towns in our State very hard. It strikes in Massachusetts, Ipswich, Needham, Waltham, Ware, Graniteville, and many other places. It strikes in Connecticut very large manufacturing interests, and in New York and Pennsylvania the interests are enormous. We simply give you a rough idea, but you can get a pretty clear insight into the importance of the industry threatened by the statement, that can be verified we think without much labor, of the number of sets of cards employed on hosiery. The aggregate of all kinds of woolen cards at work in this country is now between eight thousand and nine thousand sets; of these the hosiery industry is thought to employ 1,700. The Census Bureau can easily set right any errors in our estimate, but we give you the estimate of good judges.

As the matter now stands we have got to go to Canada in order to manufacture. Wool that costs us ninety-five cents here we can get there and work there at a cost of forty-five cents and can afford to pay the duty of 35 per cent. on goods so made and sell at what the goods cost us here, and in so doing make a better profit than we are now getting. New Hampshire maintains by her hosiery industry many thousands of her people; many of these came from Canada and would very gladly go back if mills should be established there, as they certainly will be if this decision were to stand. It is unnecessary for us to say much to you about the importance of the matter, as you are where you can get information so easily, but there is no doubt that some fifty million dollars is now employed in hosiery in the mills, stock, and capital used.

We see no remedy that can be applied save an extra session of Congress to set the matter right, and certainly every hour that passes without a remedy is working great mischief to our trade all through the country and will paralyze it completely within twelve months. No man will dare to operate in face of this decision beyond his immediate orders, and hence the future is all uncertain to us. We must have relief, and that speedily, or much suffering will surely result. If not a presumption on our part, we ask you to confer with the Senators from New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Illinois, Ohio, Maine, Vermont, and New Jersey, which are directly and heavily interested in this matter. If we go a step beyond our industry to the raising of wool you need add to our list above California, Oregon, Texas, Virginia, West Virginia, Wisconsin, Indiana, Nevada, Louisiana, in short every wool-growing State. As cotton enters largely into some grades of our goods we need only to refer to this to show that every Southern State is interested in the decision by its depressing effect upon the price of cotton. Wherever we have used the term "hosiery" it would have been more correct to say knit goods, as that is the idea we have in mind, and without changing that in our letter we desire to have it so understood.

Before closing we desire to say that the knit-goods industry in New Hampshire has nearly doubled in the last ten years, and if value of product is taken as a basis it has more than doubled.

If there be any method of action that you can suggest to us we shall be glad to avail ourselves of it. There is a great commotion among the manufacturers, who are as yet not concerted in their action, but are preparing to unite and present the matter with whatever power they are able to command. We see it intimated that the circular instructions may be suspended to await action of Congress. Of course, this may help us out until then. We trust you will favor us by giving it your attention, and much oblige,

Yours, truly,

J. W. BUSIEL & CO.

Senator H. W. BLAIR.

Mr. President, I present this aspect of the public interests in connection with the resolution which I offer, which is designed, if adopted, as an expression of the sentiments of the Senate in favor of the calling of a session of Congress immediately, or so soon as reasonable notice can be given and the other House can be assembled. I have been one of those who originally thought that at this juncture of our public affairs a session of Congress was appropriate and was greatly needed by the interests of the country. I am not one of those who believe that any legitimate public industry is likely to be essentially disturbed in its operation by the fact that Congress is in session; and I am particularly sure in my own mind that the commercial and industrial interests of this country will not feel specially alarmed, or alarmed at all, if there should be a session of Congress called to consider great public measures which are essential to the permanent prosperity of the country, especially when Congress is controlled, as it would be, by republican majorities in each House, and with a republican Executive.

Upon general principles I believed, and I believe now, entirely irrespective of the peculiar circumstances in which the Senate finds itself to-day or the special injury which is being done by this recent decision of the court, construing the tariff entirely different from what it has been understood and construed for years with reference to the special industry of hosiery or the knit-goods manufacture of the country—I say upon general principles I have thought we ought to have a special session of Congress at the present time. We know that the business affairs of the country are growing larger every year, and that during the exciting political convulsions of the recent past the industrial interests of the country have been very largely neglected, so far as legislation is concerned. We have a war tariff; and in various other directions besides the all-important matter of the tariff I think there is call for legislation. We cannot do to-day the business of the country in three months, or six months, or in the ordinary periods of time given to legislation as it might have been transacted twenty, thirty, fifty, or seventy-five years ago, when there was comparatively little to do; and continuous sessions of Congress—so continuous at least as to absorb all the working energy that is in the human constitution, taking only such relief as ordinary regard for health and rest should require of us in ordinary vacations—would be no more than adequate to the just consideration of the material and other interests of the country at the present time.

But, sir, disregarding all that, setting aside general legislation upon the tariff, let me call the attention of my honorable friend, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, [Mr. BURNSIDE,] to the fact that De Lesseps is digging his canal to-day. While for two years we have been talking about the little matter of the severing of the Isthmus by a foreign corporation, under the influence of foreign governments, it is being done practically by foreign capital, so that this great commercial change in the world's affairs is going on while we are talking about it, is becoming a perfected thing, is becoming a vested right, and we have no way out of the matter unless immediate action is taken by Congress, unless it be by war.

But setting aside all these matters, (which I think amply justify us and more than justify us in the expression of sentiment contained in the resolution,) there are other considerations which make it almost imperative for the public good that we should have an extra session of Congress, and that as soon as the two Houses can be called together.

In the first place, here we are ourselves; we are booked till December. Senators upon the other side have taken their position, and they would be cowardly to retreat. We have taken ours, and we are not to retreat unless we fall within the same category. Neither side is likely to do it. The other side have taken the position that they will not yield their opposition to the pending measure until there is a legislative session. A legislative session called soon would meet the requirement upon the democratic side of the Chamber, and we should get immediate action on the resolution. If it does not meet that requirement they must take a new position. I think it would be within the scope of the objections as I have heard them come from the other side, as a general thing.

I wish to say right here that this resolution is offered without the knowledge of and without concert of action with any Senator upon this floor, or any human being elsewhere. Nobody is responsible for it except myself; but I propose to express my sentiments as they are, and nobody is responsible for them but myself.

I say here we are in this dead-lock. It is growing deader and deader every day. Everybody sees that. The Senate is to stay here until next December. The Executive is anxious for the confirmation of nominations sent to us, and we are anxious for such confirmations, ready and anxious that something should be done, but we cannot do it. We are not likely to do it until this other matter is disposed of. We shall stay here until December probably without the confirmation of a single nomination which is sent here. It may be that here and there some single nomination of special importance may be acted upon, but unless the republican party goes directly back upon its own resolution here in the Senate, we shall stay until December. Senators upon the other side will do the same thing.

Here you have one House of Congress staying in session until December through the heat of the summer and the fall, probably at the expense of the lives of some of us, and perhaps many of us would prefer to yield our lives rather than the point of honor involved in this contest. We are to remain here until then. Where is the other House of Congress? Very many of the members are here in the city to-day; all of them are within the reach of a ready summons. Why should they not assemble? When the public interests require action upon matters outside of the organization of the Senate why should they not come here and let us all spend, it may be, a month in a legislative session, giving attention to these matters of pressing public concern, and all of us go home liberated from this dead-lock and coming back refreshed for the regular business of the December session?

Mr. President, let us look at the matter of confirmations. The republicans have taken the ground that they will act upon no business until the pending measure is decided. That is the position they have taken. You tell us that we should recede from that position because the executive business before the Senate is of vast importance and the country is suffering. We think the assertion of the principle that the majority shall rule is of greater consequence than anything else that can come before us, and we are likely to continue to act upon that line. What are the pressing cases that we have brought to our attention? There is a justice of the Supreme Court to be confirmed. It has now arrived at that period in the term when the court is just verging upon the commencement of its vacation, during which no justice can be of the slightest use whatever there. I believe the court's quorum has been broken once by reason of the illness of a member of the family of one of the justices. They have kept on; they have done their work; they have got substantially through it, and no man can be placed upon the bench in season to do any good there until next winter certainly. Under those circumstances the pressure of business for confirmation in the direction of the Supreme Court is not very severe upon us. We are not likely to recede so far as that is concerned, but supposing that we should recede so far as the confirmation of the nomination of a man as a member of the court is concerned, that would give no practical remedy.

I could call the attention of Senators, if there are any who have not read it, to an article in the last number of the North American Review by Mr. Justice Strong, late of the Supreme Court. It is very evident from the perusal of that article that the appointment of another justice would afford no substantial relief, scarcely any relief at all. The business of the court has become so vast that an ordinary case cannot be reached in less than from two and a half to three years. The court is fairly swamped with the pressure of business, and double the number of justices who are there could do no more than transact the business of the country at the present day. He recommends the establishment of an intermediate court of appeals to take final jurisdiction of a very large number of cases which now go to the Supreme Court. Therein, with reference to the administration of justice throughout the country, is an evil of enormous magnitude in regard to which the confirmation of a single justice is no remedy whatever. It is a question of legislation to be profoundly considered, to be matured with great care, general legislation, which of itself would justify the calling of an extra session of Congress, especially under the existing circumstances, as I believe. Nothing else, certainly, will afford a practical remedy in the direction of the administration of public justice. Unless something is done at a special session in this direction it is not at all likely that any measure will be matured that will give us a court of appeals or the appointment of additional judges for nearly two years, toward the termination of the present Congress; but if an extra session could be called we could take up that question at the extra session, when there would not be that general pressure and that mass of minute legislation coming in upon us which so crowds us at the regular sessions of Congress.

If we could have an extra session devoted primarily to the consideration of such questions as I have indicated, the relief of the Supreme Court, the matter which is so important in the mind of the honorable Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURNSIDE,] and the appointment of a commission and a discussion such as ought to take place upon the subject of the tariff, we might in that way accomplish something for the relief of the country in the direction of the administration of public justice, with reference to our foreign affairs, with reference to these other great interests which are likely to be long neglected if they are postponed until the regular session in December.

I know it may be said in reply, on the subject-matter specifically suggested in the circular of the Treasury and the letter which I have read, that the Treasury can suspend the operation of the decision of the Supreme Court, and that there is a proposition of that kind to suspend it. Some Senator suggests that the Secretary is likely to do it. Mr. President, I am opposed to that sort of executive discretion, the exercise of any discretion not clearly within the law. I am for obeying the laws as they exist. I grant that a most creditable operation has been initiated by the Secretary of the Treasury, likely to be very successful, and I am very grateful that it is so. At the same time the exercise of that discretion favorable to the country by the Secretary of the Treasury as in this instance might some time be used as a precedent for the exercise of a dangerous discretion.

Mr. PLATT, of Connecticut. If the Senator will allow me, I do not think that the Secretary of the Treasury has any idea of suspending the decision of the Supreme Court. As I understand it, it is very clear that the decision of the Supreme Court does not extend to knit shirts and drawers, and I have every reason to hope that the Secretary of the Treasury will so construe the decision of the Supreme Court, but not in any way to suspend it, for I suppose that is beyond his power as well as beyond his desire.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator says he has his hopes. In a matter of this kind nothing should be left to hopes and to aspirations and to favorable construction. The decision of the Supreme Court applies specifically to knit stockings, but the entire hosiery interest in the United States is included in the principle of that decision. A hostile circular has been prepared and put about through the country by the Treasury already which has created this alarm. The Treasury is called upon to recede from its position, to give a construction which shall not ruin this industry in the course of the next five or six months; and to disturb an important industry of that kind, to raise a doubt in regard to its future, is a much more serious thing than the pecuniary value of that industry alone. Its interdependence upon and with other industries and their connection with it are so extensive, so vast in their ramifications, that when this decision as to the true meaning of the law has struck ruin upon that one industry, nobody knows where the calamity will end.

But we are here doing nothing except wasting time; nobody will pretend that we are doing aught else. The democracy wrongfully prevent action. One branch of the Legislature of the country is here, and is to stay here. Let us call an extra session of Congress; let us consider this and other questions; let us break this dead-lock in the way in which the democracy generally state that they will consent to its being broken and in the way in which they must ultimately consent to its being broken. They cannot stand here and do not undertake to stand here in the face of the country impeding important legislation. With the other branch of Congress at the other end of the Capitol and with great public considerations at stake they will not stand here quarreling with us over the control of the Secretary of the Senate and the Sergeant-at-Arms of this body.

Of course, on both sides we understand that underlying this controversy are very important considerations, principles, if you please, which neither side is disposed to yield, and it puts on the form of a controversy in regard to these little offices. I do not speak of them in any belittling sense. The controversy itself and that which is involved in it, I consider of vast importance; but it must terminate some time; the discussion has extended sufficiently long; everybody understands it; everybody is ready to vote, and it is the result which one side fears and which the other desires; but the vote must come some time and it may as well come now, if the contingency has arrived, or may, by proper action, be brought about when the other side proposes to have it ended.

Mr. President, when I call this resolution up again I may take the opportunity to urge some other and additional considerations; but without saying more at present, I content myself with stating my judgment that public duty requires an extra session of Congress that this dead-lock may be broken, and that these great material interests may receive due consideration and protection.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. DAWES on the 23d of March, 1881, providing for the election of certain officers of the Senate, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. PENDLETON to postpone the resolution indefinitely.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, heretofore I have taken but slight notice of slanders touching my action in any case. But, sir, since the year 1866 my enemies have so persistently pursued me with falsehoods touching my action in 1861 that I now feel it to be my duty to place on record the facts, that those who come after me may know the truth as it was and is. I am induced to do this at this time from the fact that I find published in the Norristown Register, (of Pennsylvania,) of April 7, 1881, a rehash of the old slander that I was a secessionist and induced men to enter the rebel army in 1861. This publication seems to have been superinduced by a speech made in the Senate Chamber a few days since by Senator HILL, of Georgia. These slanders seem to run through the democratic papers all over the country every time that any democrat reckless of his statements makes allusions to me in this connection.

Now, sir, in short I will give the history of this matter. I was elected to Congress in 1858 as an anti-Lecompton democrat, not as a "Bourbon," as my friend HILL, of Georgia, would have it understood in his remarks a few days since. In 1860 I was elected as a Douglas democrat, as distinguishable from the "Bourbon" or Breckenridge democracy of that day.

During the early part of the year 1861, when secession was rampant in this city and in the Halls of Congress, and while I had an opportunity of showing where my sympathies were, whether with the Union or not, which I did on the proposition as hereinafter stated, to wit, on the 7th day of January, 1861, Mr. Adrian, of New Jersey, proposed the following resolution in the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That we fully approve of the bold and patriotic act of Major Anderson in withdrawing from Fort Moultrie to Fort Sumter, and of the determination of the President to maintain that fearless officer in his present position; and that we will support the President in all constitutional measures to enforce the laws and preserve the Union.

On that resolution being submitted a motion was made to suspend the rules that the resolution might be taken up. On that vote to suspend the rules the yeas were 124, and the nays 53. The names I will read. On the motion to suspend the rules I voted in the affirmative. The southern members of Congress unanimously voted against it with three northern democrats, to wit, the Senator on my left from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] Representative Vallandigham, of Ohio, and Representative Niblack, of Indiana. This was the vote:

On that vote the rules were suspended, and the resolution was taken up; and on the motion to adopt that resolution it was adopted by a vote of 124 yeas to 56 nays. I voted in the affirmative, and Mr. Vallandigham, of Ohio, voted in the negative, the other gentleman whom I mentioned before not voting. Pending that vote I made the following remarks:

As the resolution receives my unqualified approbation, I vote "ay."

That was on January 7, 1861, the first resolution that was introduced in the House of Representatives in reference to the enforcement of the laws against secession, as I recollect it. That was of course while I was a democrat, before the inauguration of Mr. Lincoln, before a solitary gun had been fired to announce the determination of rebellion against this Government.

It would seem that at that time I stood in no equivocal position as to the rebellion or as to its suppression by force if need be. But further, on the 5th day of February, 1861, prior to the inauguration of Mr. Lincoln, I made a speech in the House of Representatives in favor of the compromise measures reported to the House and known as the Crittenden compromise. Every one here is conversant with that. In that speech I used the language, which will be found on page 179 of the Congressional Globe, second session Thirty-sixth Congress, in reference to secession which I will read. This speech was made from a democratic stand-point, and I defy any man to find one word in it that shows any sympathy with secession or rebellion. In reference to secession I made the following remarks:

Sir, I have always and do yet deny the right of secession. There is no warrant for it in the Constitution. It is wrong, it is unlawful, unconstitutional, and should be called by the right name—revolution. No good, sir, can result from it, but much mischief may. It is no remedy for any grievance. I hold that all grievances can be much easier redressed inside the Union than out of it.

Sir, what else? In reference to my early teachings, in the same speech I used the following language:

I have been taught to believe that the preservation of this glorious Union, with its broad flag waving over us as the shield for our protection on land and on sea, is paramount to all the parties and platforms that ever have existed or ever can exist. I would to-day, if I had the power, sink my own party and every other one with all their platforms into the vortex of ruin, without heaving a sigh or shedding a tear, to save the Union or even stop the revolution where it is.

Now, sir, I ask these gentlemen who are constantly referring to my speeches and record to read the speeches that I made when I was a democrat and see if they find any consolation in them in reference to their own views then or now. Sir, I was always a Union man, and the man who says to the contrary falsifies the record of the country.

I desire now to call the attention of my slanderers to a statement made voluntarily. In discussion here a few days ago the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] made some allusion to these attacks that have been made on me and remarked that my speeches had been quoted in the South. Sir, if they quoted this speech in the South which I have just read, made in 1861 when I was yet a democrat, I do not think if they had followed out the doctrines in it there would have been any rebellion or secession. There are three Senators not all at present in the Senate Chamber but now occupying seats in the Senate on the democratic side who were then members of Congress with myself, and several on this side of the Chamber. Hearing this insinuation made and my reply to it, two Senators, democrats who took part in secession, voluntarily sent me the following letter. One of the signers of this letter, both Representatives at that time, was a gentleman with whom I was personally very friendly and intimate, and to them I say now publicly that I tender my thanks for their voluntary statement:

UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER,
Washington, April 14, 1881.

DEAR SIR: In a discussion in the Senate a few weeks since you referred to the fact that a southern Senator, who had served with you in Congress before the war, could testify that during your term of service there you gave no encouragement to the secession of the Southern States, adding, however, that you did not ask such testimony. I was not sure at the time that your reference was to me, as Senator PUGH, of Alabama, was also a member of that Congress.

Since then, having learned that your reference was to me, I proposed on the floor of the Senate, should suitable occasion offer, to state what I knew of your position and views at the time referred to. But as I may be absent from the Senate for some time I deem it best to give you this written statement with full authority to use it in any way that seems proper to you.

When you first came to Congress in —— you were a very ardent and impetuous democrat. In the division which took place between Mr. Douglas and his friends on the one hand and the southern democrats on the other you were a warm and uncompromising supporter of Mr. Douglas; and in the course of that contention you became somewhat estranged from your party associates in the South. In our frequent discussions upon the subjects of difference, I never heard a word of sympathy from your lips with secession either in theory or practice. On the contrary, you were vehement in your opposition to it. I remember well a conversation I had with you just before leaving Washington to become a candidate for the secession convention. You expressed the deep regret you felt at my proposed action, and deplored the contemplated movement in terms as strong as any I heard from any republican.

Yours, truly,

L. Q. C. LAMAR.

Hon. JOHN A. LOGAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SENATE CHAMBER, April 14, 1881.

Having read the above statement of Senator LAMAR I fully concur with him in my recollection of your expressions and action in opposition to secession.

Truly, yours,

J. L. PUGH.

I appreciate this because it comes from democrats, with one of whom I had very intimate social relations at that time.

Sir, if these facts were all they might not be sufficient in the minds of some of my enemies to condemn those who have sought to injure my reputation; but there are more. In July, 1861, with a musket in hand, I entered the field of conflict at Bull Run. Shortly afterward I returned home, raised a regiment, and entered the Government service, resigning my seat in Congress. That is a thing I believe people do not generally do, resign seats in Congress, but I did it. I was in as many battles as any man during the war; at the battle of Fort Donelson was promoted to brigadier-general, in a very short period afterward to major-general. I commanded during the war a regiment, a brigade, a division, a corps, and finally Grant's old "Army of the Tennessee," and commanded it during the battle of Atlanta on the death of General McPherson. I mustered it out in 1865, at Louisville, Kentucky, including in its organization the Fourteenth, Fifteenth, Sixteenth, and Seventeenth Corps. Why I was promoted to these different commands I will let those who promoted me speak, and not myself.

When my army was mustered out, the war being ended, I resigned my commission, preferring not to receive pay from the Government when there was no further duty for me to perform.

Sir, I bear on my person more than one honorable scar of severe wounds received in battle. These are some of my certificates of loyalty given me by the enemies of my country.

Mr. President, it may not be uninteresting for me to give a statement as to how this false and malicious slander started against me.

At the breaking out of the rebellion I resided in Marion, Williamson County, Illinois, adjoining Jackson County, where I was born and raised. The people of that county were intensely democratic; a majority of them were from the South. On the 15th day of April, 1861, a few democrats got together in the town of Marion and passed resolutions in favor of secession and proposed to divide Illinois, resolving that they would join the South, &c.; also, during the ensuing month of May, 1861, Thorndike Brooks, a Marylander, then living at Marion, organized some young men into a company and left for the South; they made their way across the Ohio River and joined the confederate forces at Union City, as I have since been informed. About this time fifteen persons, more or less, left Jefferson County, some fifty miles north of Marion, for the South. Of these resolutions or of the men leaving either county, I had no knowledge; I was not in either of the counties on either of the occasions.

I raised my regiment during the summer of the same year partly in Williamson County, and partly in Jackson and other southern counties. At this time no one thought of my having any knowledge or connection with either of these acts mentioned. But after the war was over I was nominated in 1866 by the republicans for Congress, without any solicitation on my part. It was then in order for the opposition press to commence all kinds of attacks upon me. They charged that I being a resident of Marion had inspired the resolutions of April, 15, 1861, also that I had aided and encouraged the men who left with Thorndike Brooks for the confederate army. In order to aid this statement they procured the statement of a man by the name of Davis, who had been in the rebel army, to the effect that I had given him encouragement to go South inasmuch as, he said, "Hybert Cunningham," my brother-in-law, "told him that I would join them."

I will speak first as to the statement that I encouraged the secession resolutions. Mr. Manier, who had been the chairman of the meeting that passed the resolutions referred to, having changed his place of residence to Jefferson City, Missouri, seeing these charges wrote me the following letter unsolicited:

JEFFERSON CITY, MISSOURI, October 25, 1866.

DEAR SIR: My attention having been called to a publication in the Cairo Democrat, to the effect that you were present and participated in a meeting at Marion, Williamson County, Illinois, on the 15th day of April, 1861, in which resolutions were passed in favor of Southern Illinois seceding, in certain contingencies, and going with the southern confederacy, I take pleasure in doing you the justice of saying that you were not present at said meeting; that you had not been in Marion for some time previous; that, so far as my knowledge extends, you had no knowledge of such meeting being held, and, having acted as chairman of the meeting, I think I should have known it had you any connection with the meeting whatever. And I may also add that the use of my name by the Cairo Democrat was without my knowledge or consent. I have always known you to be truly loyal to the United States and a true soldier.

You are at liberty to make use of the above statements as may be necessary to counteract the statements of the Cairo Democrat.

Yours, respectfully,

J. D. MANIER.

General JOHN A. LOGAN.

Mr. J. D. Manier was a citizen of Marion, Williamson County, at the time these resolutions were passed, a leading democrat and a very prominent man. He made this statement as I have said voluntarily without any request on my part.

The Cairo Democrat, a vile rebel sheet, referred also to Daniel R. Pulley (who had been sheriff of Williamson County, a very prominent man) to sustain the assertion about the resolutions. I here give a letter of Mr. Pulley refuting the statement. This letter was written unsolicited and published at the time of which it bears date.

CARBONDALE, ILLINOIS, October 22, 1866.

I have never authorized the Cairo Democrat or any person to refer to me regarding the charges made against General LOGAN in that paper. At the time of their first publication I was in the State of Arkansas. The charges are to the best of my knowledge false. I also further state that General LOGAN was not at the meeting in Marion on April 15, 1861, at which anti-war resolutions were passed. Although differing with General Logan in politics, I believe him to have always been a loyal man, and am not willing that my name should be used to defame a neighbor and an honorable soldier.

D. R. PULLEY.

I will say here, by way of parenthesis, that my friends may think strange that I take pains to refute these charges, but they will see why before I am through.

Mr. President, let me also call your attention to the statement of eight persons who ought to know all the facts, and who certainly did know. These are all men of good reputation, and were citizens of Marion, Williamson County, at that time:

MARION, WILLIAMSON COUNTY, ILLINOIS, October 17, 1866.

We, the undersigned, are politically opposed to Mr. LOGAN. Part of us have been in the southern army, in Captain Thorndike Brooks's company, and have returned since the rebellion. Being acquainted with all the facts in the case, we make the following statement: Having noticed in the newspapers, particularly in the Cairo Democrat, an article charging General LOGAN with having participated in a meeting held in Marion in April, 1861, for the purpose of taking into consideration the expediency of attaching Southern Illinois to the southern confederacy in the event of said confederacy being formed, and also charging General LOGAN with having indorsed the resolutions of that meeting, and, further, that General LOGAN furnished means and encouragement to persons to leave Illinois and join the southern confederacy, &c., we hereby pronounce all of said charges untrue, General LOGAN not being in Marion at that time, nor having any knowledge of persons leaving here (Marion) at the time for the southern army, all statements to the contrary notwithstanding.

J. M. CUNNINGHAM.
W. R. TINKER.
R. J. PULLEY.
G. C. CAMPBELL.
JOSHUA LOWE.
GEO. W. LOWE.
B. F. LOWE.

Three of the persons whose names are signed here were a portion of the men who went South that are mentioned in these charges against me. I have also the statement of a man by the name of William Cook, a highly respectable merchant who then resided in Marion, Williamson County:

I, William Cook, live in Marion, Williamson County, Illinois; lived here at the outbreak of the rebellion, and hereby state that I am politically opposed to General LOGAN, but that he never at any time to my knowledge furnished means or encouragement to persons leaving here for the rebel army.

WILLIAM COOK.

These gentlemen were all democrats, who voluntarily made these statements and sent these letters to me.

Mr. President, I desire now to call attention to this man Davis, whose statement they procured, who stated that I encouraged him to go South. Of this man I can only say that I do not remember to have ever seen him before the war. His whole statement, so far as it relates to me, is a lie. Of his character I can only say that at the time he was hired, as I understood he was, to make this statement, the editor of the Shawneetown Mercury, Mr. Lusk, a reputable gentleman, who still resides in Illinois, who seems to have known him, spoke of him as follows:

We have had an opportunity of learning the character of this man Davis. To begin with, he is one of the most worthless of our race, and generally makes his odd change selling liquor to negroes and fiddling at their balls at $5 per night. He is from the rebel army, and is ready to swear or do the bidding of their sympathizers.

In order, however, to further show the baseness of these charges, I here append the letters of Captain Cunningham (or Hybert Cunningham) and others who are referred to in these statements.

Captain Cunningham, after the war, settled in the State of Mississippi; seeing these charges, he wrote me the following letter, which speaks for itself:

SCOOBA, MISSISSIPPI, October 15, 1866.

DEAR SIR: I have just seen an article accusing you of assisting me in recruiting men for the southern army, furnishing means, &c. Allow me here to state that such is an infamous lie. You neither furnished means or word of encouragement, but simply said to R. R. Kelly to not be hasty about going South, (April, 1861,) to weigh the matter well, &c. You never knew that I had any intention of going South, nor did I write until about one hour before I did go, and then went as a recruit in Captain Thorndike Brooks's company, and never recruited a single man for the southern army. I write this statement because it is just. Should have written sooner, but never saw the article until now.

Yours, as ever,

HYBERT B. CUNNINGHAM.

JOHN A. LOGAN.

The person referred to was one Robert R. Kelly, who was then stopping at J. M. Cunningham's, my father-in-law. This man Kelly was then recently from Missouri and was very violent in his denunciations of the North, and spoke of going South to enter the rebel army. I spoke to him probably on more than one occasion, as mentioned by Captain Cunningham, in order to dissuade him from a rash act.

In this connection also I read the letter of Abraham H. Morgan, a very worthy young man who was an intimate friend of Captain Cunningham, both being young, not over eighteen years at the time they entered the rebel army:

CARBONDALE, October 16, 1866.

I, A. H. Morgan, of Carbondale, Illinois, do hereby certify that I differ with General LOGAN in politics; that I was in the southern army under Captain Thorndike Brooks, of Illinois, in General Cheatham's command. Left Illinois with H. B. Cunningham (General LOGAN's brother-in-law)—

He is the Captain Cunningham I have referred to—with other young men of this and Williamson Counties, Illinois, who composed Brooks's company; and further, that I testify to the truth of Mr. Cunningham's statement; and further, that General LOGAN never furnished means nor encouragement to any of us, neither was he in Marion at the time we started from that place. This statement I make without General LOGAN's knowledge; do so in justice to him, and to refute the slanderous charge made against him.

A. H. MORGAN.

Then afterward it was also charged in 1866, during the canvass, that Captain Cain, of Saline County, with his company, refused to join my regiment (the Thirty-first Illinois Volunteers) because they had no confidence in my loyalty to the Government. I here append the statement of Captain Cain, made at that time, in answer to the Cairo Democrat, where these vile slanders and persecutions against me originated, it being a vile rebel sheet, which pursued me with fiendishness that was then unparalleled:

BANKSTON, SALINE COUNTY, ILLINOIS, October 29, 1866.

Editor Era:

I have just seen an article, published in the Cairo Democrat, charging General JOHN A. LOGAN with disloyalty, in which my name was used to prove that my company (being one of the Thirty-first Illinois) had refused to go into the regiment because the men feared that General LOGAN was raising a regiment for the southern army. My name was used without my knowledge or permission, and I would state the charge made is false and untrue, and hope that you will give place to this in your paper that the honest people of the district may know how the above paper gets its evidence against the loyal men of the country.

Yours, truly,

J. Y. CAIN.

This man, Captain J. Y. Cain, did join my regiment, and was very seriously wounded at the battle of Fort Donelson, on account of which wound he had to leave the service. He was then and ever has been one of my devoted friends.

But, sir, it did not stop there. In 1868 I was again nominated for Congress by the republican party. Some unscrupulous persons went into the poor-house at Cairo, Illinois, and procured a statement from an old wretched panper by the name of Wheatley, by paying him money as I was informed and which was afterward admitted by Wheatley himself, and this is the statement now published in this Pennsylvania paper. The statement was to the effect that I had recruited men in Williamson County for the rebel army and marched them to the Ohio River, naming Captain Cunningham, Lowe, and others as of the number, whose statements I have already read. He also stated that at the battle of Belmont he and Cunningham chased me and captured my horse.

This is the statement upon which all this stuff has gone to the country. In answer to this infamous statement I say that I never saw this man Wheatley—never up to this hour in my life; never heard of him in any way whatever except through this lying, slanderous statement that he made. Nor did I in any manner whatever have any knowledge, directly or indirectly, of the raising or recruiting of the company mentioned by him, or any other company, part of company, or person for the Thirteenth Tennessee Regiment, or any other regiment or part of regiment for the confederate army. His whole affidavit and statement, in every part, word, and sentence, so far as it relates to me, is a base lie.

He says he and Captain Cunningham chased me at Belmont and captured my horse. There are many soldiers yet living that were at the battle of Belmont and know this statement to be false. Among them General Grant, General McClernand, and in fact the whole command. I was never chased by rebels at Belmont or anywhere else, and you will never find a rebel who will say, if he is an honest man, that he ever chased me anywhere.

As I said, I was never chased by rebels at Belmont or elsewhere, never had a horse captured there or elsewhere.

That ended these slanders at that time; but in 1875 it became necessary, I presume, before my canvass in 1876, to revamp these statements and put them afloat again. In a discussion here in the Senate an intimation was made of this kind by a Senator who is not now present, and in fact not now a member of this body. The New York World then took this old false statement of Wheatley and published it. I had taken no pains to trouble myself about the matter. I have not read a letter here that I have ever asked for, and they are all from democrats, many of them leading democrats, too, that know all about the facts. Seeing this statement in the New York World I wrote a letter to the New York World and at the same time I wrote a letter to Thorndike Brooks, who, when the confederate army surrendered, was lieutenant-colonel of one of the Tennessee regiments, the same man who raised these troops in Williamson County, Illinois. He then resided in Baltimore and was a merchant there. I had not seen him from the time I met him in Marion long before he went into the confederate service. I knew him there. He lived there at the time; but from that day I have not seen the man. I wrote him a note asking him the facts in reference to this man Wheatley. I did not know anything about Wheatley. I addressed the following letter to the New York World:

To the Editor of the World:

SIR: In your issue of the 16th instant was published a statement based upon a pretended affidavit of one John Wheatley, stating in substance that I "had" recruited a number of men in Williamson County, Illinois, at the beginning of the late war, for the southern confederacy; that I marched to the Ohio River and then deserted them, &c. I have no knowledge whatever of Mr. Wheatley, except through his false affidavit, never having seen him. If he ever resided in Williamson County I am not aware of it. This base and false statement of his was published in Illinois several years ago, and at the time wholly refuted by men of standing in the country, who declared every one of his statements to be utterly false. I understood at the time that this affidavit was procured from a man in one of the poor-houses in Illinois, by the name of Wheatley, for a consideration, and afterward denied by the same man. I had supposed that no one would again think of putting this base fabrication before the public, but inasmuch as it has been done, I presume you will not refuse to publish a refutation of it made by a gentleman whose knowledge of the facts are such that his statements cannot be questioned. I refer to Colonel Thorndike Brooks, of Baltimore, who recruited the men referred to by Wheatley, and commanded them during the war. He was raised in Maryland, removed to Williamson County, Illinois, a short time before the war, and is now a merchant in Baltimore, well known in that city. I therefore ask, as an act of justice to me, that you publish this note, with the letter of Colonel Brooks appended, in as conspicuous a part of your paper as you did the false statements against me.

Very respectfully,

JOHN A. LOGAN.

MARCH 31, 1875.

Now follows Colonel Thorndike Brooks's letter to me, a man whom I had not seen for nearly fifteen years, and the person who did recruit these men, and who did serve in the confederate army during the war. Here is his statement:

BALTIMORE, MARYLAND, March 27, 1875.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of this date is received, and in reply to your request for a vindication at my hands I will state that I have the statement published in the New York World, and copied into other papers, purporting to be an affidavit made by one "John Wheatley," in substance as follows:

"John G. Wheatley deposes that he was one of seventy men recruited for the confederate army by JOHN A. LOGAN; that the said LOGAN conducted the recruits from Williamson County, Illinois, under cover of night, to a place on the Ohio River, where they crossed into Kentucky to join the confederate army; that LOGAN chose this crossing-place in order to avoid Union troops stationed at Cairo; that LOGAN left the recruits at the river for the purpose of going back for more, promising faithfully to join the first in a few days, and then command the regiment in the confederate service."

I wish to say that said affidavit is a lie throughout. The only body of men ever taken from Williamson County, Illinois, to the confederate army, that I know of, were those that went with me. With the recruiting of these, or sending off, you certainly had nothing to do. Said "Wheatley" was never in Illinois that I know of before the war. I joined the southern cause believing it the right one, and have never changed my opinion on that point; however, not believing any good can be accomplished by propagating lies or withholding the truth, I have written you this letter as requested.

Respectfully, yours,

THORNDIKE BROOKS,
Late Lieutenant-Colonel C. S. A.

Hon. JOHN A. LOGAN.

Here was the man who commanded the troops; who had not changed his opinions; a man who was then a confederate and still insisted that he was right; and after he states to the world that these things were lies and that he was the man himself, still I am pursued with this vile slander and falsehood.

In 1879 a person by the name of Lowe, of the House of Representatives, in some manner was interviewed by a newspaper reporter and by that means started up this slander again. By his interview the number that I should have recruited for the rebel army in Illinois was increased to three regiments. The citizens of Marion and vicinity, without regard to political parties, sent me unasked a statement which I have not heretofore used for the reason that I did not desire to use anything to defend my reputation for loyalty, but inasmuch as the insinuation was made in the Senate Chamber I desire to put these facts upon record where they will endure as long as time shall last, and when I am dead and gone my children will have a vindication of my reputation to turn to. These statements were sent me at a time when Lowe was made to state that which he nor any one else could have known, and I will read them. First is a statement from a man by the name of Spencer Blankenship, who lived at Marion, Williamson County, Illinois, who entered the confederate service from there and came back after the war was over:

No. 1 A.

MARION, WILLIAMSON COUNTY, ILLINOIS, May 10, 1879.

I, Spencer Blankenship, do hereby certify that I was a member of the company that left Williamson County to join the rebel army in May, 1861, and I am well acquainted with General JOHN A. LOGAN, and was at the breaking out of the rebellion; and having in the last month or so seen it repeatedly charged in various newspapers throughout the country that he aided and advised us to take such step, I deem it but justice to him to say that the same is in every respect false and untrue. And I further certify at the time we left Marion LOGAN was not here, nor had he been for some days.

SPENCER BLANKENSHIP.

Following that is a letter from M. C. Campbell, a leading merchant of Marion, Williamson County. He writes:

No. 2 A.

MARION, ILL., May 10, 1879.

DEAR SIR: I see from the papers that you are accused of raising or help raising men for the southern army. This I know to be false; for I know you were not here when the men left here for the South, and I know when you came back here you said they were fools for going and if you had of been here you would of tried to kept them from going South, and you wanted me to go back and see if I could not get H. B. Cunningham out and come home, and I told you I could not, for he had been mustered in; and you said it would ruin him, and that I ought to of kept him from going. I then went from here to Paducah, and from there to Union City, where the men were mustered in, and I know that you told me that it was best thing could be done if I could get him out of the confederate army. You wanted me to go in and help raise a regiment for the Union Army, and I told you I would not do it, but finally told you if you intended to raise a regiment I would help you, and that John H. White, who was our county clerk, that he would be a good man and make a good lieutenant-colonel, and that I would talk to White about the same for you; and I know of my own knowledge you had nothing to do with raising or encouraging men for the southern army, and that young Cunningham did not want any person to let you know he was going South to join the army, for he said you would be opposed to him going into the southern army, and if you need a affidavit to these facts write me and I will make one.

Yours, truly,

M. C. CAMPBELL.

JOHN A. LOGAN.

I never wrote him, never answered his letter; I never made use of it before. So also was written me a letter by A. C. Hillman, a man well known in the country, a man who knows all about what he says:

No. 3 A.

SOUTHERN ILLINOIS NORMAL UNIVERSITY,
Carbondale, Jackson County, Illinois, April 29, 1879.

MY DEAR SIR: Besides the party that went from Williamson County, Illinois, to the confederate army, there was also a party that went from Jefferson County, Illinois, numbering about fifteen, recruited by ex-Sheriff Bagwell, who went with them and was killed in the battle of Shiloh.

This party we suppose must be one of Lowe's companies.

He is speaking of the statement that got into the papers through an interview with Mr. Lowe.

Being cognizant of the facts connected with that party, and having also frequently conversed with members of the company since the war, I can positively state you knew nothing of the company until it was mustered into the confederate service, and of course could not have given it any encouragement or assistance.

Truly yours,

A. C. HILLMAN.

Hon. JOHN A. LOGAN.

He is a reputable man in that country, a man who knows what he says about it, and I could give the reasons why he does know if it was necessary. These, as I stated, were all democrats, not a republican among them. Here is a letter from George W. Rearden, a reputable gentleman of Illinois. As I am getting a little tired I will ask the Clerk to read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

No. 4 A.

SAINT LOUIS, April 29, 1879.

To the Editor of the Globe-Democrat:

I see in the Globe-Democrat of this morning that in the controversy between Senator JOHN A. LOGAN and Mr. Lowe, of Alabama, Mr. Lowe sought to cast a reflection upon Senator LOGAN by insinuating that LOGAN was instrumental in sending men from Southern Illinois South for the purpose of forming a regiment for LOGAN's command in the southern army. Now, the insinuation is so absurd that I feel it is but just to General LOGAN to repeat a conversation that passed between LOGAN and myself.

I have known General LOGAN intimately for nearly thirty years.

I do not remember the exact dates, but it was just about the time a few persons did go South from Southern Illinois and joined the Thirteenth Tennessee Regiment in the confederate army at Union City, Tennessee, I think in 1861, and I heard LOGAN regret that any one should act so unwisely as those men. I know from conversation with LOGAN that it was impossible for him to sympathize with their movement. I was residing in Cairo, Illinois, and was going to Springfield to attend the United States district court at Carbondale, Illinois. LOGAN got on the train, also going to Springfield of course. At that time there was no other subject to talk about but the then threatened rebellion on the part of the South. At that time LOGAN was a member of Congress, and an enthusiastic democrat. I was a whig, and we had fought many hard battles politically. Yet we were warm personal friends.

After we had arrived at Springfield, Illinois, and during our stay at the hotel together, LOGAN said to me, "George, I have not told any one my plans, but I will tell you what I am going to do, as I think I may want to use you. In a few days I am going to Washington to attend Congress, and I may go from there to Richmond, Virginia, to see those people and find out what they want. If they want anything that is reasonable, I shall use every effort in Congress to satisfy them and keep peace; but if they are unreasonable in their demands and show a disposition to want to disrupt this Government, I will return to Washington and write you a letter at once to raise a company for my regiment, for I will raise a regiment, go into the war, and fight them to the bitter end," which programme he most faithfully carried out, for within a few weeks from that time he was in Cairo, Illinois, with a regiment of 1,100 men, and the country knows the balance.

GEO. W. REARDEN.

Mr. LOGAN. At the same time that this statement was being published all over the country, the people of Marion, where this company was raised and where I formerly resided, as I said before in reference to these other letters, without my solicitation sent me a paper which I will present. It is a very small town, but few people living in it; a country village. The prominent citizens of Marion, composed of merchants and leading men of the town, men who resided there at that time and who reside there now, and men of repute and good standing, sent me the following statement which I never used before, and I ask that it be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

No. 5 A.

Fourteen reputable citizens, about one-half democrats and one-half republicans.

MARION, WILLIAMSON COUNTY, ILLINOIS,
May 7, A. D. 1879.

We, the undersigned, citizens of Marion and vicinity for twenty-five years last past, do hereby certify that we were well acquainted with JOHN A. LOGAN at the breaking out of the rebellion, and having within the last month seen it repeatedly charged in newspapers throughout the country that he raised a company for the rebel army in this, Williamson County, we deem it but justice to him to say that to our personal knowledge, and as we each verily believe, he had nothing whatever to do with raising any company for the rebel army in this county, nor did he in any way exert his influence to that end. And that we were also acquainted with Thorndike Brooks, who has made a statement of LOGAN's non-connection with raising a company in this county, and that we believe the same to be correct in every particular, said statement of Brooks bearing date March 27, 1875.

STATE OF ILLINOIS, WILLIAMSON COUNTY, ss:

I, W. H. Ewbanks, clerk of the county court in and for said county, in said State, do hereby certify that the persons whose names appear to the foregoing certificate are upright, truthful men, and any statement they might make would be entitled to full faith and credit.

In testimony whereof I hereto set my hand and affix the seal of said court at Marion, this 8th day of May, A. D. 1879.

[SEAL] W. H. EWBANKS, County Clerk.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, from the county of Jackson, an adjacent county, where I raised a part of my regiment, the citizens of Murphysborough and Carbondale, the leading men of both parties, democrats and republicans, sent me the following statements:

No. 6 A.

Twenty-nine reputable citizens of Jackson County, adjoining Williamson County, where I raised a part of my regiment.

We whose names are hereto subscribed, citizens of Jackson County, Southern Illinois, and well acquainted with General JOHN A. LOGAN, hereby declare any statement false which asserts that he at any time raised troops for the southern confederacy.

We also declare false and without foundation the statement in reference to this matter purporting to have been made by Colonel Lowe, of Alabama.

We further state, as our opinion, that any man who will reaffirm this slander—which has been shown to be false by the only persons who did join the southern army from Illinois—is a willful liar and defamer.

We, the undersigned, citizens of Jackson County, Southern Illinois, well acquainted with General JOHN A. LOGAN, hereby declare false and without the shadow of a foundation the statement purporting to be by Colonel Lowe, of Alabama, in reference to said LOGAN's raising troops in Southern Illinois for the southern confederacy. We further declare false any and every statement which asserts that said LOGAN raised or aided in raising any troops for the confederate army. We also give it as our opinion that any man who will reaffirm that slander after the proof given of its falsity is a willful defamer and unworthy to be treated as a gentleman.

Eighteen reputable citizens of Jackson County.

We whose names are hereto subscribed, citizens of Jackson County, Southern Illinois, and well acquainted with General JOHN A. LOGAN, hereby declare any statement false which asserts that he at any time raised troops for the southern confederacy.

We also declare false and without foundation the statement in reference to this matter purporting to have been made by Colonel Lowe, of Alabama.

We further state as our opinion, that any man who will reaffirm this slander—which has been shown to be false by the only persons who did join the southern army from Illinois—is a willful liar and defamer.

These statements were sent, as I said, on account of the person who had this interview getting it suggested to the country in some way, whether intentionally or not I do not know nor do I care, and I did not use them for the reason that I thought my conduct in this country had been sufficiently conspicuous as far as the war was concerned to refute in and of itself all statements of that kind. But I find that whenever a little fling is made by some man—I will not say without regard to truth, but some man very reckless in the manner of his remarks—then every democratic paper in the country comes flooded with these old lies again, the same old statements that have been refuted time and again. So it was then. A few days ago a remark was made as I said by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] in which he intimated that the people of the South had read my speeches that were on the line in which they acted. I then said to him it was false—not that they had not read my speeches; perhaps they had; I do not know. If they did read them, they found very good reading in the most of them. But that was sufficient to start the democratic press howling and yelping again on my track with these old lies and slanders. Then I thought that I would put on record the truth about this whole matter for a purpose which I will state before I conclude.

The Senator from Georgia in fact withdrew his remarks before he sat down, and said he accepted my statement; but the people of Marion, where this thing occurred, again voluntarily sent me the following statement in answer to Senator HILL, and although there are some pretty strong remarks in it I will have it read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Twenty-two reputable citizens of Williamson County.

MARION, ILLINOIS, April 4, 1881.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned, citizens of Marion and Williamson County, seeing the assertions and intimations made by Senator HILL, of Georgia, in the United States Senate, March 30, that you made disloyal speeches in this part of the country in 1860-'61, we wish to say we have been personally acquainted with you for the last twenty-five or thirty years, and have heard or read most all of your prominent speeches made at that time, and such assertions made by Senator HILL are false in every respect.

If it was necessary, hundreds of our best citizens, regardless of political feelings, would certify to such being false.

Hon. JOHN A. LOGAN, Washington, D. C.

Mr. LOGAN. This was sent to me several days ago, signed by the prominent people of that town, democrats and republicans.

I apologize to the Senate, Mr. President, for taking their time in reference to a matter personal to myself; but, as I said, these vile slanders have been sent broadcast until I and some of my friends thought it was time for me to put on record a refutation of them. I have never heretofore made answer to them except as I have shown here. I have only answered them by my conduct in war and in peace; but I put this refutation on record for this purpose: First, as I said, that my children after me may not have these slanders thrown in their faces without the power of dispelling or refuting them; I put them on this record that they may endure in this Senate Chamber so that they may be a notice to Senators of all parties and all creeds that hereafter while I am here in this Senate no insinuation of that kind will be submitted to by me. This, sir, is all.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I believe I was present and heard the discussion between the honorable Senator who has just taken his seat and my colleague, in which the expressions were dropped by my colleague to which allusion has been made by the Senator from Illinois. My recollection is that they grew out of some remarks that were made by the honorable Senator from Illinois about some of the supposed inconsistencies in the record of my colleague, and that he retorted at the time by referring to these representations of what we had understood to be the substance of the speeches made by the Senator from Illinois. I think, as stated by the Senator from Illinois, my colleague expressed himself satisfied after having heard the explanations of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. I stated, so that it might go in my remarks, that he qualified it when he said it. I had the statement read referring to him, although it contained some strong remarks about him, because they were part of the statement sent to me. I know the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] accepted my statement at the time, and I put that remark in what I said as I went along.

Mr. BROWN. That was my recollection, and as my colleague is absent, I simply felt it my duty to say that I know he had no purpose to do injustice to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not claim that he had.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from Illinois having been, as he said, at a former period a rather ultra democrat, and, while taking part in the discussion on the slavery question, having been, I believe, in rather an advanced position on the execution of the fugitive-slave law and other matters that we gave him great praise for in that day, and I now think he did right under the law as it was then, I suppose those facts and circumstances led our people naturally to look out for any remarks that might be made by him; and our newspapers may have misrepresented his position. I am now satisfied they did. I have heard the Senator's statement with great interest, and I take pleasure in saying—for I had some idea before that there was some shadow of truth in this report—that I think his vindication is full, complete, and conclusive.

I recollect very well during the war, when I was governor of my State and the Federal Army was invading it, to have had a large force of militia aiding the confederate army, and that General LOGAN was considered by us as one of the ablest, most gallant, and skillful leaders of the Federal Army. We had occasion to feel his power and we learned to respect him, and I am very glad to hear his statement in defense, if he chooses to call it such, and I know our people will be very glad to do him full justice. I have no doubt if my colleague were present he would cheerfully concur in what I have stated.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I have not heard all the speech of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] but the other day when in a very good-natured way he referred to something that had occurred when I first went into the House of Representatives, I said to him that perhaps there were some old lies told about him that should lead him not to place so much confidence in what had been said of me without a knowledge of the facts. I desire to say in this connection that at that time when I was kept out of the House for some time, as the Senator knows, on account of my connection with a gentleman who had been Vice-President and a candidate for the Presidency, a great many things were said to me about the Senator from Illinois, and supposing I would look into records of gentlemen, I was referred to many acts and speeches of his. As I said the other day, I never proposed to go into such things and never have done so, but at that time General Frank Blair was here and I submitted many of the papers I received to him—I never thought of using any of them—and I remember the remark that he made to me, "BECK, JOHN LOGAN was one of the hardest fighters of the war; and when many men who were seeking to whistle him down the wind because of his politics when the war began were snugly fixed in safe places he was taking his life in his hand wherever the danger was greatest," and I tore up every paper I got and burnt it in the fire before his eyes.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I do not know that anything which can be said on this side would be of any consequence to the Senator from Illinois in this matter; but I came into the House of Representatives at the same session that the Senator did; he was at that time one of the most intense of democrats and I was there with him when the rebellion first took root and manifested itself in open and flagrant war; and I wish to say as a republican of that day, when the Senator from Illinois was a democrat, that at the earliest possible moment when the republican party was in anxiety as to the position of the northern democracy on the question of forcible assault on the Union, nothing did they hail with more delight than the early stand which the Senator from Illinois, from the democratic side of the House, took upon the question of resistance to the Government of the United States. I feel that it is right that I should state that he was among the first, if not the very first, of the northern democrats who came out and openly declared, whatever may have been their opinion about the doctrines of the republican party, that when it came to a question of forcible resistance they should be counted on the side of the Government and in co-operation with the republican party in the attempt to maintain its authority.

I am very glad, whether it may be of any service or not, to bear this testimony to the early stand the Senator from Illinois took while he was still a democrat and the large influence he exerted upon the northern democracy, which kept it from being involved in the condition and in the work of the southern democracy at that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BLAIR in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone indefinitely.

Mr. DAWES. I hope we shall now take a vote on the pending resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. I move to lay the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee moves to lay the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts on the table.

Mr. COCKRELL. Pending that motion, I believe we have received a message from the President of the United States communicating to us important matters for our business transactions, and therefore I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire of the Senator from Missouri did he say he had received a message from the President?

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senate had.

Mr. CONKLING. Oh!

Mr. COCKRELL. All confidential communications from the President are sent to the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. CONKLING. I supposed the Senator had been the special recipient of this from the tremulous way in which he spoke of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. COCKRELL. On the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Georgia who is absent, [Mr. HILL.]

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] I would vote "yea" if I was not so paired. I will not announce my pair any more to-day.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, (when Mr. CAMDEN's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. SAWYER.]

Mr. BROWN, (when the name of Mr. HILL, of Georgia, was called.) My colleague [Mr. HILL] is still paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.] I make the announcement for the day.

Mr. HARRIS, (when Mr. JACKSON's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. JACKSON] is necessarily absent from the Chamber to-day. He is paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. MCDILL.] If he were present, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. PLATT, of New York, (when his name was called.) I desire to announce for the day that I am paired with the Senator from California, [Mr. FARLEY.]

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HAMPTON. I beg to announce that my colleague [Mr. BUTLER] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. COCKRELL. My colleague [Mr. VEST] is paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.] I make the announcement now as my colleague may be absent some days on account of sickness in his family.

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Harris,	Morgan,
Brown,	George,	Johnston,	Pendleton,
Call,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Cockrell,	Groome,	Lamar,	Ransom,
Coke,	Hampton,	McPherson,	Slater.

NAYS—23.

Allison,	Dawes,	Hill of Colorado,	Mitchell,
Blair,	Edgerton,	Hoar,	Morrill,
Burnside,	Ferry,	Ingalls,	Platt of Conn.,
Cameron of Wis.,	Frye,	Logan,	Sewell,

Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,
Fair,	Kellogg,	Sawyer,
Farley,	McDill,	Teller,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. After so decisive a vote as that, I do not think there can be any question that we should take a vote on the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. DAWES. I hardly thought after so decisive a vote as has just been taken that the motion would be pressed.

Mr. COCKRELL. We do not want the trouble of withdrawing it; we may as well take the vote.

Several SENATORS. Let us have the yeas and nays on this motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when Mr. SAWYER'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. SAWYER] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. CAMDEN.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 18, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Bayard,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Brown,	Groome,	Lamar,	Ransom,
Call,	Hampton,	McPherson,	Slater.

Davis of Illinois,	Jackson,	Plumb,	Voorhees,
Edmunds,	Jones of Florida,	Rollins,	Walker,
Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Saulsbury,	Williams.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to indefinitely postpone the resolution.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] yesterday made the following remarks:

I do not so far as I am concerned care at all, it is not so far as I am concerned the weight of a feather, whether this resolution be voted up or voted down; but what concerns me is the great question beyond that, swallowing up everything else, vital in the struggle to maintain the integrity and power and will of this Government that has been going on among the American people for twenty years against that fatal error, assuming all phases and adopting all devices and resorting to all methods if thereby the will of the majority as it speaks through the Constitution and the laws of this land may be perverted and defied and trampled down.

Again he said:

Whether the majority be one or one hundred thousand matters not; it is the decree of this Government that that majority is omnipotent under it, and he who refuses to obey that will sets himself up against his Government in a vain—I believe a vain, certainly an unholy—attempt to overthrow it.

It has been asserted time and again in this Chamber that there was a constitutional majority demanding the passage of the resolution now before the Senate. I deny it, Mr. President; and I ask the Senator from Massachusetts not to engage in vague declamation and assertion, but to meet the argument against it with argument and reason.

The honorable Senators from Massachusetts represent a State and a people famous throughout the world for their high appreciation and their profound knowledge of the laws that govern the intellectual processes which have accomplished the moral and material triumphs of this age. They owe it to Massachusetts and to her high character in the intellectual world that something more than mere declamation, than iteration and reiteration of the same proposition, should be made. I invite the attention of the honorable Senators from Massachusetts and other Senators who have so often affirmed that there was a constitutional majority for the resolution now pending to meet with argument and reason the inquiries and propositions I shall submit to them here.

First I ask the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is not a constitutional object for the exercise of the power of a constitutional majority, in the spirit and intendment of the Constitution, equally essential to make a constitutional majority on any question as the mere existence of the requisite number? I apprehend that there is but one answer to that question, and I invite the attention of the Senator and ask him if he proposes to affirm that the existence of a constitutional object is not as necessary as the mere requisite numbers? Then I will ask Senators upon the other side who maintain that there is a constitutional majority upon the question of the passage of this resolution to elect the officers of the Senate, is it a constitutional object in the spirit and intendment of the Constitution for the exercise of the power of a majority to bestow the Senate offices for the purpose of carrying a State election in the interest of any party? I challenge the gentlemen upon the other side to assume the affirmative of that proposition. It has been asserted upon the floor of the Senate time and again that this resolution was proposed to be passed for a purpose, and that purpose not the convenience of the Senate but for the purpose of influencing an election now about to occur in the State of Virginia. I ask gentlemen who maintain the affirmative of that proposition which has been asserted here, is it constitutional to exercise the power of a majority for the purpose of influencing a party election in a State or any State election?

I ask again, to bring the contention down to the question and not to engage in vain assertion, was there ever a case before where a Senator for the first time acted in the Senate with a party and at the same time received the right of appointing or had all the valuable and lucrative offices of the Senate appointed in accordance with his interest and with his known desires? Was there ever a case before where the Senate was avowedly proposed to be organized for the purpose and in the interest of a party election then going on? Will the Senator from Massachusetts state any reasonable and proper hypothesis on which a Senator can for the first time act with a political party and at the same time receive from it the bestowal of lucrative offices? I ask further, may not a resolution otherwise constitutional become unconstitutional because of the intention with which it is passed, or the purpose and effect of it? As an instance of this proposition I submit the inquiry, would it not have been unconstitutional in 1861 to have elected a Sergeant-at-Arms and a Secretary of the Senate for the purpose and with the effect of encouraging secession and the dissolution of the Union? Would it not be unconstitutional to elect officers of the Senate either for the purpose or with the effect of encouraging or aiding a movement in any State of the Union for repudiation or a readjustment of her State debt? Is it not unconstitutional to elect officers of the Senate for the purpose or with the effect of aiding or encouraging any State or any party in the State to do anything which is not within the prescribed constitutional powers of Congress and of the Government of the United States? Is the readjustment of the debts of Virginia or the question of the election of a governor, a Senator, and members of the Legislature of the State of Virginia within the powers of the Constitution and the Government of the United States?

Mr. President, I submit that we are not here for the purpose of vain declamation. Neither the Senator from Massachusetts nor myself can make reason, nor can we dethrone the power of truth and substitute declamation for the processes of the human mind in discovering the truth. These propositions are necessary to be answered before the gentlemen upon the other side can maintain that this resolution is a constitutional resolution and that there is a constitutional majority for it. I affirm that when the object and the effect of a measure are outside of the Constitution and inimical to it, it must be contrary to the spirit and intendment and purpose of the Constitution, and there can be no constitutional majority to do that which the Constitution does not authorize and which is unfriendly to its spirit and its purposes.

There is no authority in the Constitution for a constitutional majority of the Senate to do anything for the purpose of carrying a party election in any State or to do anything that is not within the limits of the prescribed powers and objects of the Constitution.

In my judgment it is a disrespect to the Constitution and to the American people and to their great system of government and its beneficent purposes when the Senator from Massachusetts declaims here so often and so earnestly in favor of a constitutional majority on this question and the right of a constitutional majority to pass this resolution, intended, as is declared, not for the convenience of public business, but to influence the elections of Virginia and to do honor to the Senator from Virginia for his support of the republican party in the Senate. I acknowledge the duty of submission to a constitutional majority for a constitutional purpose; but an election in the State of Virginia for her Legislature, her governor, her judges, and her Senator, so far from being a constitutional purpose is directly prohibited by our Constitution and our form of government in the assertion that the powers of this Government shall be exercised for the objects prescribed in the Constitution, and you cannot say with truth that your resolution only proposes to elect a Sergeant-at-Arms and a Secretary of the Senate when you avow your main and distinct purpose to be and when the necessary effect will be to effect that which the Constitution says you shall have no right to interfere in, to wit, the election, the free election, in the State of Virginia of her own State officers. It is that which makes this resolution entirely unconstitutional, it is its purpose and its effect.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts a few days ago, in the discussion which occurred here, denied a statement that I made, not resting upon my own authority but upon the statements of the contestant and contestee in Congress, Messrs. Boynton and Loring, of Massachusetts, and of General B. F. Butler, of Massachusetts, and of the report of the special committee of investigation of which Mr. Wallace was chairman, when I was endeavoring to show that there was no reality in this matter of a free ballot and a fair count; that this proclamation of a new party, a coalition between the republicans and the Senator from Virginia to secure a free ballot and a fair count in the Southern States was a mere pretense; that the gentlemen who made it, the Senators from Massachusetts, came here from a State that had no free ballot. I stated that there was according to the best estimate that could be found 130,000 or 140,000 adult white males disfranchised in their State. The proposition was denied as absurd; the calculation made by General Butler was said to be untrue. It was said that the ballot was free there; that it rested upon the consent of a majority of the people of Massachusetts.

The Southern States were assailed because they were said to prevent by intimidation and violence a free ballot, and by some means prohibited a majority of people from exercising the franchise. The burden of the complaint was that every man was a brother, whatever his race or color, and therefore had equal rights; that there was something divine in the power of the majority, and that upon that superstructure this Government was built. I asserted then that there was a freer ballot and a fairer count in the Southern States, a more widely extended ballot, than anywhere else in the world.

In the special instance of Massachusetts the honorable gentlemen denied it. They said there was no man in Massachusetts who did not hoot and laugh at the statement; in General Butler's brief of 130,000 disfranchised persons they affirmed that it was utterly untrue. I am here now to submit the figures to these honorable gentlemen and to ask them to come forward not with assertion but with proof. The statement which General Butler submitted to the other House, and which I read the other day in the contest between Boynton and Loring, affirmed that there were, in 1875, 449,686 ratable polls; that there were of voters, native born, 281,842; of foreign born, 69,271; that there were in the State, deducting 5,699 persons supposed to be under twenty-one years of age, in 1875, 449,686, and in 1878, 490,158, from which he estimated by the rate of increase that there were 403,444 citizens of the United States in the State of Massachusetts, 136,859 of whom, after allowing 4 per cent. of the total vote of the State for persons remaining away from the polls, were disfranchised for other causes than criminality, idiocy, and insanity, the causes being illiteracy, failure to pay a tax, and pauperism.

I hold in my hand the census of the State of Massachusetts taken by authority in the year 1875. I propose to investigate by the light of that census and by the facts exhibited in that census how far the ballot is free and the count is fair in the State of Massachusetts. The Senators from Massachusetts cannot surpass me in respect for the high intellect, the great material progress, and the great charities which are exhibited by that State in its history and its present development. I said the Senators from Massachusetts representing that State and her laws under which this great development and this civilization had occurred have no right to come here and shake hands upon a pretended, a vain, and an improper coalition to create a free ballot and a fair count in other States by impugning the character and the honesty and the love of truth of the whole people, not of one but of many States.

Let us see how Massachusetts stands. The Senators deny pointedly the statement to be true that there was anything like one hundred thousand or one hundred and thirty-nine thousand adult males in the State of Massachusetts disfranchised. What does the census say in 1875, to which you must add the increase of population up to 1878, the date at which we were speaking? I read from the census, page 34:

It will be seen that 351,113, or 21¼ per cent. of the whole population, are legal voters. Of the whole male population 44 per cent. are voters; 56 per cent., or 449,686, are ratable polls. The naturalized voters compose 19.7 per cent., or 69,271, of the whole number of voters, and the number of native voters is 281,842, or 80.3 per cent. of the whole number.

The native-born voters constitute 47 + per cent. of the native-born males, and the naturalized voters 35 per cent. of the foreign-born males.

The aliens or foreign-birth, that is of males over twenty years of age who have not been naturalized, number 79,136.

Of the 297,997 native-born males over twenty years of age 281,842 are legal voters, while of the 161,888 foreign-born males over twenty-one years of age 69,271, or 42 per cent., are legal voters.

If the honorable Senators will add those two figures together of the native-born voters and the naturalized foreign-born voters they will find the exact figures stated in General Butler's brief and by me of 351,000 voters in 1875, and the rest is the natural rate of increase according to the population of the State of Massachusetts.

Not only that, but this is further confirmed by the census of 1870, which declares the whole number of all classes of male population twenty-one years and upward to be 398,157, and the number of male citizens at that date to be 312,770. So that it will be perceived that here is not only the authority of the census of Massachusetts for the exact statement that was made—that there were in the State of Massachusetts in 1878 more than one hundred and thirty thousand people, citizens of Massachusetts, entitled to vote under the laws but for illiteracy, failure to pay a tax, and pauperism, who did not vote in the election of 1878—but we find still further that the number of voters in the election of 1878, as stated by General Butler, was 256,332.

Table from Massachusetts census of 1875, pages 34, 94.

Native voters	281,842
Increase to 1878 (estimated—not in census)	25,366
Foreign-born voters	69,271
Increase (estimated to 1878)	6,234
Native-born illiterates	6,075
Total	388,788

NOTE.—The above result appears from the census of 1875, without adding the foreign-born illiterates naturalized which General Butler adds in his brief, and which he puts down, on what authority I do not know, at 14,691. This will make the number of legal voters 403,479, of whom 256,332 voted in 1878, leaving 147,147 persons who did not vote in 1878.

The difference between 388,788 and 449,686 and increase, (estimated in 1878 to be 490,158,) who were not returned as voters in the census of 1875, who were disfranchised from some cause, either from laws of naturalization, from illiteracy, from non-taxpaying, pauperism, or from some cause—this ascertained number, affirmed by the census in the State of Massachusetts and by a reasonable estimate of increase, is 101,370 adult males. Now the Senators of Massachusetts are proclaiming here a new crusade for a freer vote in the State of Virginia, when as stated by their own census there is only 44 per cent. of her entire male population who are voters, and 16,000 of her adult native-born males above the age of twenty-one years who are not allowed to vote under her laws, while there are of foreigners naturalized only 42 per cent., or 69,271 are legal voters out of 161,885 foreign-born males over twenty years of age, leaving 92,613 persons of foreign birth who are not voters, and making, with the 16,000 native-born above the age of twenty years who are not voters, 108,614 adult males of her population who have no voice in her public affairs. This may be somewhat explained by the statement of the census of Massachusetts of 1875, which states as follows, (see page 94:)

Of the whole number of illiterates the balance, or 90,789, more than 86 per cent. of the whole, are over twenty-one years of age. The native-born illiterates number 12,150, more than half being above twenty-one years of age.

There are simply 42 per cent. of foreign-born males, otherwise citizens of Massachusetts, except that they have no right to vote, over twenty years of age, of whom 69,271, nothing like a majority, scarcely a third, are not allowed to vote. What does this show? The amazing fact that with her census declaring that there were 351,113 qualified voters in the State of Massachusetts in 1875, there was a State election in 1878 at which from one cause and another only 256,332 votes were cast.

In the election of 1876, an exciting presidential election in which the full vote must have been brought out, out of 351,113 legal voters by their census of 1875 Hayes received 150,063 votes and Tilden 108,777, and 92,273 did not vote.

In the election for governor in 1879, which was an exciting election, Mr. Long received 122,751 votes, General Butler received 109,149 votes, Adams received 9,989 votes, Eddy received 1,645 votes, all others received 108 votes; total of votes cast, 243,642, less by 107,471 than the number of legal votes in 1875. (See Manual for the General Court, 1880, page 267.)

The population in 1875 was 1,651,912. Thirty and a fraction was the rate of increase from 1865 to 1875. This makes 198,228 increase added to the 1,651,912, or 1,850,140 in 1879. One-fifth estimated as voters makes, in 1879, 370,028; less votes cast in 1879, 243,648, leaves 126,380 who did not vote.

Does that condition of things authorize a crusade upon other States, the building up of a party for the purpose of extending the ballot somewhere else, for the purpose of enabling the majority to rule in other States, for the purpose of establishing qualifications and conditions which create and substitute a new power in and over the States in this respect in the place of the virtue and religion and character of their own people? That is the argument. The Senator from Massachusetts can make it, but he cannot escape in the eye of reason; he cannot escape in the critical and intelligent and reasonable processes of public opinion and in the educated opinion in the great institutions of learning in Massachusetts, by affirming a distinction where none exists, and saying that he does not question the right of any State to impose its own constitutional requirements and conditions, but that he does question the right of any State to impose such conditions and qualifications as will (not in their judgment, but in his or that of the people of some other State) fail to secure to every man the right as the law gives it to them, not as that State acting upon its own responsibility, not as the character and intelligence and virtue of its people may think fit and best, but as he or some others in their judgment may think best outside of them. I agree with the Senator that in Massachusetts and New York, in Florida, in Mississippi, in Texas, everywhere, the law should be administered to give full and perfect protection to every man, but I insist that under the Constitution of our country any qualification for voters and any means by which the voter shall have his right ascertained and secured to him must be by the State law, the public opinion of the State, the moral and religious character of the people, and her judicial tribunals, and these are the true and proper means by which those rights are both to be made and preserved.

The Senators therefore were wrong in their confident declaration that the statements which I read on the occasion referred to as to the number of people in Massachusetts who are not allowed to have any part in the government of Massachusetts are untrue, because their own census in direct terms, leaving no room for mistake, affirms the number to be exactly what I said, that is, in 1875 351,113 voters out of 449,000, the number of native-born voters being 281,842 and the foreign-born voters 69,271, making 351,115 as the real number as stated in the census; so that the statement of these gentleman that the foreign-born voters who are not naturalized have been taken out of that and that it included all sexes, ages, and conditions, is entirely incorrect.

Mr. President, what are the other tables which we find in this Massachusetts census? We find that there were, in 1875, 83,842 illiterate persons over the age of twenty-one years, and the native-born over twenty-one years were 6,075; that there were male paupers 2,388, convicts 3,578. (See census, page 94.)

The other day when I asserted that the ballot in Massachusetts was of necessity influenced by the character of the business, the pursuits, the occupations of the people, my honorable friend from Massachusetts denied the proposition. He asserted that the arm of labor in Massachusetts was more powerful than the arm of capital; that the employer was afraid to attempt to influence the employé as to his vote. I said that wherever there is a dense population, wherever capital is concentrated, wherever the people are dependent upon the arbitrary will of the employer, the ballot must be influenced and controlled largely by the dependence of the one and the power and independence of the other. Let us see how far this is probably true. My honorable friend said that in Massachusetts education was open to everybody; that the clause of illiteracy had comparatively little or no influence. I never questioned the propriety of laws looking to secure the power and control of the Government in the hands of the intelligent, the virtuous, and the tax-paying people, but I did question the Senator's right, standing here upon such laws, holding his seat by virtue of the disfranchisement of more than 139,000 citizens of Massachusetts who but for such laws would be voters, to declare another and a contrary policy, and to seek to build up another and a contrary policy resting upon a different philosophy and a different theory.

Let us see what is to be found upon that subject. I find in these statistics, which are very thorough and gotten up with ability, the following, to which I invite the attention of my distinguished friend from Massachusetts, for it is Massachusetts authority and it is upon the point of how far, what number of people, illiteracy affects with a disfranchisement in the State of Massachusetts. It is upon the point of the independence of the great and intelligent and virtuous laboring people of Massachusetts of her wealth and her capital. I will go with him in all sympathy for them. In our country there is a warm and cordial love and sympathy for the laboring-man. We sympathize with the laborer; we honor honest toil, and we respect and love dearly those people who do as all men ought to do, earn their living by the sweat of their brow. Let us see how it is in Massachusetts, a country which is the sixth in density of population of all the countries of the world, whose civilization is wonderful, whose public charities are worthy of great and most eminent commendation and praise. Let us see how the poor people, the laboring people, of Massachusetts are free from the power of wealth. Says the census of that State, page 266:

The average amount of minor children's earnings, for males, in the State is $227.65, a sum nearly one-half as large as the fathers themselves earn at their regular occupations. It is to be borne in mind that this sum is not the average earnings of each child, but is the amount which accrues to each father or mother from the labor of a child or children.

Mark how accurate are these statistics. Let us see now how power is built up in Massachusetts. I said we had a freer ballot and a fairer count and a more independent voting population than they had in Massachusetts. I do not object to her laws; I admire and commend with my feeble tribute of admiration her wonderful progress, her great civilization; but let us have the facts; and do not let gentlemen standing upon that system of things come here to reproach us and make a coalition with the Senator from Virginia for a fair count and a free ballot as the foundation of a new crusade against the good order, the peace and harmony of society, and all the business interests of many of the States of the Union, when they themselves deny a free ballot and insist on their own State authority to make the count.

The compendium of the census continues as follows:

It is, however, a great question whether the money brought into the family in this way subserves its best interests. The children thus put into the factory and workshop are usually deprived of the school education necessary to their highest success in after life. So that the real interests of the individual and of the State are thus sacrificed to the immediate demand for subsistence. It is a fact that the most of the children working in mills, who furnish the large proportion of the earnings exhibited in the table, are growing up in ignorance.

I commend that to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts taken from the Massachusetts census, not as a censure upon Massachusetts or upon her laws or upon her civil polity, but as one of the necessary and inevitable facts for which no science, social or political, has yet found a remedy in a dense population subsisting by the arts and manufactures.

The census goes on to say:

That they are the nucleus of a class that is likely to expand gradually into an element unfit for self-government, and unmanageable by the purblind intelligence that in its haste to be rich has made use of their ignorance, there can be no doubt.

The census further says:

Under school attendance is given the number of children attending school at least three months during the year ending May 1, 1875.

Mark you, we are wanting to know whether or not this reading or writing qualification disfranchises any large number of the people of the State of Massachusetts, the native or the foreign-born citizen, the man and the brother; not a new race of people newly enfranchised into freedom without education and dependent on the charities and the sympathies and the good judgment of their neighbors of another and a different race, but Massachusetts people of their own race, their own people. Let us see how they are affected by such a qualification.

Says the census in regard to school attendance, page 89:

The whole number of all ages (attending school three months in 1875) is 232,784; 1,969 being under five years of age, 254,568 between five and fifteen, and 26,947 above fifteen. From the returns made to the board of education contemporaneously with the census returns, there appear to be 300,834 children between five and fifteen years of age in the State, and this number is fully sustained by the census. These statements indicate that there were 46,266 children in the State between five and fifteen years of age who had not "attended school three months during the year ending May 1, 1875."

There are 46,266 children, notwithstanding the statute which the Senator from Massachusetts produced here the other day, who had not attended school during three months of that year, and the reason why is given—because their labor was necessary to the subsistence of the family.

Here is another fact for my learned friend. He says there are very few people affected by these qualifications. I stated from the report that there were 139,000, and it appears very clearly from the exact figures of the census that there was that number. Let us look at the question in a different way. Let us see how illiteracy affects it. I read again from the census:

Illiterates have been, in this census, classified as those persons who cannot read, but can write; cannot write, but can read; and can neither read nor write; of the first class there are 307; of the second, 26,656; of the third, 77,550; total 104,513—above ten years of age, or about 6½ per cent. of the whole population.

* * * * * * *

Of the whole number of illiterates, 6,041 are between the ages of ten and fifteen inclusive; 5,554 are between sixteen and nineteen, inclusive; 2,129 from twenty to twenty-one, inclusive, and the balance, or 90,789—more than 86 per cent. of the whole—are above twenty-one years of age. The native-born illiterates number 12,150 (more than half being above twenty-one,) or less than 1 per cent. of the native-born population; the foreign-born illiterates number 92,363.

So from a variety of sources it appears that there must of necessity be more than 136,000 adult white male people in the State of Massachusetts who are from one cause or another denied the ballot.

With all that large mass of laboring people, industrious and worthy the support of the State, with all this long list here of manufactures and arts which produce the wonderful wealth of Massachusetts, let us see what is their condition. This table is made from answers to a series of questions propounded under the authority of law, carefully prepared and covering the true ground and purpose of a census, the ascertainment of the industrial, material, and moral condition of the State and her people. I venture to say there are few works on this subject so unpretending and yet so thorough in its classification as that which I now hold in my hand, together with the public documents of Massachusetts, from 17 to 30, connected with it.

The facts which I shall state are obtained from a large number of answers to questions in writing. The whole number of answers received was 110,246. This statement is made from these answers. Of this number 63,263 were returns from males and 17,630 from females, and of the total number used 71,339 were from the "wage" class, and 9,554 from the salary class; of the 80,893 answering, 45,929 males and 1,935 females returned 142,385 people dependent upon them for support. The average number of dependents upon the males was 3.02, and on the females 1.76, while the average for both males and females was 2.97.

Let us see what these people received and what it cost them to live. We can inquire then whether the Senator from Massachusetts is right in his proposition that the more dependent men and women are upon others for food and clothing and shelter the more independent they are of the will of such person. The correlative of the proposition is that the more absolute the power and control of one class of people over another to withhold or give them food, clothing, and shelter, the less disposed they are to exercise such power. That is the argument.

I read again from the Massachusetts census:

The average number of hours per day employed for males is shown to be 10.21, and for females, 10.49.

* * * * * * *

The average daily wage is found to be $2.01.

* * * * * * *

We think it can be safely said that the daily wage of the male adult workman in this Commonwealth for 1875 was $2.01. * * * The average daily wage of females is seen to be eighty-two cents. * * * The average yearly earnings of the former is found to be $482.72, and of the latter, $198.76.

Of the eighty thousand and odd people here answering these questions, 14,046 males and 287 females are owners of the dwellings in which they live; that is an aggregate of 13,333 persons. Of those, 5,823 males and 116 females have an incumbrance on their houses in the shape of a mortgage. The yearly wages of the males is found to be $482.72, and of females is $198.76. The amount paid for rent is 22½ per cent. of this sum. The cost of living is $488.96 for the men; for the women, $182.86.

The Senator from Massachusetts can tell us how much independence there is where famine, hunger, and nakedness stand outside of an income received only in health and barely supplying the wife and children with the clothing and shelter and food which protects them from the severe and inclement winter and from starvation.

There are the figures of Massachusetts' own census, and, while standing with a restricted suffrage and a vote in 1876, 1878, and 1879 of only about two-thirds of her adult population, her Senators join a coalition to give Virginia a "free ballot."

In the census of 1870 Massachusetts is reported with 398,000 male citizens of twenty-one years of age and 312,000 voters, while Virginia stands with 269,000 adult male citizens and 266,000 voters. I venture to say, not with disrespect to Massachusetts, for she is a triumph of civilization, but disrespect to the argument which asserts a greater independence and freedom from the influence of wealth and power for her people than the people of the Southern States, whose wants are fewer, who live in an agricultural country, where there is no density of population, however splendid may be your attainments in securing and in accumulating wealth; a people who are crowded in a small space, and who are the sixth in density of population in the world; who are a vast mass of laboring people, the skilled operatives of the country, producing enormous wealth, yet compelled to live on scanty wages, when you turn from this to see your statistics of pauperism, your statistics of crime, you may well follow Dickens and Victor Hugo and others into their descriptions of that vast mass of people who are the miserables, the unfortunate of humanity, those of whom fortune has made its buffets, and many of whom are driven against their will into crime and pauperism. You will find that you cannot maintain the proposition that by any laws that you may make you can defend and protect people in this condition from the silent, certain, and oppressive influences of power. Here you stand with 260,000 votes cast in three successive elections out of a population of 449,000 ratable polls and its increase.

In 1878 of the estimated 403,444 citizens she had a vote of 256,000. You may say, with the learned and distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR], who is always capable of meeting any argument or any statement of fact, "The people staid at home." That accounts for a great many, but it does not account for the difference between 256,000 and 403,444 in three successive important and exciting elections.

Let us go further and see how these laws operate, not only in Massachusetts but everywhere else. You have an intelligence qualification. Upon this subject I depart from the census and speak only by the authority of the pamphlet of General Butler. He is responsible for this statement. He says:

> By an amendment to the constitution of Massachusetts, article 20, page 38, General Statutes, adopted the 3d day of May, 1857, it is provided as follows:
> "No person shall have a right to vote or be eligible to office under the constitution of this Commonwealth who shall not be able to read the constitution in the English language and write his name."
> This article was adopted by the Legislature of 1854-'55, and ratified by the people on the 23d day of May, 1857, by a vote of 23,833 in favor, and 13,746 against, out of some one hundred and fifty thousand of the then voters of Massachusetts.

Out of that whole number of 150,000 qualified voters in the State of Massachusetts here is a disfranchising clause cutting off nearly one-half of her resident male population by virtue of one qualification and another in its application and its terms, together furnishing the opportunity and the cause, adopted by 23,833 votes. I challenge the Senator from Massachusetts to deny that fact. If it be true, then the honorable Senators stand here to-day Senators of the United States under a constitutional clause adopted by 23,000 votes out of 150,000 in the State of Massachusetts which disfranchises, according to the figures of her own census, or withholds the ballot from nearly half of her adult males. I ask the honorable Senators how they can escape by saying that they recognize the power of any State to impose her own qualifications? I understand the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to say that he recognizes the right of Virginia to disqualify and disfranchise any portion of her people that she sees fit to do by her constitution or her laws passed under her constitution. That is in effect to say to the Virginians, "Strike hands with us for a free ballot and a fair count; all we ask of you is to go to your constitutional convention or legislature as we did in Massachusetts, where with 23,000 votes out of 150,000 we disfranchised about one-third or more of the male adult people, the man and the brother." The Senator will not deny it; there it is; here is your census; here are the figures which I have cited, and he cannot properly deny that they are true. He says to the Virginians, "Go and do as we have done, but do not restrict the suffrage in any other way; do not commit violence; do not intimidate anybody." For although the same State law makes you amenable and responsible for any wrong or violence to the voter the same State constitution guarantees the voter protection against violence in every locality; the public opinion, the enlightened conscience, the laws that must be passed and executed in response to that public opinion under your State constitution are sufficient for the voter's protection, and must be subverted by us before we can interfere with the ballot or the count under State law. Yet we must establish a party policy and a law for your States; but we will show you a better way. Go to your Legislature or your convention, and disfranchise as many as you please, without limit; impose, as you have the right to do, suffrage qualifications of intelligence and payment of taxes, of good moral character, quiet and peaceable behavior, and "I will sustain you to the end." Gentlemen, that cannot be the foundation for a party. Either the "man and the brother" and his equal and universal rights are true, or the limitations which laws and public opinion and the protection of property and the morality of the community may demand are true. Laws stand upon philosophies, upon theories of right or wrong, and are not mere arbitrary enactments. So, upon your proposition, a free ballot means that its freedom is to be prescribed and limited by the State law, but that the count must be limited and supervised and protected by Federal law, and has neither logic nor philosophy in it; it does not touch the point of either theory, or in any way address itself to the cure of any real or supposed evil.

Mr. President, let us look a little further at the States which honorable Senators on the other side represent. I say again I am making no criticism unfriendly to Massachusetts or any other States, to their wealth, to their power, and their great civilization. I am simply endeavoring to hold you, gentlemen, to the light and reason of that civilization and to prove that you cannot justify this coalition on fictitious grounds. I want to compare these States upon which you say there must be a crusade for a free ballot and a fair count with your own States in this respect. You have joined with the Senator from Virginia, you say that you have gone in with him to suppress a great evil in the South, a limited suffrage, a suppression of suffrage by violence. We deny that. Let us see, however, how you stand in your republican States on that subject. I wish to read a statement. The honorable Senators from Pennsylvania may answer whether it is true. It is a statement made by Mr. Ryon, of Pennsylvania, and I have here some figures in the census which look a little that way:

> In the State of Pennsylvania, where we have 407,428 democrats, it takes 50,928 to send a Representative to this House. These 407,000 electors in Pennsylvania are represented by eight men upon this floor. The republican vote in 1880 was 444,704. It takes 23,450 republicans to elect a Representative to Congress. These 444,000 republicans in the State of Pennsylvania are represented by nineteen men in this House. The city of Philadelphia has five Representatives on this floor. One is a democrat and four are republicans. It takes 75,000 democrats in that city to elect one democrat, and 94,000 republicans to elect four republicans.
> In the State of New York, in the State of Ohio, and in the State of Pennsylvania by this process of gerrymandering more white men are practically disfranchised than there are negroes in the South.

I have no doubt that is true. I have no doubt that under this process of what you call districting the country, which you think legitimate, to accumulate votes in one district by which you destroy all the excess over a majority and render those ballots entirely useless, and do it for that express purpose, that you disfranchise of their right to an equal ballot more white male citizens in these great States than there are colored voters in the entire South. Here stands the record, and it may be a subject of calculation, of specific and certain ascertainment about which there can be no doubt and no denial.

Let us see how the census stands. Here you are making a crusade for a free ballot. If you mean anything you mean an extended ballot, because you do not propose to subvert State authority directly; you do not propose to subvert the State governments; you do not propose to say that on any other than an election day the Federal courts may take cognizance of every act of violence, and there can be no interference with the ballot except by violence. You do not avow any purpose by laws of the United States to try and punish State officials for the manner in which they conduct their State elections.

As I said, Virginia, with nearly double the population of Connecticut, has 2,562 males above the age of twenty-one who are not voters, while Connecticut has 22,916 who are not voters. By the census of 1870 South Carolina has about the same population as Connecticut, and has only 1,413 males over twenty-one years who were not voters by law. Maryland has 184,000 males above twenty-one years and 169,000 voters; North Carolina, 217,000 males and 214,000 voters; South Carolina, 148,000 citizens above twenty-one and 146,000 voters; while Maine has 169,000 citizens above twenty-one and only 153,160 voters; Georgia, 237,000 citizens above twenty-one and she had 234,000 voters, being a difference of only two or three thousand. Vermont had 90,806 citizens above twenty-one years of age and she had only 74,867 voters. Connecticut had 150,415 males above twenty-one years and 127,499 voters. Florida had, in 1870, 39,907 citizens above twenty-one years of age and 38,854 voters. Alabama had 203,315, and she had 202,000 voters; Mississippi, 174,000 citizens and 169,000 voters; Louisiana, 174,000 citizens and 159,000 voters; Texas, 184,000 citizens and 169,000 voters. Ohio had 640,820 males above twenty-one years and 592,000 voters; Pennsylvania, 865,000 and only 766,000 voters; Illinois, 625,000 and only 542,000 voters; Minnesota, 114,000 and only 75,000 voters; Michigan, 315,937 and only 274,000 voters; Wisconsin, 255,000 and only 203,000 voters.

It may be said that a large portion of those are foreigners. Very true, but in some of your States West you have provided for these people voting under State laws in advance of the period of naturalization. I care not whether they do not vote because they cannot vote or because they do not feel interest enough in the suffrage to vote. Whether they are prohibited from voting or indifferent to its exercise, I say that, standing as you do in these States, with a very large portion of your population who do not vote who are not of the majority, you have not a majority rule or a majority power. Your proposition is not right. It matters not whether it be from one cause or another, but in all your States you have different grounds and causes of suffrage qualification, while in our Southern States the figures show and the fact is a suffrage far more nearly universal, and I challenge Senators on the other side to bring one solitary case on reasonable evidence of violence or repression beyond that which occurs everywhere.

Mr. President, I said upon a former occasion that the criminal statistics of the Northern States would exhibit exactly the same condition of crime and the same causes of crime that are to be found in every Southern State; that the proportion would be very nearly the same; and that those crimes, committed in States where the people were nearly all of the same race, were therefore the natural outgrowth of humanity in their relations to each other, that they were crimes committed by citizens of the same race upon each other. I will add the table which I have here in my hand from the Massachusetts census, without detaining the Senate to read it.

Totals	19	1	342	7	3,217	754	3,578	762	4,340

It appears here that in Massachusetts you have 4,340 convicts in your State annually.

Mr. SAULSBURY. In one year?

Mr. CALL. Every year; that is the average. Out of 4,340 you have 335 breaking and entering, including burglary; drunkenness, 891; murder, 24; manslaughter, 49; malicious mischief, 30; forgery, 47; disturbing the peace, 18. You may say what you will, gentlemen, about equal rights, but the doors of the courts of justice are in great part closed to the poor almost everywhere. Law to a great extent, except in its punitive sanctions, is a luxury for the rich. Almost everywhere outside of the holy precincts of religion and the temples and places of charity, poverty and want meet with that cold charity which is proverbial as applied to the poor. There is not much law for the man who is a beggar, whether in Massachusetts or anywhere else; quite as much there as anywhere else, no doubt.

The list further comprises: Larceny, 929; robbery, 125; truancy and vagrancy, 370; murder, 24; manslaughter, keeping a gaming house, burglary with intent to kill, bigamy, polygamy, rape, vagrancy, passing counterfeit money, felonious assault, attempt to commit murder, attempt to commit rape, arson, &c., the same crimes that are to be found in the Southern States precisely. I challenge gentlemen to the proof. Here are your records. Do not come with vain assertions. I challenge the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] who sat by the disfranchising returning board of Louisiana to meet the proposition. That board was a board which by the electoral commission it was decided had the power to make the ballot and to count the vote or to reject it, when you said that the votes that were intimidated there should have representatives, and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] holds his seat by your vote and countenance here to-day upon the proposition that the returning board of Louisiana had the right to say that men were elected to the Legislature who did not receive a majority but would have received it but for intimidation and for outrage and threatened and committed wrongs upon voters who would have voted.

Now I hope Senators will meet the conclusion which results from these your own statistics showing exactly the same kind of crime committed upon your own people and in the same proportion, for the proportion in Massachusetts and elsewhere per capita, according to the census, is not very greatly different; if at all the advantage is not upon your side.

I have done. As I said before, I have no unkind feeling to any portion of the people of this great country. I honor and respect Massachusetts and her great history, her wonderful development, her great educational privileges, and her wealth. I see that upon that path of human progress and beneficence, which should be the object of all of us, she is making rapid strides to cure whatever may be subject to cure in the evils of a dense population and the unequal accumulation and distribution of wealth; but her Senators are here sustaining a coalition which affirms a constitutional power to do that which Massachusetts denies by her own laws to her own people, a constitutional power to do that which is destructive of the Constitution of the United States and of the States. Your argument as to a constitutional majority and its right and your argument as to your proposed purpose of "a free ballot and a fair count" are neither of them sincere; neither of them is real, neither of them justified by facts, neither of them can be sustained in sound argument.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY in the chair.) The question is on the indefinite postponement of the resolution, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. COKE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PLATT, of New York, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from California, [Mr. FARLEY.]

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST.]

Mr. SAWYER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. CAMDEN.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. PLATT, of Connecticut. I am paired with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. SLATER,] unless my vote should be necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. BURNSIDE. My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.] My colleague, if here, would vote "nay."

Mr. BECK. I am paired on all questions with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 21; as follows:

So the motion to indefinitely postpone the resolution was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. There is a motion pending to postpone the resolution until the first Monday in December next; and, pending that, I desire to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire who made the motion to postpone to December.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.]

Mr. DAWES. Can the Senator make two motions at the same time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Both his motions are pending.

Mr. DAWES. Can he make two motions at the same time while on the floor?

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Tennessee made one motion a month ago, and the other about two minutes ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Tennessee to postpone was pending, and he now makes another motion.

Mr. DAWES. I inferred that he made them both at the same time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not at all.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I desire to say a few words.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is out of order. The question is on the motion for an executive session.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Will the Senator withdraw the motion for a moment?

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly. I withhold the motion if the Senator desires to occupy the floor.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I wish to make a few remarks.

Mr. President, on the 4th of March last the Senate was convened in extraordinary session by the President of the United States. Since that date a controversy has arisen as to the organization of this body. A minority has arrogated to itself the right to control the action of a lawfully constituted majority—a majority recognized by the Constitution. What right has that minority, I demand, to dictate to the majority what their course of action shall be in this body? Are not the majority alone responsible to the people of this nation for whatever course they deem it advisable to pursue here? They are fully competent to take charge of their own affairs without the guardianship of the democratic party. I will tell you, gentlemen, in plain language what you are doing, for it requires no rhetorical metaphor or the weaving of fine poetical sentences to enable the intelligent and patriotic people of this country to understand you. It is simply a repetition, in a different form, of the shot-gun policy of intimidation, the so-called "Mississippi plan," which has proved so successful in most of the States south of Mason and Dixon's line. You want to inaugurate the same policy in the Senate of the United States. I do not believe that the people of the country will consent to it. It is simply another effort to revolutionize all parliamentary precedents to accomplish through political maneuvers that which you failed to do by precipitating this nation into a bloody war which cost it thousands of millions of dollars and many thousand lives of brave, noble men. Look at the crippled soldier as he hobbles along on his crutches; behold the empty sleeve of the heroic man who raised his arm in defense of the grandest nation the world ever saw; see the poor widows and orphans and the desolate homes caused by the same revolutionary proceedings that you are endeavoring to re-enact to-day.

Mr. President, if the gentlemen on the other side want the South to be prosperous, they must cease this mode of warfare. The South will never rise to a higher plane than that which it occupies now as long as this condition of things is permitted to go on. As long as intimidation and social ostracism are allowed to prevail there, it cannot expect to be respected. The Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN,] whom I admire so much, not only on account of his great ability and learning but on account of his frankness, amiability, and kindness, said in his speech on Thursday last that—

> The freedom of the government means the freedom of the governed; when the governed are free the people must govern themselves, and to do this they must be relatively and proportionately equal in the rights, powers, and privileges which the government is ordained to establish and protect.

I join hands with the honorable Senator in that doctrine; but let me inform my worthy friend that no such condition of things exists at the South; the governed are not "free," neither are they relatively and proportionately equal in their rights, powers, and privileges. If that were the true state of affairs, I should not for my part utter one word of complaint; but it is not. Intimidation and social ostracism do exist in the South, and as long as that is the case it cannot be prosperous. These curses must be eradicated and, in their stead, intelligence and labor, and the outgrowth of labor which is prosperity, must be encouraged and not discouraged.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] on the 7th instant is reported in the RECORD as having spoken as follows:

> Gentlemen, you talk about ostracism. There has not been ostracism except in cases where a man countenanced and upheld such wicked crimes, and then not because of his political opinions or his party relations, but because he was particeps criminis to these offenses against good order and public decency, against religion and good morals.

I have heard that same declaration made more than once on this floor. With all the assertions that no social ostracism exists at the South, I declare here most emphatically that it does exist; that pure-hearted, honest, faithful, intelligent, and learned men are to-day anxious to leave the South and to go North because they are ostracised. As evidence of what I say I will read a short extract from a letter which I received a few days ago from a gentleman now residing in Richmond, who was a classmate of mine at college and for whose reputation for veracity and probity I can personally vouch. As he has not given me the liberty of making public the contents of his letter, I shall withhold his name:

> If I cannot bother an old Princetonian and classmate, I do not know who I can. My partner (whom I brought up in my office) and I have determined in the summer to go to New York City to practice law. * * * I'm sick of Virginia. I've felt for some time that I was wasting my time here, tho' I've made a support and brought up my family purely by my brain alone since the war. I'll leave Richmond with regret, for it is a delightful place of residence and I've many warm friends here, but at my time of life I can't afford to stay. The Virginians are a pleasant but peculiar people. They look on me (a Marylander) as a carpet-bagger, an intruder, and think I've no right to make money here, and if they can prevent it they'll not let me.

As I have before remarked, you deny that social ostracism exists at the South. I have given you one instance, and that instance was of a southern man by birth. I have no doubt that many similar cases exist. You need not go to Virginia or to any other Southern State to seek proof of that fact. We have it right here in our midst—it is in this Senate. Is not the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] ostracized by the democratic side of this body? Dare you deny his courage? Dare you refer to his past record? Dare you speak of him as a man not fit to associate with honorable Senators? Is he not your peer as he is ours? I ask you that question and give you time to reflect. Has it not been announced by one of their spokesmen that they will not even pair with him? Has he not been openly insulted day after day by that side? They have unblushingly boasted that not a democrat shall pair with him. They do not recognize him as a friend and brother Senator, and why? Because he has had the manhood to tell them that he dissented from their political opinions; because he has dared to tell them that he will act according to his own convictions and conscience, and not be dictated to by any one; because he had the hardihood to stand up and assert his rights as a freeman on the floor of the American Senate. For this offense you refuse to extend to him the courtesy that one gentleman extends to another. What is this but ostracism?

Gentlemen, these are stubborn facts that cannot be contradicted. The conclusion is evident that if it exists here in the highest tribunal in the land, it certainly does exist at the South.

Now, my democratic friends, I beg you to stop in your mad career and pause for an instant—pause before it is too late to retrace your steps. I beseech you to desist your filibustering tactics and to act like brave men, and allow the majority to do that which in its judgment shall be deemed best for the interests of the whole country and for which it alone is responsible. I beg you to act in harmony and peace with us and assist us to make this country not a little paltry body of subordinate States but to make it a nation that will command the respect and admiration of the civilized world. We want to make this a great nation; we want to make the South as prosperous as the North; but before we can accomplish that great end we must bury forever that which will destroy the best country that ever existed—ostracism, jealousy, and sectionalism.

Mr. HARRIS. I renew my motion for an executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The "noes" seem to have it.

Mr. HARRIS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, (at four o'clock p. m.) Pending that motion, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when Mr. ANTHONY's name was called.) On this question my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. COKE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.] I should vote "yea" if he were here.

Mr. SAWYER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. CAMDEN.]

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Bayard,	George,	Johnston,	Pendleton,
Brown,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Call,	Groome,	Lamar,	Saulsbury,

Davis of Illinois,	Jones of Florida,	Rollins,	Williams.
Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,
Fair,	Kellogg,	Sawyer,
Farley,	McDill,	Sherman,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. JACKSON] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. MCDILL.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. PLATT, of New York. I am paired with the Senator from California, [Mr. FARLEY.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. PLATT, of Connecticut. I desire to announce my pair with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. SLATER.]

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Harris,	Pendleton,
Brown,	George,	Johnston,	Pugh,
Call,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Ransom,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, April 20, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] providing for the election of certain officers of the Senate, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to postpone the resolution until the first Monday in December next, on which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to postpone the resolution until the second Monday in December next, and on that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to say a word or two. I believe the motion is debatable.

Some days ago, in a debate with the Senators from Mississippi, I took occasion to make a statement in reference to a gentleman who had passed through this city on his way to Massachusetts, and who had encountered trouble in Mississippi. I made it at some length; and the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] expressed great indignation that such a grievous charge should have been brought against any portion of his State, and was sure that nothing of that kind had happened in his State. The Massachusetts papers received this morning bring for the first time the statement of this man himself. While it corroborates everything else which I said in reference to the matter, it does not corroborate my statement that the events transpired in Mississippi; they transpired in the parish of Caldwell, Louisiana, on the other side of the river. I am very glad to make this correction. I intimated at the time that if I found myself in error in any matter pertaining to the case I would make haste to make the correction. This is my first knowledge, when the papers came this morning, except a telegraphic statement in the New York papers of yesterday, that I had mistaken the locality. I held in my hand, as I stated then, a paper telling me where this occurred. It was furnished me by one of my colleagues in the other branch, who was personally acquainted with this gentleman before he went South, with whom he had had an interview the night before, and who had by appointment with me agreed to relate these occurrences to me the next morning, but was obliged to leave in the cars, and I failed to see him personally, though I took the statement of my colleague, who I have not the slightest doubt was entirely sincere. He furnished me while I was on the floor the paper which I then had, and which I now have, in which he stated the gentleman's name to be "Charles Heath, of Malden, Massachusetts, Caldwell Parish, Mississippi." He was entirely honest in his statement, and I feel it is due to myself to state that in the debate with the Senator from Mississippi I supposed I could speak with entire confidence that these things transpired in Mississippi.

The story of this gentleman so corroborates everything that I have stated with this exception, that I desire as a part of my remarks to have it printed in the RECORD. I would not take up the time of the Senate in having it read at the Clerk's desk, because it is long. If there is no objection I should like to have it as a part of my remarks embodied in the RECORD, and then any Senators may see it and comment upon it as they please.

I take great pleasure, so far as I am able to do it, in making the reparation to the Senator from Mississippi which this correction requires at my hands. I certainly should not have brought this charge against the State of Mississippi if I did not believe that it properly belonged there.

The facts, however, as detailed are a serious matter, deserving the candid and fair consideration of those Senators who represent that condition of society which is described in this communication. That they are surrounded with difficulties, as has been suggested here, no Senator can doubt for a moment; and I hope they may understand us at the North to appreciate those difficulties, and to ask nothing more at their hands than to invoke an earnest and honest effort (I do not mean to say by that that I doubt their disposition to do it) to restore order and respect for law and life and property in the communities in which they live. It affects the whole United States as well as those communities. It is a serious drawback not only to the growth and development of the States themselves but to that general prosperity and peace and good-will and respect for the laws of the land so essential to the continuance of our institutions.

If there be no objection I will ask that this communication be embodied as a part of my remarks in the RECORD. I will have it read if that is preferred. I only ask to have it appear in the RECORD.

Mr. JONAS. I ask to have it read.

Mr. DAWES. Very well; let it be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

"The Fool's Errand"—A northern man as a southern planter—The recent assertions of Senator Dawes confirmed—Statement of Mr. Charles Heath, to whose case he referred—The northerner's practical efforts and the reception they met—A graphic story of "bulldozing" and interference.

The northern man who has for a number of years been running a plantation in Louisiana, and whose property there was recently burned by an incendiary fire, whose case was lately referred to by Senator DAWES in the Senate debate, is Mr. Charles Heath, at present in Malden. Below is a graphic statement furnished by Mr. Heath in regard to his individual experiences, culminating in the destruction of his property, and to the general condition of society in the district in which he was located. His plantation was in Caldwell Parish, of which Columbia is the parish seat. It is on the Ouachita River, forty miles below Monroe and ten miles below Columbia. The plantation contained between nine hundred and one thousand acres. Mr. Heath and his brother, who is a New Orleans merchant, bought the place thirteen or fourteen years ago, and had established upon it a gin-house, grist-mill, and repair shop, fitted up with improved machinery. For several years they ran the place under a white overseer, and were not seriously interfered with by their neighbors. The first difficulty that occurred there, says Mr. Heath, was along in 1877 or 1878, and was on account of a decision we came to that we would not employ white men as overseers, as we had done in previous years. We had found by experience that we could not use them to advantage. They would quarrel with the hands and ruin my prospects each year. I could not make a crop with an overseer; the negroes felt that they were free, and they were not willing to be ruled by a white man as they had been in slave times. We had worked in almost every way, and we had come to the conclusion that the only way to get the negroes to work was to give them an equal chance with ourselves, and hold up the picture of a future homestead before them—something that they might work for. Well, when we told them that we would sell them a piece of land when they should convince us that they were capable of managing for themselves, and were making a reasonable effort to make a living and pay for their land, the white people got hold of the idea, and they said it should not be done. The sheriff of the parish came to me and my brother and said something like this: "We understand you are to divide up your land among the niggers, for them to work it without a white overseer. The niggers are stealing everything they can lay their hands on in the way of stock, even when they have a white man to oversee them, and what will they do if left to themselves? The white people are not going to let you do it. We cannot afford to do it, and you cannot afford to do it, and we don't mean that you shall start out in that way." Well, we didn't say to him what we would do. We said to him like this: "This place belongs to us; we have paid for it; we don't owe our hands a dollar, and don't owe anybody a dollar in the parish." We had about eleven families on the plantation. I suppose we must have had fifty or sixty working hands, perhaps seventy. Taking men, women, and children, I think there were about one hundred. We said: "We don't feel that you have any right to come here and dictate to us how we shall pay our hands, what inducement we shall offer them to work for us, as long as we pay our taxes and don't violate the laws of the State in any way. The negroes know they are free, and they want to work for us, and we want their work, and we are willing to pay them all we agree, and give them a fair share of the profits." "Well," he says, "it is no use in talking with me, for the people won't permit you to do this thing." "Well," I said to him, "I don't intend that the people shall dictate to me how I shall settle with my help or how I shall work them—whether I shall keep a white overseer or let them oversee themselves. If any of the negroes on my place are caught stealing stock or doing any other unlawful act I will go just as far as you will in bringing them to justice and punishing them according to the laws of your State, but until they do some act of that kind I think that you have no right to dictate to me or to them how we shall transact our business;" and we left it there. But before this, while we were discussing this plan of dividing the land among the hands and dispensing with an overseer, a Mr. Fielder, my overseer, with whom my contract had about expired, caught up and hitched in the yard one night every horse and mule on the place. In the morning he got up with great bluster, and said the mules were all stolen. He got a couple of the neighbors to go with him, and they tracked the mules over towards Franklin Parish across Deaf River, and finally gave up the chase and came down to New Orleans, and told me that if I would offer a reward of $75 or $80 apiece for the mules, about what it would cost to buy new teams, he thought he could bring the mules back. This, together with the fact that Mr. Fielder had tied up the mules the night before they were stolen, instead of letting them run loose, as was customary, caused me to suspect that he was connected with the men who had stolen them. That transaction led to my arming all the negroes on the place and employing a colored man named Harris, who went up from New Orleans to work a portion of the place and look after my interests there.

We went on quietly and furnished Harris with his supplies, and he installed himself at the plantation. One day, about this time of the year, a man came over to the plantation. He said he was one of the Franklin boys, but the negro knew him, and knew that he was boarding with one of my neighbors, Mr. Blanks, and, indeed, he was on one of Mr. Blanks's horses when he came up. He told Harris he was from Franklin Parish, "one of the Franklin boys," and that he had been detailed to come over and see what the negroes on the place were doing. "Why don't you, instead of working for this man Heath," he said, "find an honest man to work for?" "Who is an honest man?" asked Harris. "Why, this man Banks down here," he says, "I believe that is his name." "Blanks, you mean," said Harris. "Yes," says he "Blanks"—he was boarding with Blanks and knew his name just as well as the negro did—"or Mr. Sisemore, the sheriff, he is an honest man, or Mr. Wade," naming over several of the neighbors. "We are going to break up this place; we ain't going to allow no Yankee to run a place here with negroes without an overseer." He wound up by saying, "Now take the advice of a damned fool, and get out of here as quick as possible, for if you remain here you will be killed"—something to that effect. As he said this Harris supposed the man was going to assassinate him then, and took up his gun to defend himself, but the fellow rode off and that was the end of that. Shortly after that Harris came down to New Orleans to see me and get his supplies. He didn't think much of the threat because he had been threatened before; but when he saw me he related the conversation in substance as I have given it to you. I took him around to Governor Warmoth to let him make his statement to him. Well, Warmoth said, "I don't know, Mr. Heath, that I can do anything to protect him; I have no military, and if I had it would take the whole State to defend all these cases that we have. I wish you would go and see Mr. Morgan"—that was Judge Morgan, who was, I think, the district or State attorney then—"and let him state his case to him." So we went around to Mr. Morgan's office and Harris told his story again. Mr. Morgan said, "I don't see what you can do, Mr. Heath. I don't see how you can make an action lay. This man hasn't committed any trespass, any act of violence." I replied, "I don't know what you can do here, but in Massachusetts if a man should go on to another's place and make such threats as that to do violence he would be put under heavy bonds." "Well," said he, "we can do that here, but if you should do it you would have everybody in the country down on you, and then they would upset you, probably." Said he, "I would let the fellow go back and go to work; I don't believe a man who is going to do any mischief would make such bold threats as he has made." I replied, "I don't want to advise the man to go back; I don't know what they will do; I only know what they say they will do, and if they do half as bad as they say they will, I would not send him back for anything. I will tell you what I have a mind to do: I have a mind to get Mr. Harris and each of them a double-barreled shot-gun and a sack of buckshot and a keg of powder, and instruct them to put two men in the mule-lot to watch the mules nights, and that each one go well armed, and if any one comes to drive away their mules or molest them in their cabins, first ask them to go away, but not to let them enter, and if they then persist in breaking into the mule-lot or their cabins, to take good aim and mark them so they will know them when they meet them again." "Well," said Mr. Morgan, "that is good advice; that is just what I should recommend; every man's cabin is his castle, and he has a perfect right to do that, and the laws of our State would justify it." The negro expressed his willingness to go back, and I bought him his supplies, $300 or $400 worth, and he took the boat and went back on to the place. He got back Tuesday morning and landed his supplies at Hogan's landing. He didn't have time to get much of it home that night. Between ten and twelve o'clock that night a party of men on horseback, masked, both men and horses, went to the cabin and called Harris out. Harris asked who was there, and the man replied, "William Faulkner." Faulkner was a colored Baptist minister, who lived four or five miles below on Colonel Faulkner's place. Harris was expecting a call from him about some business, and supposed he had been to Columbia and was on his way back. So he got out of bed and stepped to the door of the cabin. As he stepped out the man said, "Harris, is that you?" Harris then knew by the voice that it was not Faulkner, and sprang back into the cabin. At that instant the man fired, and the shot broke Harris's arm in two or three places and two of his ribs, and he fell, as he supposed, mortally wounded. The men then poured kerosene on the corn crib which adjoined the cabin and set fire to it. They then rode through the colored settlement, yelling like so many Indians, and discharging their revolvers into the cabins as they rode by. There were about a dozen of these masked men and horses. As soon as the negroes dared, they went to Harris and bound up his arm, and laid him on his bed. There were three or four physicians at Columbia, three at least, and, although they were sent for, not one of them would come to attend to Harris, and he laid from Tuesday night till the next Saturday morning without medical attendance. He was then put on a boat and sent to New Orleans, four hundred miles away, and I took him to the Charity hospital. He lived, but is a cripple. He has been before the congressional investigating committee. After the attempted murder of Harris a notice was posted up on the plantation which read something like this:

> "All the people of this plantation, both colored and white, are notified to get off before Saturday night next. For all that remain here will be dealt out something to which that which is dealt out to Harris is not a circumstance. So get out of here if you want to live, both black and white."

On the reverse side was written:

> "Particularly Old Gould."

Gould was a white man. The whole was embellished with the skull and cross bones, and was signed "K. K. K."

This was the beginning of my troubles. I was frequently threatened with death and destruction of my property. Two years ago a man came to me to get me to gin some cotton for him, and because I would not let him take his cotton away without paying for it he threatened to kill me. He said I should never get out of the parish alive. Three or four years ago a report came to me of a plan to burn me out, arranged by a young man who had appeared to be a personal friend of mine. I had done him a favor, and he had wanted me to employ him on my place. He was coming down from Columbia one night in company with a friend of his and mine, and when he passed my place he said to his companion: "There is a nest that ought to be cleaned out, and I am going to propose to you to come here some night and touch off the whole shebang and clean them out. We want to get rid of this concern. I want you to go with me and keep watch, and I will take a can of kerosene oil and go into the building and I will touch it off, and I won't ask you to do anything only to stand watch." Well, his companion, who had had a good many favors of me first and last, and wanted to get into my good graces so that he might stand a chance of being overseer if I ever wanted one, went up to Columbia and told the whole story to Dr. Squires. Dr. Squires felt a little friendly to me because he had considerable practice on the place, and I had helped him collect some of his bills, and he came down to the plantation and saw a man who married a former servant of his and told him to let his daughter Sally, who had attended the school I had started there and learned to write, to write me a letter and tell me of the project which was on foot. As soon as I got the letter I telegraphed to New Orleans and got an insurance effected, but before the young man could carry into effect his project he was taken sick, and died about the time he proposed to burn these buildings up.

One of my neighbors, an elderly man, who is one of the best farmers in the parish and who I had thought was tolerably friendly to me, once harbored a half dozen men, who were detailed to come over from Franklin and waylay me, for over a week. I got word of their being there through the negroes, but I thought it was a sort of scare to drive me away from my place. The negroes have a wonderful way of getting hold of these things, and if there was any mischief brewing they would generally come and tell me of it. The man himself afterward told of it, thus corroborating the statement of the negroes.

Now I will come down to this present winter's trouble. I got along pretty well; I had no particular opposition till about Christmas time. Just before Christmas a man came there, the same man that threatened to kill me, Nathan Davis, and told my superintendent, Mr. Fersing, something like this: "I always considered you a nice, honorable man, but now I believe you are just as big a scoundrel as Heath. You have got to get away from here, this whole place has got to be cleaned out." We got through Christmas day all right. Christmas night, about midnight, I was awakened by the cackling of the fowl in the chicken-house, and on opening the shutter of my room I saw that the whole place was in a blaze. My whole establishment was burned up. The negroes saw the fire when it was no bigger than a bushel basket, but they did not dare to come out, because they were afraid they would be shot. The whites all appeared to be friendly to me when they met me. Last year a young man from Boston went up to the place with me to look it over, with a view to buying me out. He represented himself to the people there as being a native Louisianian. They welcomed him very kindly and said, "We are glad you are coming here to take Mr. Heath's place. Mr. Heath is a good man, we don't have anything against him, he is a good man enough, but he is a damned Yankee; we don't want that kind here, we want our native men."

I had been for some time trying to effect a sale and get out of the country as easy as possible. While the neighbors showed no enmity to my face, always treating me with the greatest apparent respect and friendship, they were at the same time exhibiting the greatest enmity behind my back. I had had interviews with one or two parties about selling out, and I would have sold out at a very great sacrifice if I could have seen a shadow of a chance to get any money. I could have sold out fast enough by letting them take my property, taking back a mortgage and letting them pay for it from the proceeds as fast as they could earn it. In the West, or New England, one would not hazard much in letting a good, clever man take a place in that way, but the difficulty there is that you take a place of that kind, equipped as that was with the very best of machinery for doing business, perhaps one of the best equipped places in the whole State, and let one of these men take it and he would run it two or three years and baffle you in law till he had made something off it, and then throw it back on your hands in a depreciated condition. I was holding off and trying to find somebody that had some money. When they burnt me out I had no place to stay, and I had to get out then. We had about forty-two hundred dollars insurance. I have nothing left there but a half dozen pair of mules and the land. The whole place with improvements was worth $25,000. They burnt up my tools, wagons, grist-mill, blacksmith shop, repair shop—everything clean. I got out about four hundred or five hundred dollars' worth of goods in about twenty minutes we had to work in, and we came within an ace of being burned up alive. The only thing that saved us was that the wind blew the flames away from the building in which we were sleeping.

Now, why they should want to injure me was more than I could divine, for I felt that I ought to be considered a benefactor rather than an enemy to the parish. I put in the very best machinery into my place that there was in that whole country for ginning cotton and doing the work there was to be done there. There was not another as good a grist-mill within forty miles of us. I carried from Boston a nice set of French buhr-stones, and put in steam-power and ground for everybody. I used to grind seventy-five or a hundred bushels a week there for my own hands and anybody else that came. They would come from half-way across to Red River, a distance of forty miles, to mill. Now they have burned the place up, there are no mills that can make as good meal as we could. There are a few little horse-mills that will grind corn not as fine as you do your horse-feed here, and they have to get along with that. Then I had a public gin. I had teams, I had wagons, strong and new. I could send out and haul in any man's crops. If a man raised a crop of cotton within five or six miles of my place and wanted a team to haul it in, I could take my team and haul it cheaper than he could himself. Instead of charging $5 a bale, which used to be the price for ginning cotton, I put the price down to $3; and then to make it easier for the negroes or white people, any of them, I would let them come in and do the work, I furnishing the machinery and power and charge them only $2 a bale. That gave them good pay for their labor in ginning. I thought by doing that kind of business, and letting them have the use of my machinery, it would make them friendly to me, but it didn't seem to do it. The negroes said to me when I left: "Mr. Heath, while your loss is a big one, it is nothing compared to ours. We are left here with none of the improvements which have made our labor valuable to us."

The murders are not confined to negroes and new-comers. A man that will murder me will murder his neighbor if he falls out with him. To show the state of society there I will relate several affairs that have taken place there as reported to me. Some seven or eight years ago a man by the name of Cain, a Baptist minister, and the son of a deacon, gave currency to some report derogatory to a sister of three brothers named Duke. Two of the brothers with a neighbor called upon the minister for satisfaction. They found him splitting rails in the woods and some loud talk ensued. The father, who was a little ways off, heard the talk, and, taking his double-barrel shot-gun—everybody in that country carries a double-barrel shot-gun with them when they go out—came down to where the son was. When the old man came up to the son he listened a moment and then said: "My son, say what you please to these men, but don't you take back anything." The young man said: "Pa, if I do the talking you will have to do the shooting." The old man says: "I will do that if it is necessary." One of the Dukes replied: "Shoot and be damned." The old man leveled his gun and shot him right through the heart. He dropped. His brother, not being armed, ran up to this one that fell and tried to draw a revolver out of his belt, and the old man shot him through the shoulders and commenced reloading his gun. The third man jumped on to his horse and rode away. The old man gave himself up after a few days and was put into an iron cell in the parish jail. A week or ten days after the jail was set on fire and the old man was burned alive. These men were all southern-born.

A man named Fife and his son-in-law went up to Columbia one Christmas day, two or three years ago, as everybody in the parish almost does on holidays, to celebrate. They had a few drinks, and finally went into a saloon. The proprietor gave Fife his left hand, and Fife was very anxious to know why he did that, and persisted in demanding an answer. The proprietor went into the house and got a revolver, and then came back and said to Fife: "Now you get away from here; I don't want any more of your fooling around." But the old man was one of those kind who didn't care very much for a revolver even when he was sober, and less when he was in liquor. His son was afraid he would get shot and tried to get him away, but the saloon-keeper drew his revolver and shot the young man. After he was wounded the young man drew his pistol, and shot the saloon-keeper. This was a signal for the boys, and fifteen or twenty of them joined in what they afterwards called a "Christmas frolic." It resulted in the death of the old man's son-in-law, who was shot in twenty places, and his son, and the old man himself was shot through the shoulder. He was not so badly wounded, however, but that he put the dead body of his son and his mortally wounded son-in-law into an ox-cart, and drove sixteen miles home with them that night. That was another of the little affairs that occurred there. A young man was shot there last fall as the result of a little quarrel. He was confined to the house for several weeks, and when he got out he came over to my place to sell his stock. He said, "I haven't got anybody to stand back of me," as the expression is down there; "no father, no brother, nobody to avenge my death, and I will be killed if I stay here; so I have got to go away." He was said to be one of the most inoffensive young men in the parish. He had to leave his home, and go away.

I will repeat one more short story, out of which I got an expression of the district attorney that is worth something. Two years ago I furnished a man off my place, which was an unusual thing for me to do, about sixty dollars' worth of supplies—shoes, clothing, &c., such as he needed—a colored man by the name of Compare. He said: "Mr. Heath, when you come up next fall I am going to fetch my cotton to your place to gin, and out of my cotton I will pay you whatever you let me have." A few days after I returned he came over to see me. He said, "I have got my cotton picked, and I would like to have a pair of shoes for myself and a dress for my wife," &c., amounting to about eleven dollars; "and," said he, "if you will let me have them I will weigh my cotton right to you and let you have enough to pay you." It took 3,500 pounds of seed-cotton to pay his bill. He weighed it out and left it in one of his little buildings for me, and says: "Now, Mr. Heath, I want you the first of the week to send over and get your cotton, and then send and get the balance of my cotton and gin it out for me, and take your pay out of the cotton for ginning." He left my place about four o'clock in the afternoon, and went up the road to a blacksmith's shop, and got to playing cards there with two or three others. While they were playing, along about eleven o'clock, somebody rattled at the door as though they wanted to get in. Any little disturbance like that will frighten a negro about as bad as anything you can think of. Compare, who was a young, active man, very strong, got up and said: "I reckon it's nobody who wants to do me any harm; I'm not afraid to go to the door." He started to go toward the door, and a charge of buckshot through the window struck him in the temple and killed him—almost blew the top of his head off. When anything of that sort occurred among the negroes of course their first resort was to run to my place and tell me of it. So the blacksmith, Charley Hamilton, and a fellow by the name of Mattox came down to my place about midnight. My practice was not to let anybody into the house unless I knew who it was and what they wanted. He announced his name and I asked him what he wanted. He said that John Compare was shot in his blacksmith's shop—killed—and he wanted to come to tell me about it. I let him in, and asked him if they had any suspicions on anybody. He said no. I told him they had better wait till daylight, and then go right up to Columbia and inform the people there of the facts, and ask them to come down and hold an inquest. He did so. We waited all day Sunday, and no one came down. Monday morning we went up again, and we waited till Monday evening, and nobody came down to hold an inquest or make inquiry, and we then went to work and buried him. The next day, Tuesday, I went over to look after my cotton, and his wife told me that a Mr. Davis had sent over for the cotton and hauled it all off. In the course of a week, or such a matter, I went up to town and called on Mr. Davis, and told him that I understood that he had taken my cotton from John Compare's. He said, "Mr. Heath, what are you going to do about it?" Said I, "Mr. Davis, I didn't think it would be necessary to do anything more than to tell you the facts, and you would release it." "Well," said he, "I think you and I can have just as pretty a fight over that, if you want to fight over it, as the next two men." This was a young man, twenty-five or twenty-eight years old. Said I, "Mr. Davis, I am not a fighting man, and I don't propose to make a fight over a bale of cotton; but I suppose that you are aware that a man who commits a trespass of the kind that you have becomes liable for all the debts that that man owes?" "Well," said he, with an oath, "what are you going to do about it? I have got the cotton." Well, I went to Mr. Ware, who is now district attorney—he was not then—and I told Ware about it, and asked him what I could do. "Mr. Davis has got about sixty or seventy dollars' worth of my cotton, and what shall I do about it?" "Well," said he, "Mr. Heath, you had better pocket your loss; you can't do anything about it. What you say about his trespass rendering him liable for all the debts the man owed is true. He has committed a criminal offense, and in the first place, in order to avail yourself of any redress, you would have to fetch him before the grand jury, and if they found a bill against him, then you could prosecute him; but you couldn't get a grand jury that would find a bill against him. You don't stand very well in the community here yourself, did you know that?" Said I, "I think I do know it, and will you please tell me why it is that I don't stand well here?" "Well," said he, "I don't know; they don't seem to relish having you come here and trade with the negroes, and so forth." "Well," said I, "I think I have a right here; I own my place; I don't meddle with anybody else's business; why should they meddle with me?" "Well," said he, "They have got kind of down on you, that is the substance of it."

I never knew of a prosecution of any kind that amounted to anything on account of the murders committed there. I think it is because the people themselves are afraid of the consequences of interfering. The very man whose son, I have been told, was engaged in taking my mules, was convicted two or three years ago for hog-stealing, and after he had been convicted a couple of neighbors, young men, made a remark like this: "Since Dan Wade has been convicted of hog-stealing and sentenced to the jail, our sows can have pigs and we can get them." One of the other Wade boys, (there were three of them,) when the remark came to his ears, said in reply: "My brother Daniel is no more of a hog-thief than they"—the men who made the remark. It went back to them, and then there was a fight right square off. They met him about four o'clock one afternoon, just across the river from Columbia, and told him he must take it back and apologize. He said he would not do it, and then each of them, as report has it, emptied a barrel of buckshot into him, and he fell, groaning and gasping for breath. The men started off, but turned back and discharged the other two barrels of their guns into him. They then rode home. The next day they went over to Columbia and arranged their business with their merchants there and made over their crops, and after getting all their business fixed up put out. The sheriff, after they had been gone long enough to get out of the way, started in pursuit. He came down to my place and went as far as the river, asking everybody if they had seen them, but nobody knew anything about them. Finally, the chase was given up. About a year afterward they came back and asked for a trial, but for some reason they were not tried, and were bound over in $5,000 bonds each. They went right into town and the merchants signed their bond—I guess every one they asked—and they waited till the next year for the trial. The next year the case came up again, but no witness appeared against them and the thing was dropped. That was the end of that. That is the only case I have heard of where there was any approach to a trial. The trouble is, in all these courts, to get a grand jury that will find a bill, unless the man charged with crime is a colored man. If a colored man does anything, they will find a bill against him and send him to the penitentiary. They have the penitentiary full of colored men, and they let them out to the planters to work; but if there is any charge against a white man, unless it is some poor fellow that hasn't any money, he will be pretty likely to get off without a sentence. That is about the way the thing is in Caldwell Parish, and what is true of that particular place is true of the other parishes.

When the investigating committees of Congress have been down there they have not got at half the facts. You take a negro off my place quietly, and he will tell you about the outrages there, and put it a good deal stronger than I do, because he has been there all the time; but you go to New Orleans and send up there for these men and bring them down, and they know their statement is going to be published, and you could not get the facts out of them, because they know they would not live twenty-four hours after they got back into the parish if they told what they knew. You ask them if they have the privilege of voting as they wish, and they would say yes; but if you were behind the door, and they were talking to me, they would tell me all sorts of bulldozing stories, because they know that what they say to me is in confidence and would not be used to injure them. The officers of my precinct, ward 7, Caldwell Parish, urged me very strong at the last election to go down and register and vote. I told them no; that if I went I should vote against them, and it would not amount to anything; but I said, "If you will let the negroes vote as they have a right to vote, that is all I ask." The result of the ballot was 67 or 68 republican and 11 or 12 democratic votes. I suppose they thought I would tell of it when I got home. But when it came to the other wards, which were quite as strongly republican as ward 7, with the exception of in Columbia, there was scarcely a republican vote thrown. One of the negroes from the place above me was down to my plantation the day after the election, and he said: "Mr. Heath, they had a death-list at the polls up there, and the name of all the negroes who voted the republican ticket were to be registered on that death-list, and we were to be shot or assaulted on our way home. I made up my mind that if I could not vote as I wanted to I would not vote at all, and so I went home, and the others did too." I have no doubt a white man, a native born, can go to the polls there and vote the republican ticket without being maltreated, but I don't believe the negroes can.

I shall go back to New Orleans this fall. I have business there and some real estate. I probably shall not go on to the plantation again more than to look after my mules and rents. The negroes who are on the plantation now pay me a very moderate rent for the land and mules, and are getting what they can for the products of their labor. They are trading with the merchants at Columbia. The trouble is that the native southerners are envious toward anybody that comes into their neighborhood, particularly a northern man who is opposed to the solid South. They knew what my politics were, although I never have talked politics there or advised the negroes, beyond telling them what I thought was for their interest. I never advised them who to vote for and who not to vote for, and tried to keep aloof from politics altogether. A few days before I came away the district attorney of Caldwell Parish was in New Orleans, and I took the trouble to hunt him up, and had a long talk with him. I said to him, "Mr. Ware, you cannot afford to have me burned out and driven out of your parish without taking some notice of it." "Well," he said, "I think likely our folks will notice it." This was a month after the fire and more, and nothing has been done. I said to him, "I have got a letter that I received last summer from the post-office just above me, Hogan's Landing, telling me if I returned to the parish they would pay me a visit. I am going to mail you that letter, and you may make such use of it as you think proper." I told him if he would advise the parish to offer a reward of one, two, or five hundred dollars that I would offer as much more to thoroughly investigate this thing. I have made no secret of these matters in New Orleans, but have told them openly. No allusion has been made to the fire in any southern newspaper that I have seen. Whenever a negro is murdered up there in my parish they take no more notice of it than though it was a dog shot. They don't even hold an inquest. They don't give publicity to anything of this kind. When a public man like Judge Crawford is shot everybody finds that out; but if I was to be killed they would be as whist as mice. It would never be known outside the parish unless my brother or somebody that was interested should tell of it.

Caldwell Parish is located between the Mississippi and Red Rivers. Very often my friends in New Orleans, some of whom are strong democrats, would say: "Mr. Heath, you have got into the worst part of our State." Well, I would tell them, "I hope I have, but I hear the reports from the other parishes, and they seem to be about like the place I am in." There are not many northern men there. There are some in the country above my place, but they are all good democrats. There is no objection to them if they go for the solid South. But a man who will not go for the solid South had better keep away from there. My brother went to New Orleans in 1848. He was appointed mayor of the city under General Sheridan. When General Sheridan went there he cast about for somebody that hadn't anything to do with politics; that was not a politician. My brother had been there for a good many years as a merchant, and never had been identified with politics at all, and General Sheridan pitched upon him and appointed him mayor of the city. I don't want to do any injustice to the southern people, but I want the facts to be known. I met one of the most prominent lawyers of New Orleans down at Poland Springs last summer, and as we were sitting out on the piazza, looking over the surrounding towns clustering in the valleys, he said, "Mr. Heath, I have been thinking what a beautiful country we have down there in Louisiana, and how, if we had these people down there, they would make it the finest State in the Union in ten or fifteen years." I said, "That is so." "Now," said he, "you ought to talk this thing among your people here. You are acquainted with them; you have been down into our country and know how rich the land is and all that sort of thing." "Yes," said I, "but there is one drawback; they may ask me how I have succeeded, and if I should tell them how I had got along and been treated there, how many of them do you think would leave their quiet homes here? It is just as you say; the land is as fertile as the sun ever shone upon, but what of the people?" "Well," he said, "you are in the worst part of the State." "That may be so," I replied, "but if all I hear from the other parishes is true, where is there a better?" And I mentioned to him the other parishes, and recited the murders that had been committed in Franklin, in Saint Mary's Parish—one a few years ago, when a Government officer there was shot, and his wife was obliged to sit and watch over her dead husband's body for twenty-four hours, and not a lady in the town came in to sympathize with her or offer her any assistance in any way. "Now," said I, "who would want to move into such a place?" "Well," said he, "they must go in colonies, then." Said I: "Now I will tell you how you can do something; you can advise the people of Louisiana, the better class of people, as you call them, instead of harboring these outlaws and murderers, to endeavor to do something to bring them to justice. But as long as they wink at crime and do not prosecute the criminals, and say they will not meddle with them because they fear their vengeance, you cannot expect that your State will grow and prosper."—Boston Daily Advertiser, April 19, 1881.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. President, I asked to have that article read because I had not seen it and because I had understood from the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts that he had transferred the scene of his cock-and-bull story from Mississippi to Louisiana. Perhaps it may be hereafter located in Texas or transferred to Alabama or Georgia, and go on perambulating through the whole South in case its statements or misstatements may find denial and contradiction from the various localities.

I am unable at present to answer, of course, the allegations made in that article so far as this person's alleged loss and damage to property is concerned. I can only say that I hear of it to-day for the first time, and that his statement is entirely untrue when he says any such circumstances could have been suppressed and kept out of the papers in the State of Louisiana. If not published in the democratic press it would have received wide publicity in the independent and the republican press of the city of New Orleans. The outrages of which he speaks, the destruction of his property, could not have occurred in that parish or in any parish in Louisiana without having been thoroughly ventilated and thoroughly understood by the people, and without, if the charges were unfounded, having met with proper contradiction.

But the honorable Senator the other day when he made these charges against the State of Mississippi charged that this man was driven from his home and his property burned because of his political opinions, because he was a republican, because he took part in politics as a republican. Now, there is nothing in the long article which has been read to-day which shows or in which he claims that he has received any persecution whatever on account of his political opinions, or even that he has taken that part in the politics of the country which he was entitled to do and ought to have done as a citizen feeling an interest in good government.

The most of the alleged outrages of which he complains occurred, according to his own statement, over nine years ago, during the time when Warmoth was governor of the State of Louisiana, and Governor Warmoth went out of office in 1873. Therefore it is not a new story which he now for the first time publishes to the world, for much of it he charges occurred years ago when the State of Louisiana from well known causes was in a turbulent condition compared to what it is at present.

His property, he says, was burned during last winter; it was burned, he says, by incendiaries. That may or may not be true. I shall defer an answer to that part of the statement until I am able to obtain information from that parish and hear the other side; but if his property was burned by incendiaries does it follow that it was because of his political opinions? The property of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. ROLLINS,] not now in his seat, was burned the other day by incendiaries, but I presume it was not because of his political opinions. This property may not have been burned by incendiaries at all. Fires are very frequent, especially upon plantations and in villages, when they are not the act of incendiaries; but I reserve any remarks that I may have to make on this point until I shall be able to obtain local information.

The rest of his article is made up of a tissue of charges which he has gained by hearsay, of assassinations, of fights, of outrages, of troubles in that parish, which he has heard from this man, and that man, and the other man, and of none of which he has any personal information. If they were true there is nothing to show that they are other than such as might have occurred in any border or frontier parish or county of any State in this Union; there is nothing to show they had any relation whatever to the political opinions of this gentleman, or any other person.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts has sent up this article and had it read in its entirety; he has made it a part of his speech. I say as a person who knows the people of that parish, and the people of the State, that the greater portion of it is a calumny upon a respectable, reputable, hard-working, intelligent, and industrious people. He has made it a part of his speech; he has published this calumny against the people of Louisiana; and he has indulged in a long homily based upon it, giving advice to those people to change their modes and manners, to profit by this statement which has been made public before the good people of New England, to reform and make their country such that it will be fit to receive emigration from the State represented by the honorable Senator, a State where the people bask in the sunlight of education and morality, where the church and the school-house are open to all alike, and where it is to be supposed all the people of that Commonwealth derive benefit from the benefi cent institutions which it has provided for their education and their moral culture.

Without any intention of saying that what I am about to send to the Clerk's desk and have read as a part of my remarks applies to all the people of Massachusetts, without my intending to charge upon the people of Massachusetts that the crime committed in Massachusetts which is recorded here is a crime at all common to that people or for which that people collectively can be held responsible, I say that whatever crimes may occur arising out of violence, out of intemperance, or out of angry feeling among the people of some portions of my State or the people of the South, no such crime as is here recorded could ever have occurred in the State of Louisiana. I ask the Clerk to read the article, and I make it a part of my remarks.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

FATAL ADVENTURE OF BURGLARIOUS STUDENTS.

LAWRENCE, MASS., April 13.

Early this morning Abiel Wilson, residing on the Salem turnpike, was awakened by footsteps in his house. Soon after his chamber door was burst open by two persons, when Wilson discharged a rifle, shooting one of the intruders. Both fled, but the dead body of the one shot by Wilson was found a short distance from the house, and proved to be that of Arthur Foster, a student at the Phelps Academy. His accomplice was his twin brother Luther, also a student. The latter, after the shooting, appeared and made a full confession. They were residents of North Andover, Massachusetts, and have most respectable connections. Three weeks previously they had attempted to enter the same place.

Further investigation of the crime and its tragic result shows that Arthur Foster was a theological student studying for the ministry, and that upon completing his studies at the Phelps Academy he intended to enter the Andover Theological Seminary. By the confession of the surviving brother it appears that the pair entered and robbed Wilson's place six months ago, securing $1,000 in money and gold watches. Mr. Wilson had in his room some seventy-five thousand dollars' worth of stocks, bonds, and other securities, the property being under no other protection than the owner's rifle. The object of the men was to secure if possible all this booty, intending to resort to violence if necessary to accomplish their end. Both had previously been in Wilson's employ, and had no difficulty in passing the watch-dog on the premises. The dead burglar was only twenty-one years old. It is thought now that other robberies hereabouts were committed by the Fosters.

Mr. JONAS. I desire to say only, in reference to that paragraph, that it records an incident of recent date occurring in the last three weeks, not nine years ago. I desire further to say that no man in Louisiana has ever been known to commit a murder or a robbery for the purpose of procuring the means necessary to obtain a theological education.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] says that very likely the facts stated in the account which has been read at the Clerk's desk may be transferred to other States in the South. I hope he does not mean to say that they are as applicable to other States as they are to Louisiana. I think that is a more serious charge against the condition of society in the other States than anybody has been disposed to make.

So far as the Senator delighted himself with the account of a very sad and deplorable crime committed in Massachusetts, I have no remarks to make. The Senator seeks such food as is acceptable to him. The Senator is delighted with the idea that some newspaper said that the burglar in that case was a theological student. I am sorry that the Senator does not read more extensively; he would have been disabused of that delightful idea, that sweet part of his communication, some time since if he had read all the newspapers. This poor burglar was not a theological student.

I want to call his attention to another distinction between that offense and those related at the Clerk's desk in the paper I sent there to be read. He says that no such offense has ever been recorded about Louisiana. I want him to understand that when men commit such offenses in Massachusetts they are tried and punished for them, and the poor survivor of that burglary is now in jail awaiting a trial, and will be tried fairly before an impartial jury, and there will be no mob that will lynch him. There will be no juries that will refuse to convict him; there will be no officers that will refuse to execute the mandate of the court. He will be tried, and tried fairly. If he has a word to say in his defense, it will be listened to. And when the trial is through, if the jury find that he is guilty, he will be condemned and suffer punishment. When that state of things shall be true in Louisiana it will be all that anybody can ask at their hands.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, being the junior member of this Senate, perhaps a reasonable degree of modesty should have kept me silent during this session—simply a "looker-on in Vienna"; but I find that unexpectedly I am obliged to leave on Saturday next for a protracted absence to attend to some legal business which I accepted when I knew nothing about this session; and there are some things which it seems to me ought to be said that are still unsaid, and therefore I hope the Senate will excuse me, even if it does seem to be a slight breach of modesty on my part.

Some Senator on this side yesterday, in the progress of the discussion, I think it was the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] exhorted the Senators on the other side to be brave men. Now, sir, I have been sitting here looking on, and it seems to me that those words of the Senator from Pennsylvania are mere idle words; they are wasted words. I never saw in all my life, I never read of braver men than are to-day on that side of the Senate Chamber.

Here we are, sir, in this extra session, with the Constitution over us, with duties before us, the democratic party in the Senate clearly in the wrong, knowing themselves to be in the wrong, knowing the Constitution to be against them, and we on this side undertaking to do the very duty which the Constitution prescribes, and instead of the Senators on that side putting themselves on the defensive, they stand up here and "carry the war into Africa" day after day, and I find republican Senator after republican Senator driven to a defense; they on that side wrong, these gentlemen right. Ah, gentlemen, there is bravery enough on that side of the Chamber; there is bravery enough in the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] when he rises in his place, and, with great dignity and with the Constitution of his country in his hands, reads day after day lessons to the republican Senators on their duties under it. Confession is sweet for the soul, and yet confession to the public, to the world, sometimes requires a higher degree of bravery than anything else; and it was a brave act on the part of the distinguished Senator from Georgia when he in open Senate admitted that he had been within a few years past a republican in the State of Georgia, that his life had been in peril as a republican, that he then became a democrat, and from that day to this has enjoyed perfect safety.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN. I hope the Senator from Maine will permit me to interrupt him a minute. I said no such thing. I do not presume he intends to misquote me.

Mr. FRYE. I understood the Senator from Georgia to say that there was danger when he was a republican in Georgia.

Mr. BROWN. No, sir, I did not say that.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator kindly tell me what he did say? I so understood him.

Mr. BROWN. If I had a copy of the RECORD containing my remarks I would tell you exactly what I said. The substance of it, however, was this: I was asked by a Senator on that side whether there was not a time when I had republican proclivities—I believe that was the language he used—when it was not safe for me to go without a guard, or some language to that purport. I replied that there was a time just after the war, when I had taken my position on reconstruction, when it was probably not safe, but that that period ceased two years before I reunited with the democracy, and I was as safe as any one was.

Now, I have no objection to telling the Senator, if he will permit me to interrupt him long enough——

Mr. FRYE. The Senator has replied to the question, and has made the correction which he desired to make, and I will proceed.

Mr. BROWN. I ask the Senator to permit me to add this: I said nothing about having been in danger when I was a republican, and that when I returned to the democracy I was safe, for I distinctly stated that two years before I returned I was as safe as I had ever been, and I have been ever since. My return to the democracy had nothing whatever to do with the want of safety. There was but a single occasion, if the Senator will allow me to state it, where I was unsafe that I knew of. There was one meeting I attended where I was informed that my life was in danger. I went on and spoke as usual, however, saying that I had made the appointment, and intended to fill it, and I was not assailed, and there may have been no real danger, though I had reason to believe there was on that occasion. That was the only one.

Mr. FRYE. Well, Mr. President, it is brave even to admit as much as the Senator from Georgia does now. As to his republicanism, I know myself he was a republican, for I had the pleasure of hearing him deliver a very fine speech in 1868, I think, in the republican convention.

Mr. BROWN. I have not denied that I acted with the republicans in 1868.

Mr. FRYE. But, Mr. President, there was one other thing which required courage on the part of the distinguished Senator from Georgia, and that was the attack he made upon the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the admission that there were 139,000 men twenty-one years of age in that State, spendthrifts, paupers, men who could not read and write, who were excluded from the ballot by her laws, who if those laws were repealed would vote the democratic ticket. What an admission! The spendthrifts, paupers, and ignorant men of Massachusetts all democrats!

It required courage to make a confession like that before the world. It was true, undoubtedly, and the distinguished Senator might have gone one step further; he might have declared that in the State prisons, in the reformatory institutions, in the penitentiaries of the great Commonwealth of Massachusetts there were thousands more of adults, that the doors of the prisons were closed against them on election day, that if the State would have opened these doors, they, too, would have voted the democratic ticket, and that would have been true.

Sir, it required courage on the part of the distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] to make a two days' attack upon Massachusetts, and the greater part of it an attack upon her industries. Why, sir, I was always delighted with the story in the Bible of that contest between David and Goliath. I watched David picking his pebbles, placing them in his sling, and with such courage and confidence hurling them at the mighty giant before him, and it was boyish delight to see the giant tremble and fall. But, sir, while there was courage on David's part, yet he knew that the Lord was on his side. The Senator from Florida fights this Goliath of Massachusetts, hurls his pebbles, and knows that the Lord is not on his side. That requires infinite courage.

Now, sir, let me tell the Senator from Florida that I do not rise here to defend Massachusetts against him. Her schools and school-houses, her colleges and universities, her great philanthropic and charitable institutions, her mechanical and manufacturing industries, her intelligent and prosperous people make a Commonwealth the grandest that the sun shines upon to-day in this world, and she needs no defense even at the hands of her own Senators.

But the Senator from Florida charges upon Massachusetts and Rhode Island and Connecticut that they deprive people of the ballot. How deprive people of the ballot? Why, he has the boldness to say that they require men to be able to read their ballots. It took courage to make that declaration on the part of the Senator, for he did it in the face and eyes of the fact that Massachusetts to-day raises for her schools $5,000,000 a year, opens school-house doors in every hamlet, and then enacts laws to compel parents to send their children to school, while the State of Florida raises but $134,000 a year for the same purpose. Massachusetts, which put that limitation of education upon her voters, raises $16 a head for children between five and fifteen years of age, while the State of Florida only raises fifty cents per capita of population; and the Senator from Georgia was bold enough when he made the same attack if he remembered that Georgia raised but sixty cents for white and but fifteen cents for black scholars.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me again? I do not recollect having made any such statement in the Senate.

Mr. FRYE. I have not said that the Senator from Georgia made any statement.

Mr. BROWN. I certainly understood him to say this moment that the Senator from Georgia was bold when he made a statement that we raised sixty cents per head——

Mr. FRYE. I did not say that, Mr. President. I said the Senator from Georgia was bold to make that charge that Massachusetts did wrong when she put a qualification of education upon her voters, while in Georgia, the gentleman's own State, they raised but sixty cents for white scholars and fifteen cents annually for black ones, and Massachusetts raises $16 annually per capita for hers, regardless of color or anything else.

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator permit me to ask if he says there is any distinction in the laws of Georgia between the amount raised for black and white.

Mr. FRYE. I so understand it certainly in the appropriation of the funds after they are raised.

Mr. BROWN. Then you entirely misunderstand it; there is no such thing.

Mr. FRYE. Now, Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Florida to a little comparison between his State and Rhode Island, for he had the bravery to attack Rhode Island, too. I have here some comparative school statistics of Florida and Rhode Island for the years 1877 and 1878, taken from the reports of the Commissioner of Education.

Rhode Island, 41,000 pupils; Florida, 36,000—very little difference in the number of pupils. Teachers employed in Rhode Island, 1,312; in Florida, 970. School property in Rhode Island, $2,634,000; Florida, $116,000. Whole receipts for public schools in Rhode Island, $709,444; in Florida, $183,311. Whole amount expended in Rhode Island, $679,771; in Florida, $134,880. Per capita expenditure in Rhode Island, $11.54; in Florida, $3.64. And yet the Senator from Florida undertakes to criticise the State of Rhode Island for an educational qualification when Florida hardly keeps up the semblance of an opportunity to educate her voters, and Rhode Island furnishes $16 per capita every year to educate her children and give them the opportunity to become voters.

Take Florida and Colorado, because Florida may say that she has recently got back into the Union and therefore ought not to be so judged. Colorado has just come into the Union, only three or four years old. Colorado has about one-third the number of pupils of Florida; 16,000 in Colorado, 36,000 in Florida. Valuation of school property in Colorado, only a few years old, $474,771; in Florida, $116,934. Whole receipts for public schools in Colorado, $281,674; in Florida, $183,000. Expenditures annually in Colorado, $243,850; in Florida, $134,880; and so on.

Mr. President, I make these points in order that the country may understand this: The complaint made by the Senators on that side is that in the North we put an educational qualification on the ballot; but, Senators, I wish to show you that at the same time we open the school-house doors everywhere. While you raise a dollar per capita for the education of your voters, we raise all the way from $8 to $18 per capita in the States of New England and in other States of the North. If we require education, we furnish the opportunity to every man to acquire it.

The Senator from Florida also had the courage to call the laboring-men of the North, especially of New England, serfs, "hungry, starving employés of our mills, working out a weary existence under the cruel hand of the hard-hearted task-master." Well, Mr. President, I live in one of the New England States; I live in a manufacturing city; I know something about the manufacturing employés of New England—more, evidently, than the distinguished Senator from Florida knows. Why, Mr. President, the South does not know anything about the labor of the North. There is no more comparison between the laboring men of the South and the laboring men of the North than there is between white and black. On the one hand, labor has been disgraced by a hundred years of slavery; on the other hand, it has been honored, free, independent; and when Senators from the South talk about the serfs in New England manufactories they do not know what they are talking about.

I say to the Senator from Florida I can take a factory in my own city with a thousand adult employés, men and women, and he may select the best village in the whole State of Florida, having one thousand adults, men and women, as its inhabitants, he may exclude every colored person from that number, and then I will take those mill operatives, commencing with the agent and going down through, compare them man to man and woman to woman, and in dignity of character, in intelligence, in education, in every manly and womanly virtue, in property, in prosperity, the employés of that mill can discount the thousand selected from Florida.

Serfs? Men to be bulldozed and intimidated! Ah! if the Senator from Louisiana had had the operatives of Massachusetts down there during the bloody history of that State, and the conservatives had undertaken to intimidate and bulldoze them by the methods then prevailing in Louisiana, there would not have been enough conservatives left to-day to form the decent nucleus of a party.

Ah, it is easy to shoot labor when it has been ground down for a hundred years by slavery; it is a different thing to point the pistol and look at the eye of a free white man and bulldoze such an employé! Starving and hungry employés! Let me tell the Senator from Florida that the factory operatives and mechanics of Massachusetts to-day have laid by in the savings-banks of that Commonwealth money enough to purchase the whole State of Florida, real estate and personal property, five times over, and then have $50,000,000 left. [Laughter, and applause in the galleries.] The valuation of Florida is only about thirty million dollars, real estate and personal property; and the laboring men and women of Massachusetts have to-day on deposit over two hundred million dollars. Starving and hungry employés! Oh, it required courage to say it.

I live in a city of twenty thousand inhabitants. I speak within bounds when I say that the men and women at work in the mills of my city have more money on deposit in the savings-banks to-day than all the laboring men and laboring women in Florida have anywhere. Starving and hungry serfs!

The Senators on that side show courage when at once they attack Senators on this side by charging that we had forgotten all the principles of our lives and had joined with repudiators and adopted the infamous doctrine of repudiation. One by one we have declared that we have adopted no such doctrine. Repudiation finds no resting place in New England; but it was charged upon us, and Senators on this side thought they had made reply enough when they charged back that every Senator who urged it represented a State which had repudiated all the way from $5,000,000 to $20,000,000, and then courage was shown again by Senator after Senator rising in his place and declaring that in his State there had been no repudiation, not a dollar of repudiation. Oh, the infinite courage of the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.] No repudiation in North Carolina!

Then the distinguished Senator stated the facts in relation to the debt, and I kept running through his figures to see what the facts would show. I find that they had bonds out in 1860, and if the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] in 1860 had purchased a one-thousand-dollar bond issued by the State of North Carolina which then commanded I think one dollar above par—we will leave the one dollar out—he would have paid $1,000 cash for a bond. The day it was issued it was worth $1,000. He would have put it in his safe, waited year after year, would not have received one single dollar of interest, then in 1866 he would have found the State of North Carolina giving him a new bond bearing 6 per cent. interest for $360, being the interest from 1860 up to 1866, then in two years another bond for $120 for the interest unpaid on the principal for two years bearing 6 per cent. interest, and as time rolled on he would have found that he got no interest on his one-thousand-dollar bond, no interest on his $360 bond, no interest on his $120 bond, even down to now; and what happens? He has had his bond of $1,000; he had his next bond $360; he had his next bond $120. Add to that the interest unpaid on the one thousand-dollar bond from 1868 down to now and there is $780; the interest on $360 from 1866 to now, $324; the interest on the $120 from 1868 to now, $93.60, which makes in all that Mr. DAWES's bond represented to him $2,677.60, and then the State of North Carolina gives him for it one bond bearing 4 per cent. interest—40 per cent. of his original bond of $1,000; that is, a bond for $400, and she gives him another bond for his interest, a bond for 25 per cent. of it; that is $120; and thus the Senator from Massachusetts has bonds to the enormous extent of $520, and he has not yet got any money, but the discovery was made the other day that this new bond could be sold for eighty-five cents on the dollar, and the distinguished Senator, if he has financial thrift about him, will send to New York to-day and order that North Carolina bond to be sold for eighty-five cents. It is the only way I think he will ever get anything. Thus you will find he gets $442 cash, and the net loss is $2,235.60, and there is no compound interest about it either. That is no repudiation! And yet some Senator said on this side that Senators on that side must be brave men. Ah! a braver man than the Senator from North Carolina cannot be found in the wide, wide world when in the face of that, looking right into the eyes of the American people, he declares that North Carolina has never repudiated a single dollar, her escutcheon is as bright, as glorious, as glittering as the constellations above us!

Mr. President, Senators on the other side again charge us on this side with simply being engaged in a game of trying to get a few offices for the republicans. There is not a Senator, I think, on the other side of this Chamber who does not know that if the republican administration was pleased it could to-day turn out from every Department of this Government—any one of them, I do not care which one you name—more democrats and give their places to republicans than we can possibly do in this Senate by passing this resolution. Hunting after offices!

Mr. President, much has been said in the progress of this discussion in relation to the rights of the majority. I do not propose to discuss that point at all; it has been debated here for weeks by abler men than I. It is not the ground on which I make this fight for myself and in part for my State. I recognize its force; I recognize that the minority must yield to the majority ultimately or that we have no Government; but there is another ground which appeals to me with infinitely greater strength than that.

Mr. President, the ground on which I make this fight is this: that there is a solid South, and that a solid South is a constant menace to the prosperity, to the safety of the American people, and, in my judgment, a gross, wicked usurpation of rights, a deprivation of rights among its own people. And when I talk about the people of the South I mean blacks as well as whites. When Senators on the other side talk about "our people" they seem to me to mean no man except the man who has a white skin, but we at the North recognize a black man as one of the people. I say the North to-day, in my judgment, places this fight upon this ground and sustains it upon our declaration that that solid South shall be broken if its solidity depends upon the deprivation of any right of any citizen of the United States happening to reside there.

When that charge was made, Senator after Senator on the other side had the boldness to rise and deny, some of them, that there ever had been any political outrages, such as have been alluded to, in the South since the war. The two Senators from Georgia both admitted that there had been outrages; I heard no other Senator on that side admit it; but each one who has spoken has declared emphatically and distinctly that to-day those outrages have ceased entirely; that to-day the angel of peace has settled over the whole South; that to-day elections are as free, as fair, as peaceable there as anywhere in the United States; and, says the Senator from Georgia, more free than they are in Massachusetts or Rhode Island or Connecticut.

Sir, I desire to say that I cannot give credit to any such statements as those, by whomsoever they are made and wheresoever, and I am not going to deal in idle stories either. I will give names and places. I am going to select a few specimen bricks from the South, and my information comes from the records of the courts there and from records in Washington, to which any Senator here can appeal any day that he pleases for information. I will give facts that cannot be disputed successfully, and try you, and see whether your elections to-day in the South are as free and fair as in New England.

I did not intend to trouble Florida much, but I have a word or two to say about her. The Senator from Florida declared that that State above all others was perfectly peaceable, perfectly free, every man had a right to vote, and vote as he pleased, and his vote was counted just as he cast it, and when he was saying it the cry came here from the other House in the case of Bisbee vs. Hull, "Testimony cannot be taken because murder stalks abroad and witnesses dare not testify." I take up the reports of the courts. I will take, for instance, Madison County. I find in Madison County, at the last election, that the county canvassers refused to count the votes at two polling places, the inspectors colluded with them, thus counting out republican members of the Legislature and counting in democratic. Citizens of this county were arrested on precepts issued by the United States court. The precepts were put in the hands of deputy marshals. They arrested their prisoners, they summoned their witnesses, and, with prisoners and witnesses, took a train of cars to go to the court. They had not gone more than one mile before a body of armed men, men with masked faces—they did not disguise their democracy—came into the car, stopped the train, with pistols in their hands, compelled the passengers to keep their seats, took the prisoners away from the deputy marshals, and then stampeded the witnesses for the woods. That was after the last election.

Again, it was shortly afterward rumored that the porter of the sleeping-car on that road knew some of these men who had appeared in mask, and almost every night afterward that train was fired into as it passed along its way, and the railroad officers seriously considered whether or not they would be obliged to stop running that train through that county in order to save the lives of their employés and protect their property.

Again, a deputy marshal went down there to arrest prisoners and summon witnesses. They attacked him in a hotel and pitched him over the balustrade, and after choking him until they thought he was dead, left him. He lived, but he came near dying. That was after the election, and he was arresting for election offenses.

Again, a deputy marshal was there trying to summon witnesses and arrest prisoners; a mob of armed men followed him and his posse from place to place, and finally drove them into the woods for safety.

Mr. CALL. Will the honorable Senator allow me? I hope the honorable gentleman, while he is narrating these facts as of his own knowledge, will be so kind as to state the names of the persons as well as the place and time of occurrence.

Mr. FRYE. If the distinguished Senator from Florida will go up to the Attorney-General's office and take the reports of marshals and district attorneys, he will, I doubt not, find a hundred times more than I have stated here.

Mr. CALL. Will the honorable Senator pardon me for asking him another question? I should like to ask the honorable Senator if it is not proper, where he is stating facts as of his own knowledge, which he has either derived by the examination of the records or otherwise, that he should state them with such particularity in regard to names, time, and circumstance as will enable them either to be verified or the contrary?

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I do not regard it my duty. Every statement that I make can be verified if the Senator will go to the Attorney-General's office for verification, or if he will go to the courts of his own State and take the records there. They will be found in one or the other.

I should like to incorporate in my remarks a method they have in Florida of electing primary county officers. With the permission of the Senate I will do so without reading it here.

Mr. CALL. I desire to hear it read. I think it is due to me that it should be read.

Mr. FRYE. I have no objection to reading it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to make a statement? He referred awhile ago to a murder having been committed in Madison County in connection with the Bisbee election. I will say to the Senator now that that murder was one perpetrated by a black man on a white man.

Mr. FRYE. That is the first murder I ever heard of in the South of a white man by a black man. It always turned out the other way in my reading.

I will omit this document from my speech rather than take the trouble of reading it.

I did not intend to say a word about Florida, but in looking for something else my eye fell upon this bit of history at the last November election in that wonderfully peaceable State. I should like to have the gentlemen hunt over Rhode Island and Connecticut and Massachusetts and New Hampshire and Vermont and Maine and find anything of that kind. Peaceable! more peaceable than in New England!

Now, Mr. President, for South Carolina. South Carolina in 1870 had a population of 705,000 in round numbers; in 1880, 995,000. The white population in 1880 was 361,000; the colored population 604,000—almost two colored men to one white man in the State. In 1875 the registered white vote was 74,000, the colored 110,000; total white population in 1870, 289,000; colored, 415,000.

Mr. BUTLER. Did I understand the honorable Senator to say that was the registered vote of South Carolina?

Mr. FRYE. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. BUTLER. The honorable Senator was giving the registered vote of South Carolina.

Mr. FRYE. The registered voters in 1875 only.

Mr. BUTLER. There is no registry law in South Carolina. That is a specimen of the Senator's accuracy.

Mr. FRYE. I will simply say in relation to that that I sent to the Librarian of Congress and he informed me that you had no registration law, but that in 1875 either by a State enumeration or in some other way you did ascertain the exact number of men twenty-one years of age, colored and white, residing in South Carolina, and I have given the figures of those.

Mr. BUTLER. All I have to say to that is that I know nothing about registration. I only state as a fact that there is no provision for registering votes in South Carolina—by law, I mean.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from South Carolina will notice that I did not give the registered vote for any year except this of 1875, and I give my authority for that; it was taken under a State law.

Mr. BUTLER. That is not true, Mr. President; that is all; the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. FRYE. I am not mistaken that it was taken.

Mr. BUTLER. No, I say the Senator is mistaken in saying it was a State law. There has been no law of the State providing for a registration of votes. That is a mistake, I think.

Mr. HAMPTON. If the Senator will allow me, I think that I can explain how he has fallen into the mistake. There is, as my colleague says, no registration law in the State; but by a census that was taken there previous to the time named it was estimated that there were 75,000 white voters and 110,000 colored voters. I think those are the figures that the Senator used. That was estimated at that time.

While I am up, if the Senator will allow me, I will state one fact in reference to that, which I think is of some importance. Those figures, as he will recognize, made the vote of South Carolina at that time 185,000. In that election there were 183,500 votes cast, and in that same election, the election of 1876, Mr. Hayes, who was the presidential candidate, received nearly 20,000 more votes than General Grant received in 1872. So there certainly could have been no restriction upon the vote there, as they polled the largest republican vote that had ever been cast in the State.

Mr. FRYE. I am obliged to the gentleman for corroborating what I said in relation to 1875; but there has been a census of the people of the State, and the colored and the white population bear just about that proportion of voters in the State. In 1868 Grant had 62,000, Seymour 45,000; republican majority, 17,004. In 1870 Scott, republican, received 20,000, and the democrat 12,000; republican majority, 8,014. In 1872 Grant, 72,000; Greeley, 22,000; republican majority, 49,587; and Moses, the republican candidate for governor, had 35,945 majority. In 1874 Chamberlain had 80,000, Green 68,000; republican majority, 7,000. In 1878 the distinguished Senator, Mr. HAMPTON, received 119,550 votes for governor, and scattering 213. In 1880 Mr. Garfield received 58,071, Hancock 112,312, and the democratic candidate for governor received 117,482, there being no republican candidate. Gentlemen may say that colored men have been converted; gentlemen may say that colored men vote the democratic ticket: I tell you the people of this country, at the North at any rate, will give no credit to any such pentecostal conversions as those.

Mr. HAMPTON. May I make a suggestion? I do not wish to interrupt the Senator without his permission. Is it disagreeable to him?

Mr. FRYE. I will yield for a question.

Mr. HAMPTON. I wish simply to make a very short statement.

Mr. FRYE. I would prefer, if the gentleman will allow me, not to be interrupted for a statement. I do not wish to seem to be wanting in courtesy, but I have talked longer now than I intended to have done.

How has this change been accomplished in South Carolina? Have the colored men been permitted a free ballot there? If they had, would they not have voted the republican ticket? Sir, I have been through the South. I have had the privilege and the painful duty of investigating elections through the South. I have seen some of the democratic conversions down in Louisiana. I remember a few of them were put on the stand by the democrats as members of democratic clubs, and I remember on a cross-examination it turned out that each one of the democratic black men who belonged to the democratic club had a little ticket of safety given to him, issued by the club. The democrats on the witness stand said it was a ticket of safety against their own black brothers, but on cross-examination it proved to be a ticket of safety against the democracy, the conservative gentlemen of Louisiana.

The black men perhaps can be converted, but if the black men know anything they know that under God and the republican party they have been made free. If they know anything they know that the whole power of that party for twenty years has been devoted not only to making them free but to securing their rights as freemen. Who can be led to believe that of their own accord and free will they to-day will vote the democratic ticket when the issue is a national one?

Sir, just before the last election "the feeling on both sides in South Carolina was most intense and on the democratic side extreme, desperate, and bitter. They forced into the question the race issue, declared it a question of white civilization and supremacy, and, forgetting the black code and ku-klux outrages denounce, the attempt to restore a republican administration as treason to the State and a crime against humanity, deserving of any execration and justifying or excusing any means by violence or fraud to defeat it."

Again, after election, "the particular acts of fraud throughout the State, the number of which is simply incalculable, are merely the result of a deliberate and desperate conspiracy of the whole democratic organization to defraud the acknowledged republican majority of the use of the suffrage because they denounce the result as 'nigger domination.' The jury laws, the statute itself, force open the doors of the jury-room to members of the very conspiracy and furnish both its opportunity and protection against the Government."

Again, methods: "There was violence in Greenville, Laurens, Hampton, and one or two other counties, and of fraud everywhere, from voting twice to stuffing and counting out by wholesale. The election process is, by three managers at each polling-precinct, all democrats, who receive, immediately count, and make return to a board of county canvassers, all democrats, who aggregate the votes, and of course where the returns on their face show by accident a republican majority, sufficient boxes are thrown out upon whatever plea to tabulate a majority the other way. This tabulation, with returns, poll-list, &c., is forwarded to the State board of canvassers, composed of highest State officials, who, upon the certified statements of the county board, make the official declaration."

Again, in the case of the United States vs. Webb there was testimony as to the method of ballot-stuffing in South Carolina:

> The stuffing was done here and elsewhere in this county in two ways: by wrapping small tickets in a large one and cramming them in, and by having wooden ballot-boxes with sliding lids, on the inner surface of which packages of forty or fifty tickets were loosely fastened by strings pressed by knife-blade into surface of .id over the package. Polls were required to be open at six o'clock a. m. The managers, who were all democrats, would open the polls before the republican supervisor or anybody reached there and lock the box. When the supervisor came and demanded to inspect the box he was flatly denied on the ground that he was too late, and they would then outswear him on the stand. At the close of the polls they would unlock the box, draw the lid sharply off, the packages would fall and scatter and cover the top of the interior. They then counted them. The proof was clear, as the excess of ballots over the names on their own poll-list showed.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator permit an interruption just there for the purpose of correcting a mistake into which he has fallen, if not inconvenient?

Mr. FRYE. I will yield for a single moment.

Mr. BUTLER. I simply desire to state in regard to the case to which the Senator refers, the United States vs. Webb, that I understand the facts to be briefly these——

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator will pardon me, I wish to say that I made a mistake in the name of the case, and I was just going to correct it myself.

Mr. BUTLER. Webb is a Connecticut man who voted the republican ticket, and he was convicted for his act in the United States courts. Those are the methods to which the Senator refers.

Mr. FRYE. Webb was a man who cast, after the South Carolina plan, twenty-one ballots, twenty tissue ballots inside of one large one, and if he was a republican it shows this remarkable fact——

Mr. BUTLER. He was a Connecticut man, I said, and voted the republican ticket.

Mr. FRYE. If he voted the republican ticket, it discloses the remarkable fact that in all the ballot-stuffing in the whole State of South Carolina for the last three years, where the world knows that thousands and hundreds of thousands of democratic ballot-stuffers have carried on that devilish work, he is the only man who ever was convicted of ballot-stuffing in a South Carolina court before a South Carolina jury.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator permit me one moment? Those cases have all been tried in the United States courts.

Mr. FRYE. Were not the juries South Carolina juries?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly they were.

Mr. FRYE. And do they not say whether the accused is guilty or not guilty?

Mr. BUTLER. The republican judges and prosecuting officers have something to do with it.

Mr. FRYE. I say I will accept that man as a republican; it only adds to my argument, because I was going to add, when the Senator interrupted me, that I had mistaken the Webb case. The Webb case was where there was a conviction, and in the one to which I was referring the jury disagreed. The Webb case was the only conviction ever had before a South Carolina jury for ballot-stuffing; and the gentleman discloses to me why he was convicted—that he was a republican following democratic examples.

In the fourth district of South Carolina—the election in this district would have been a more stupendous farce than elsewhere if it had not been a tragedy. One colored preacher, a respectable man, a republican, was called to his door by red-shirts and eighteen bullets left in his corpse. Another colored man, about eight miles from Greenville, was shot just before the election. All night before election the whole county resounded with reports of cannon and fire-arms, and the most outrageous bulldozing and fraud prevailed everywhere.

How came it that South Carolina had such a peaceful election? How came it that black men voted the democratic ticket in South Carolina?

The Senators from Texas declared that elections in Texas were as peaceable and as honest and as fair as anywhere in this country. Let me give the Senators from Texas a little history of their own State. It is cruel to be obliged to instruct the gentlemen about their own concerns. They seem to have eyes, but they see not; they have ears, but they hear not, unless it be about our peculiar people. I want to call the attention of the Senators from Texas to Harrison County as a specimen brick. The whole vote of Harrison County as counted gave Garfield 444 majority. He was entitled to over 2,000. The republican candidates were all on one ticket, down to the constable, with the Garfield electors; there was not a split ticket in the whole lot; and yet while Garfield had 444 majority the democratic canvassers and counters gave the democratic candidates in the county 2,434 majority. How is that for a fair count? Understand it, the republican ticket was an entire ticket from electors down to constable; and yet when the democrats knew that the State was perfectly safe for Hancock and did not care a snap of the finger about a vote for Hancock, Garfield had 444 majority and the democratic candidates for county offices had 2,434 majority.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FRYE. For a question I will yield with pleasure. Perhaps the Senator from Texas had better wait a moment or two longer, because I have got considerably more for him.

Mr. COKE. I should like to ask the honorable Senator to state the evidence upon which he is making these statements.

Mr. FRYE. I have stated in advance, and before I finish I will state again, where I get my evidence. I think the Senator will not contradict it if he will wait until I get through.

At one precinct in Fort Bend County the officers of election refused to make any return whatever. They did not make any.

In Harrison County supervisors were denied access to the voting precincts; men supposed to have republican tickets in their possession for distribution fired upon by masked men in broad daylight; prominent republicans wantonly assailed; republican majority of 1,500 changed to a democratic majority of over two thousand; voters intimidated, their lives threatened if they voted for republican candidates; attempts made to kidnap and kill persons carrying republican ballots to polls; republican speakers insulted, assaulted, and their lives threatened; a supervisor of election compelled to surrender his commission by armed men, and to armed men, and then the managers of election refused to recognize him because he had lost his commission.

"On the evening of Sunday, October 31, 1880, two days before the election, one Peter Choice, a colored man, was traveling from Marshall in Harrison County, Texas, to election and voting precinct numbered 6, a voting place in Harrison County, about seven miles from Marshall, the county seat of Harrison County, to the voting precinct aforesaid, in which he resided. Choice on the day referred to had in his possession a large number, estimated at about three hundred, of republican tickets or ballots, which he had received from the republican executive committee of Harrison County, in Marshall, Texas, for use and distribution on the day of election at the aforesaid voting precinct, (which has always given a large republican majority.) While he was so traveling, and about a mile and a half outside the corporate limits of Marshall, two persons, whom he recognized as one Walter Jennings, a publisher of a newspaper called the Marshall Messenger, and one Wallace Rudd, stopped him on the highway and told him they wanted the tickets he was carrying from him, threatening to kill him if he refused to give the tickets up. Rudd and Jennings were disguised at the time but pulled the disguises from their faces when they accosted Choice. As Choice refused to give up the tickets in his possession, Rudd and Jennings fired with pistols four times at him, and Choice's life was saved mainly by the fleetness of his horse.

"Again, on the night of November 1, 1880, the day before the election, some six or eight persons went in disguise to the residence of one Charles Welsh, who had been appointed and qualified as a supervisor of election for precinct numbered 11, in Harrison County, and told him (Welsh) that if he would not then and there surrender to them his commission as supervisor of election they would kill him. Welsh entreated them to let him alone, but they persisted in their demands, and after some time, in order to save his life, Welsh surrendered to them his commission and was denied the right to act as supervisor on the day of election by the managers and officers thereof because he did not have his commission as such supervisor with him."

Again, at the general election held November 2, 1880——

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator state the locality, what the county is?

Mr. FRYE. I will give it exactly now. At the general election held November 2, 1880, and at voting precinct numbered 15, in Harrison County, in this judicial district, 156 republican votes were polled. No return of any of these votes was made by the judges and officers of election at the precinct referred to, who were indicted, tried, and convicted under section 5515, Revised Statutes of the United States. Does the Senator doubt that?

At another voting precinct in the same county no return was made of 150 republican votes polled thereat. The judges and officers of election were indicted, and although the "best citizens" (in their own estimation at least) in the county, and although they were represented by the ablest counsel in Northeastern Texas, they in open court plead guilty to the charge.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him? What was the judgment of the court? What was the penalty?

Mr. FRYE. I do not know, sir.

Mr. COKE. I can tell the Senator. I think they were fined $1.

Mr. DAWES. I think that would be about the estimate down there.

Mr. COKE. That perhaps will explain why they plead guilty. It was wiser to pay their fine and go home than to stay there.

Mr. FRYE. But the Senator forgets that down at that court where the judge fined them $1 it was done at the earnest pleading of these respectable citizens of Texas, these leading lawyers of Northeast Texas, and the plea they put in was that these men would not put the Government to the expense of proving them guilty but had confessed themselves guilty; and again, that there were hundreds of witnesses brought long distances to that court to appear against these men, and when the costs were divided between the defendants it would be found that a pretty heavy fine had been put on southern democrats, considering the frequency of the crime.

Mr. COKE. I will state to the Senator that the judge of that court is a very true republican, and that he is not in the habit of granting favors to democrats or being lenient with them.

Mr. FRYE. I know the judge gave as a reason that the costs were very heavy.

At voting precinct No. 2, Harrison County, 150 republican votes were polled at the election. No return made. Judges and officers of election indicted under section 5515, Revised Statutes, defended by same counsel, plead guilty in open court to the charge.

At voting precinct No. 3, in Harrison County, 60 republican votes polled on day of election. No return made of any of them. Officers of election indicted, plead guilty in open court to the charge.

At voting precinct No. 5, in Harrison County, on the day of election 150 republican votes were polled. No return made. Officers of election indicted and plead guilty to the charge.

At voting precinct No. 6, in Harrison County, on the day of election, 193 republican votes were polled. No return of the votes made. Officers of election indicted and plead guilty to the charge.

At voting precinct No. 7, in Harrison County, on the day of election 63 republican votes were polled. No return made of any of these votes. Officers of election indicted and plead guilty to the charge.

At voting precinct No. 16, in Harrison County, on the day of election 135 republican votes were polled. No return made of any of these votes. Officers of election indicted and plead guilty to the charge.

At voting precinct No. 17, in Harrison County, on the day of election 140 republican votes were polled. No return made of any of these votes. Officers of election indicted and plead guilty to the charge.

At voting precinct No. 19, in Harrison County, on the day of election 135 republican votes were polled. No returns of any of these votes were made. Officers of election indicted and plead guilty to the charge.

At voting precinct No. 20, in Harrison County, on the day of election 170 republican votes were polled. No returns of any of these votes were made. Officers of election indicted and plead guilty to the charge.

Total number of persons convicted, 40; total number of votes failed to be counted and returned, 1,502; all republicans. How is that for a fair, peaceable, free, honest election and a fair count?

Mississippi came to the rescue. It was bold on the part of the Senators from Mississippi. It required brave men to stand up here and in the presence of the country declare that in Mississippi there is a free ballot. There is no free ballot in Mississippi and never has been since the war. Hear this: At the December term of court for the northern district after the November election there were fifty or sixty convictions for election fraud and violence and hundreds of warrants that were not served. Go into the State of Rhode Island and find a county where there is one conviction for fraud and violence. It cannot be done. Go into all New England and find one conviction for an offense against the right of suffrage. It cannot be done. Yet here in one term of the court there were fifty or sixty trials and convictions or sentences on the plea of guilty, and many warrants that were not served.

In Lowndes County Mr. Randall was United States supervisor. He was driven away from the polls with pistols at his head. That was a common occurrence in Mississippi. In Tchula, Holmes County—I think the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] lives in Holmes County—the democrats had a cannon at the polling place. Only think of that! A free ballot in the South; and the democrats had a cannon at the polling place and fired it from time to time at the fences! It was loaded with gravel and stones, and they showed the "Garfield niggers" how it stove the fence to pieces, and the "Garfield niggers" took to the woods. Mr. Hull was born in Mississippi, the editor of a greenback paper, and Mr. Perry was a republican, both of them white men. They came early to the polls to distribute ballots. The democrats refused to open the polls while those two men were there distributing ballots, and they did not, but on the contrary they made a mob, they seized those two white men, dumped them into a buggy, and drove them off. No republican ballots were allowed to be distributed at that free poll.

Again, in Holmes County, where the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] lives, I think, early in the day a colored man offered his vote. I suppose southern Senators understand perfectly well that there are many cases where two colored men have the same name. If there is one John Brown there may be three or four John Browns. This man came up and offered his vote.

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator deems it material where I reside in Mississippi, I will inform him that I do not reside in Holmes County.

Mr. FRYE. A colored man came and offered his vote; his name was John Brown. After he had voted, in five or six minutes another colored man came and called his name; it was John Brown. They challenged his vote at once and told him that he had voted. He told them that he had not. They insisted that he had, and it was enough to let a "damned nigger" vote once. We would regard that as enough up North. There was an intelligent, educated colored man by the name of Hill, known to everybody, standing by. Mr. Hill picked out the colored man who had just voted and brought him up, and then the other colored man who said his name was John Brown, and he said to them, "Gentlemen, here is the man who voted; there is the John Brown who now wants to vote." They did not wait; they seized him; they beat him on the head with the butts of their pistols. He just escaped with his life, and lay concealed all day long. They took the colored man who wanted to vote down in this free, beautiful, peaceful Mississippi, went to a barn near by and got an ox-chain. They had a loaded anvil. What was that for at the polling place? They took the chain, put it around that black man's neck, chained him to the anvil, and kept him there all day long. No more "niggers" tried to vote twice, I tell you, at that precinct.

At Canton, Madison County, there were two democratic judges and one republican judge, a bright colored man by the name of Garrett. They tried to get him to leave; they ordered him to leave; he refused. Then a democratic mob headed by the democratic circuit clerk by the name of Yandall beat him about his head with their pistol butts. He escaped, and they run the election as they pleased. Yandall was tried for it and the Mississippi jury disagreed, although the evidence was overwhelming. Then Yandall was arraigned again and he pleaded guilty to the charge.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask the gentleman what authority he has for stating that the evidence was overwhelming in that case?

Mr. FRYE. I have the authority at any rate of the fact that Yandall, when brought up before the court, pleaded guilty to the charge. I do not think he would have done that if there had not been overwhelming evidence; does the Senator?

Mr. GEORGE. He might have pleaded guilty upon some sort of idea that was common, I believe, at that time there, that if he would plead guilty it would cost him less than it would to defend his case. I remember hearing something of that sort at the time, there that men who were indicted, who brought their cases in the courts when there was a mistrial, were advised that the court would be lenient with them and it would be cheaper to confess and plead guilty than to go on with the prosecution. But the gentleman said that the evidence was overwhelming against him and a Mississippi jury refused to convict; that was his statement. I want to know where is your authority for the statement that the evidence was overwhelming. Was there a bill of exceptions taken? Was the evidence given before the jury reduced to writing and certified by anybody who heard it, or is it the opinion of somebody that the gentleman has succeeded in getting from the Attorney-General's Office?

Mr. FRYE. I said it required no further evidence than the fact that Yandall pleaded guilty, and the people of this country will require no further evidence.

Mr. GEORGE. But you said, sir——

Mr. FRYE. I decline, Mr. President, to be interrupted now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine declines to be interrupted.

Mr. GEORGE. Allow me to say one word, if you please. The confession of this man was not before that jury; the confession was made after the mistrial. Your statement was that the evidence before the jury was overwhelming, and you undertook to impeach the honesty and the fairness of the jury by saying that notwithstanding the evidence was unimpeachable to them they disagreed. I say that of the two statements one does not sustain the other. The fact that the man afterward had pleaded guilty is not to be considered as proving that the evidence before the jury was unimpeachable and overwhelming.

Mr. FRYE. Now, Mr. President, I will resume the floor. I only repeat I did not suppose that he pleaded guilty to the same jury that tried him before. We do not do it in that way in our country.

Mr. GEORGE. He pleaded guilty to the court——

Mr. FRYE. I decline to be interrupted again by the Senator unless he asks for the interruption in proper form and order under the rules.

Mr. GEORGE. All right.

Mr. FRYE. That jury disagreed, and immediately the man was arraigned for trial again and pleaded guilty, and the people of this country will not question the statement that I made that the evidence was overwhelming. The gentleman says in explanation that there in that country they plead guilty when they are not guilty; that sometimes they plead guilty when the evidence is not overwhelming. Think of it. Here is a white man, a gentleman because he is white and because he is a democrat, an officer elected to a responsible position in Mississippi, the clerk of the circuit court, who is charged with the infamous crime of taking a poor black man and beating his head with the butt of his pistol, and he, forsooth, for some reason which nobody knows, pleads guilty! There is no testimony, and yet he pleads guilty! If those are the gentlemen in Mississippi it is very singular, to say the least; and I do not believe the gentlemen of Mississippi will thank the Senator from Mississippi for undertaking to get them out of it in any such weak way as that.

At Raymond, the shire town of Hinds County, after the voting had commenced, the democratic officers suddenly got up a sham fight; they fired their pistols into the walls and ceiling of the room. The democrats outside hearing it began to yell, "Riot, nigger riot," and rush toward the voting precinct, and the negroes rushed for the woods.

Again, in Hinds County, Captain Kerr, register in the land office, and a Captain Estelle, a lawyer—the Senator will know these men; he was a captain in the Mexican war; both were white, both were confederates, and both residents of Jackson—went to Dry Grove the night before the election to distribute republican ballots. An armed body of white democrats surrounded them and escorted them nine miles, placed them on board the train, and sent them back to Jackson. No republican ballots were distributed at that polling place. There the jury disagreed because conspiracy was charged, and that gave a chance for them to disagree on what the word "conspiracy" meant.

Again, in Enterprise, Clark County, there were twelve convictions on trial and pleas of guilty of violence to republicans. All were democrats. There were twenty-four democrats under arrest for violence.

At Chahuta they had anvils, an anvil at one side of the polling-place, loaded, and an anvil at the other side of the polling-place, loaded. After they had been voting a short time, a gray-headed, respectable gentleman, a democrat, took his cane and marked with it a line from one anvil to the other anvil in front of the polling-place. Then he declared in a loud tone of voice that "that line was the dead-line, that no Garfield 'nigger' could cross that." Did the Garfield negroes know what the dead-line was? Did the respectable southern gentleman know what the dead-line was? Had those colored men ever heard that when our brave boys from the North, down there in your cursed prisons, starved day by day, had, in their hunger and weakness from starvation, dared on bended knee to crawl across the dead-line to pick up some bone that some southern dog had dropped, they were brained on the spot? Dead-line! Ah, that line meant something, and no Garfield negroes crossed the dead-line that day.

Again, in the northern district of Mississippi, at the December term, three plead guilty to ballot-box stuffing; three plead guilty to returning the vote of one precinct as the vote of the whole county; five plead guilty for expelling by force supervisors of election; one was convicted of the same offense; two commissioners plead guilty of erasing names of voters from the poll-list; three plead guilty of driving the supervisor from the polls with pistols. There were about seventy other indictments, as near as I can learn. There were others indicted for aiding this pistol business, and they were let off. Election commissioners were tried for fraudulently making up a poll-book; the jury acquitted them, and then the district attorney discontinued all the rest of the cases.

In this court the evidence showed that crimes of every kind against the franchise were committed during the last election; in fact the anti-democratic vote was suppressed, names were fraudulently taken from the poll-book, others were allowed to vote, their votes either not counted or were counted for the other candidates. At one precinct a large majority of republican votes were cast, but the inspectors returned a solid democratic vote; armed men were at the polls to intimidate, and every sort of fraud was common. In all counties having large colored majorities fraud ran riot. It was impossible to proceed with the trials of some election cases; witnesses were driven off, they were prevented from going to court, the defendants and their friends, armed with bludgeons and pistols, in large numbers, beat witnesses, completely demoralized them, and finally the district attorney gave up at that court in despair and stopped the trial of causes.

Again, there is a district in Mississippi called the "Shoe-string district." It has been represented in the other House several years by Mr. Lynch, a colored man, and for the last four or five years by General Chalmers. I wish now to give the exact registered vote of that district, county by county: Adams County, white 1,274, colored 3,635; Bolivar County, white 1,080, colored 3,606; Claiborne County, white 727, colored 2,566; Issaquena County, white 371, colored 2,870; Jefferson County, white 951, colored 2,419; Quitman County, white 199, colored 217; Sharkey County, not given, very small; Tunica County, white 451, colored 2,055; Warren County, white 2,217, colored 5,238; Washington County, white 1,726, colored 5,604; Wilkinson County, white 855, colored 2,567; total, 10,837 white in the district and 33,940 black, not counting Sharkey—over 23,000 majority of colored men.

In 1869 the republican vote of that district was 20,949, the democratic vote 3,374. At that time I think there were four or five more counties in this district. In 1872, when the district was the same, Lynch, the colored man, had 15,101; Cassidy, the democratic candidate, 8,509. Lynch's majority, 6,592.

Mr. FARLEY. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question for information? Are there not other States in the Union besides the Southern States where as great changes as that suggested by the Senator have taken place? Did not the State of Maine, in 1876, give the republican candidate for President about 16,000 majority, and did not the State of Maine in 1879 defeat the republican candidate for governor there by a small majority? Why this great change?

Mr. FRYE. I have not got through with this yet, Mr. President. There are changes, of course, in all States.

Mr. FARLEY. I was about to suggest further to the Senator that in my State, the State of California, in 1864 and 1865 the republican candidates received 18,000 majority. In 1867, Mr. Gorham, your nominee for Secretary of this body, was the republican nominee for governor of that State, and he was beaten 10,000 votes. Two years before that the State had gone 18,000 republican.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, the Senator will pardon me for not mixing with this statement any changes in other States. I am going to show that there has been no real conversion or change in this district in Mississippi before I get through.

In 1875 and 1876 "the Mississippi plan" came in. In 1876 Chalmers's majority was 3,381. In 1878 the whole vote cast was less than 8,000, democratic 6,663 and republican 1,370. That is a change with a vengeance. Chalmers's majority 5,293. In 1880 Chalmers had 9,172, Lynch, the colored man, 5,393; Chalmers's majority 3,779.

Now let us look at 1880, the last election; I am going to take a few counties, seven counties in that district—and I do not pick them out for any special reason except that the elections in those seven counties were quiet and peaceable and reasonably fair. There is the same relative proportion of blacks and whites in all of them. In these seven counties, where the election was fair this last year, the registered proportion of white democrats and black republicans was three to one in every one of them. Let me give you some of them: In Warren County the registered black vote was 5,238, the registered white vote 2,217; Lynch's vote 2,086, Chalmers's vote 1,034. Issaquena County, registered black vote 2,870, registered white vote 371; Lynch's vote 1,118, Chalmers's vote 173. Bolivar County, registered black vote 3,606, registered white vote 1,080; Lynch's vote 1,715, Chalmers's vote 403; and so on through the seven counties, they giving Lynch nearly 5,000 majority. The other five counties with the registered vote in the same proportion of white and black they voted under "the Mississippi plan," and those five counties overcame Lynch's majority of between four and five thousand in the seven counties, and actually gave Chalmers, by the count, 5,000 majority in the district!

What do Senators think about that kind of a conversion? Can that be found in any other State of the Union? Even a democrat, a southern democrat, who does not believe in negroes being permitted to vote—and very likely I should not either if I lived down there; there is a good deal of human nature about this—a white democrat, a member of the House, admitted to me—no, he did not admit it, he said it plainly—"the election in that Shoe-string district was an infamous farce, and when it comes to the vote I shall vote so." He was a confederate, and is a democrat to-day.

But the democratic Senators say that these negroes are converted—that is the plea they put in—converted to vote the democratic ticket! They are sometimes, as I have told you. Let us see if there is any chance of a pentecostal conversion here. They have had them in Louisiana. Oh, yes! down there in the parish of Orleans, in 1868, in the spring there were 14,000 republican votes cast, and in the fall Grant got 1,178. That was a pentecostal conversion. In Caddo Parish the same spring, 1868, there were 2,987 republican votes, and in the fall Grant got 1. In Saint Landry Parish the republican majority in the spring of 1868 on the registered vote was 1,071; the actual majority 678. In the fall Grant did not get a single vote in Saint Landry Parish, and the democratic candidate for President got 4,787 votes, being just exactly the whole registered vote of that whole parish, white and black. That was a conversion! No real conversion took place in Lynch's district, as I will proceed to show you.

Vicksburgh, the principal city, is in Warren County. Mr. Chalmers claimed to live there; his partner does live there, and was chairman of the committee to run the contest on the democratic side. In Mississippi, as they say down there, they did not care "shucks" about the electors. They knew Hancock was all right, the electors of Hancock would be elected anyhow, while members of Congress and county officers must be looked to. Chalmers was in great danger. He lived in a district where there was about fifteen thousand republican majority, and even in Mississippi with 15,000 republican majority the democratic candidate was in some danger, to say the least. So they undertook to take care of him; and this partner took charge of Warren County, determined to give Mr. Chalmers a heavy majority over the Hancock electors. They went to employing negroes, large numbers of "loafing negroes" around in the city of Vicksburgh. They employed every man they could; they put them to work; they made out a Garfield ticket with Chalmers on it. They did not dare make a Hancock ticket. Even a loafing negro would not vote a Hancock ticket; but they thought if they could get Garfield tickets into the hands of colored men with Chalmers's name on them they might forsooth get them to so vote, and they labored "in season and out of season," with money and without money, with threats and with cajolery, in every possible way known to the white democrats of the South to run Chalmers's majority up in Warren County. How did they succeed? The highest vote for the Garfield electors was 2,129 in that county. Lynch fell just 43 short of it. So with their six weeks' work they cut down Lynch just 43 votes below the highest vote for any Garfield elector. How far did they run up the vote for Chalmers? That is a question somewhat important. Hancock's highest elector received 1,034 votes, and Chalmers's vote was exactly 1,034. They did succeed in getting 43 negroes to cut the name of Lynch; they did not, with their money, with their threats, with their cajolery, with all the machinery in their hands, succeed in getting one single black man to vote for Chalmers. And yet the Senator from California talks about reform in other States! Will the honorable Senator ascribe this election of Chalmers with 5,000 majority obtained in five counties besides overcoming Lynch's 4,000 majority in the seven other counties to a reform, when all the attempts at reform in Warren County with that city in it did not succeed in reforming a single colored voter?

No, Senators, it is no use. The North understands this thing. You cannot blindfold us; you cannot blindfold the people of this country. The elections in the South are not fair, are not free, are not without fraud, and even to-day are not without violence.

Senators, we said to you when this contest started here that we intended to fight on this line until a solid South, made solid in these devious ways, lost its solidity. We recognize in the fight in Virginia the entering-wedge; and because we recognize that as an entering-wedge, and for that reason alone, we have determined to stand by it, to give it our amen and amen, hoping that sooner or later the South may rise up to the dignity of free and independent States and yield to every man, white or black, his rights. Senators from the South, we shall make that fight forever unless victory comes before forever ends. It is certain. Though the mills of God grind slowly, yet they grind exceeding small.

Sir, the gentlemen may smile at the expression of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] of warning; but they need not. They should remember history. It has been written in this country for our benefit and for the benefit of men aspiring to freedom the wide world over, and the man for whom history is written who reads it not and learns no lessons from it is a fool. There were, unfortunately, two civilizations in this land of ours: the one the civilization of the North, founded upon the school-book and the Bible; the other the civilization of the South, planted upon slavery; the one a pure democracy, the other an aristocracy maintained on barbarism. They could not live side by side in the same country; there was an irrepressible conflict sooner or later to open up between them and God was to give the victory to one or the other. Both could not live forever in a free country. Barbarism grew and grew, oh, so fast, so strong! grew so powerful that she seemed to have her grasp upon the whole broad country of ours. Instead of freedom being the corner-stone it was slavery, it was barbarism. It grew so strong that you swallowed up the great parties of the country, so strong that it bought great territories to strengthen itself; still more, so strong that it made laws even for a free people; so powerful that it put on the statute-book the most infamous laws that were ever recorded on the statute-books of any country, civilized or uncivilized, in the wide world. It grew so strong that it enacted a law and forced the freemen of the North to submit to it, which, in the old Commonwealth of Massachusetts, right in sight of Faneuil Hall, where liberty was said to have been born, compelled Massachusetts men to shoulder the musket and 2,000 strong hunt down one poor black man, and then was so insolent and wicked that when the poor fellow was brought home to bondage it built bonfires on every hill all over the southern land and made the southern heart rejoice with joy exceeding. It grew so strong that finally it reached out its poisonous hand to seize upon the free territories, and then for the first time seemingly the civilization of the North, born of the Bible and the school-book, woke up; it started into power, called a halt, and said to barbarism, "Thus far and not one step farther forever." Then barbarism was so insolent that it levied war, tried to destroy the country, but civilization, now alive to its duty, raised armies, built navies, equipped both, fought for four years, made the rivers of the South run red with blood; finally conquered, conquered secession, conquered the infamous doctrine of secession, and then the war was over. Suppose barbarism had triumphed, what would this country have seen? Would not estates have been confiscated? Would not great cities have been pillaged and burned? Would not men have been hung in the North? Ah, but, thank God, civilization, born from the Bible as well as the school-book, prevailed, and not a dollar was confiscated, not a man was hung, not a man was punished, and when the great commander said to the conquered men, "Go home in peace, be good citizens, and I will take care of you," the great heart of the North said, amen and amen. In the mean time we had made four million men, women, and children free. While you were carrying on your war they staid at home, worked your farms, and took care of your wives and your little children; they were faithful, they were kind, they were tender; they never betrayed you—not once.

Northern civilization thought that with that record for the colored man, his chivalrous master, the white man of the South, would give him every right he was entitled to out of gratitude, if for no other reason, and it left the colored race in your hands; and then the very first Legislatures you called together, with the spirit of barbarism still hovering over them, enacted the infamous laws reducing the black man to a serfdom worse than slavery, the laws the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] read here in this distinguished presence the other day. When the story of these laws came to us at the North we could not believe it. But we were forced to believe, and then determined that the black man should have his rights, and to that end we put the ballot in his hands. We made him a citizen of the United States, your equal in the eyes of the law, and then you commenced the cruelest, the bitterest, the savagest history that ever was written on the page of any history in the wide world, pagan, barbaric, or civilized. The gentlemen may deny as much as they please, but the country knows that thousands and tens of thousands of black voters were killed in cold blood in your Southern States. You men know it in Mississippi; the Senator from Louisiana knows it in Louisiana.

Ah, gentlemen, the pen of history with its iron point has written the terrible story of those few years in your bright southern land, and your children and their children reading it will hide their faces in their hands and their hands in the dust. I have no desire to recall or to recite it. The North determined that it should stop. We sent our armies down there, and it did stop. Boys in blue were scattered through the South, and the black man exercised his right of suffrage. Then time wore on. Mr. Hayes was elected President; you went to him; you made him brilliant promises, and, allured by those promises, he withdrew the soldiers, and from that day to this you have had a solid South; from that day to this you say it has been peaceable. Ah, so is the graveyard peaceable. From that day to this you say it has been free, fair voting, and an honest count. I put upon record here evidence contradicting that. We in the North know to-day that you are refusing the black man the rights which have been accorded to him; and now, impelled by our civilization, we come once more and we say to you solemnly that every citizen of the United States, white or black, foreign-born or native-born, shall have and enjoy all the rights guaranteed to him by the Constitution of his country. Ay, more, we say to you now, compelled by that same civilization, that the laws of the United States upon this statute-book shall be enforced in every inch of territory over which floats the Stars and Stripes; and, Senators from the South, by the help and in the name of almighty God we will accomplish that purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator will allow me a moment. Mr. President, I am glad to take the occasion after this speech which has been made upon our side—and a very admirable speech, too—to give notice that if this applause or if any signs of disapprobation are ever again heard in the galleries, I shall move that the galleries be cleared.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I insisted the other day, in the absence of the Senator, that the audience in the galleries should not be disturbed by the Presiding Officer rapping upon the desk and trying to keep silence. It seems that it is for the entertainment of the audience, and our guests should certainly have some privileges. [Laughter and applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Order! order! The Senator from Georgia is entitled to the floor.

[A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.]

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] commenced his rather extraordinary speech with a statement that he was the youngest Senator in this Hall, and made some apology, stating that probably modesty ought to have required him to have remained silent. I do not think so. While the honorable Senator who has delivered the very extraordinary harangue we have just heard may be and probably is the youngest Senator in the Chamber, he occupies a very important position. He is the successor on this floor of the premier of this Government, and he may reasonably be supposed to speak from inspiration. We have heard intimations occasionally that the South was to expect a great deal of fair play and fairness and liberality from the present Administration. I have hoped it would be so; but if what we have just heard here is inspired by the Administration I think we understand it. We should be at least a little dull of comprehension if we should misunderstand it.

The honorable Senator started out with the remark that a great deal of boldness had been displayed on this side of the Chamber; that we had been bold enough to make attacks upon New England as not having dealt quite fairly with the suffrage question. New England has had in this Government the right it seems—I do not know that she claims it as a divine right—of attending to everybody else's business, and censuring everybody else without reply, so long that it no doubt is considered a great degree of impertinence for any one to mention any of the defects in New England history.

I shall not be misunderstood in reference to my course toward New England. I have repeatedly stated upon this floor the reasons why I admire her for her industry, her enterprise, her educational institutions, her wealth, and various other qualities and characteristics that I might mention; but I never thought New England was entirely faultless. They may be the best people on the face of the earth; I do not deny that; but there is something in poor human nature that necessarily is a little defective; in other words, there are weaknesses in it. They are of divine origin, but they are not divine; at last they are of the human family.

The honorable Senator from Maine, however, made one important admission that I was glad to hear him make, because I believe it is true. As to the 130,000 or whatever the number of the male citizens of Massachusetts over twenty-one years of age who are excluded from the ballot-box, he stated that the Senator from Georgia, referring to myself, had said the other day that if they were permitted to vote they would vote the democratic ticket, and he promptly admitted it, as I understood him. He went a little further and gave us the number of convicts in the penitentiaries and the prisons of Massachusetts, and told us they would vote the democratic ticket if they had an opportunity to vote. I think it is very possible that a large proportion of them would.

The issue made here has been in reference to suffrage. "A free ballot and a fair count" has been at the bottom of this discussion. I have said that it is fairer in Georgia than it is in Massachusetts. I have said that if you will permit the same classes to vote in Massachusetts who vote in Georgia, or as large a proportion of them, Massachusetts would be democratic. You drive them away from the polls because you dare not let them vote, because you cannot retain your domination if you do it. And I now have the strong corroborative testimony of the honorable Senator from Maine, a neighboring State, lying side by side with Massachusetts, knowing as he does well the history and character of her people, that these men driven from the polls would vote the democratic ticket if they were permitted to vote. Then, if you will give "a free ballot and a fair count," according to that admission, there is no question about it that Massachusetts falls into the column of democracy with "the solid South" that so much is said about.

But the honorable Senator went further and stated that in the South there was a class of people not permitted to go to the ballot-box who were entitled to vote. I do not pretend to quote his language, but you all remember the idea. I have admitted on this floor—and I make no issue about that—that there have been times when there has been violence and wrong. I have no doubt there have been occasions when all were not permitted who were entitled to vote. I of course know less about other States than I do of my own, but I say now in the recent elections there was no driving any one from the polls on account of race, or color, or any cause where they were entitled to vote and desired to vote.

But it has been said that there are large numbers kept away, and the inference is that if they were permitted to go to the polls the democrats would be defeated. It is already admitted that there is a very large number in Massachusetts who are driven from the polls by your election laws and your constitution who would vote the democratic ticket if they were permitted to vote. As Senator ANTHONY says, an intelligent and distinguished citizen of Massachusetts has stated that 100,000 are excluded from the polls by the educational and tax qualifications. I quoted the Senator's language the other day in my speech. Others have put it at a different figure. It is very certain that there is a large number driven away by your election laws; but that is not all.

There is a large number who are legal voters who do not get to the polls, and it is an alarmingly large one. It is not enough that you drive from the polls in Massachusetts 50,000 or 100,000 or 138,000 or whatever the true number is. It is admitted by the Senators from Massachusetts themselves to be over eighteen thousand driven away who are citizens, naturalized and natural born, because they are disqualified. That number or some large number are excluded who as the Senator from Maine says would vote the democratic ticket if they could vote. There is a large number of legal voters in Massachusetts who in your most excited elections, where they are contested with the greatest energy, zeal, and earnestness, never get to the polls. I do not say there is bulldozing, as that term has been used here, and I do not say the leading manufacturers will not permit their operatives to go. I do not say the capitalists who employ them use means to keep them from the polls. I do not say they are kept away by force, by undue influence, by fear of losing their positions. But I do say according to your own records in Massachusetts they do not go to the polls on election day; and with probably a hundred thousand who would vote the democratic ticket disfranchised, you keep more than another hundred thousand of your regular legal voters away from the polls on important elections. I will not do exactly as the Senator from Maine did in reference to Florida, make statements without referring to facts or figures or giving names or dates, but I will read the figures from your own books, and you will not deny them.

In 1875 the State of Massachusetts had a State census taken. I have the result of that census before me as published by the authority of the State of Massachusetts, and I have made some memoranda from different pages in that book. I have another little book before me here called the Manual of the General Court of Massachusetts, published by authority of that State, which I propose to make an extract or two from.

In 1875 the census of Massachusetts, taken by the State authorities, showed that you had a population of 1,651,912 people. Of that number, as the same book shows, there were 351,113 legal voters, and there were 449,686 ratable polls. That census, bear in mind, was taken by the State authorities of Massachusetts in the year 1875. In the year 1876 there was a presidential election held in this country, and in Massachusetts, as in all the other States, there was high excitement aroused, there was earnest effort on both sides to carry that election in all the States. The reasonable supposition is that in each State under these earnest efforts the voters who desired to go to the polls if not hindered would have been there, and it is reasonable to suppose that most of them who were not hindered did go. Now, how did it stand in Massachusetts at that election? The republican candidate, Mr. Hayes, received 150,060 votes; Mr. Tilden, the democratic candidate, received 108,777 votes, making a total of 258,840 votes polled in that exciting presidential election.

Mr. HOAR. There were several thousand votes for other candidates.

Mr. BROWN. I do not see in your manual other candidates for President?

Mr. HOAR. Yes. Cooper was one.

Mr. BROWN. Who were the other candidates for President who received the other votes? I take the statement as I find it in the manual, and I am going by the Massachusetts book now. As already stated, the aggregate vote polled was 258,840 for the republican and democratic candidates for President of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. There was a greenback party. I do not remember how many votes they had.

Mr. BROWN. I do not see it.

Mr. HOAR. And a temperance party.

Mr. BROWN. I am not able to see it in the book. The whole voting population being 351,113, as already stated, there seems to have been a very remarkable absence of 92,273 of the legal voters of Massachusetts from the polls. Can you show as large a number in any Southern State who were absent at that time? It is not enough that Massachusetts drives from her polls by her constitution and her statutes probably more than one hundred thousand voters who would cast their ballots for the democracy; but it is reasonable to suppose, as the Senator from Maine proposes to class the humbler part of her population, that these other 92,000 of the humbler class, who might vote democratic, are by some shift kept away; I do not know how. It is a significant fact, though, that they did not appear and did not cast their votes.

There was another notable occasion in Massachusetts. In 1879, if I recollect aright, there was a very excited contest over the election of a governor in that State. I think there were three or four candidates. At that election Mr. Long, the republican candidate for governor, received 122,751 votes, according to this manual; General Butler received 109,149 votes; Mr. Adams received 9,989; Mr. Eddy received 1,645; and "all others," as the manual says, received 108 votes; making a total for all the candidates in that excited struggle of 243,642 votes polled, less by 107,471 than the number of legal voters in Massachusetts, according to your own census in 1875. But your population had increased since that time and the number of your legal voters had increased, I presume. The book from which I read states that the population of Massachusetts had increased from 1865 to 1875 30 per cent. and a fraction. Now apply that rule, for we have no other data to go by that I am aware of, to the remaining years from 1875 to 1879, 1875 being the date when your last census was taken by the State, and the gubernatorial election coming on in 1879, and you would have, under the 30 per cent. rule that obtained the ten years previously, 198,228 increase, making at that time, if the increase of population was in the same proportion with the previous ten years, the whole population of Massachusetts 1,850,140 persons. Now, applying the same rule to that number that is applied under the census of 1875, where, in round numbers, one in every five was a voter, and you have as the total number of voters in the State of Massachusetts in the year 1879 370,028. The whole number of votes cast for all the candidates for governor, as already stated, was 243,648, leaving 126,380 who never got to the polls.

There were, say, one hundred thousand that, as the Senator from Maine says, would vote the democratic ticket debarred from the polls, and by some means over one hundred and twenty-six thousand who had a right to go there did not get to the polls. If we are to infer coercion or fraud in the South from the fact that the whole number of voters do not get to the polls, is it not fair to reverse the picture and infer it in the case of Massachusetts when so large a number do not get there? If it were not for that sort of divine right claimed by Massachusetts to do as she pleases and make others do as she tells them, it would not be an unfair mode of reasoning to say that if because 126,000 should be kept away in a Southern State you would imply coercion and bulldozing and murder and every sort of improper conduct, the keeping of a like number away in Massachusetts must mean something wrong also. The fact is at least very significant that they do not get there. Now, under the important admission made by the Senator from Maine, how much would we have beaten you if everybody could have gone to the polls in Massachusetts who can go there in Georgia?

But the honorable Senator from Maine this morning defends Massachusetts again under her constitution and laws for driving these people away from the polls who are disfranchised. He says she has an educational qualification, that she provides for the education of all her children, and she has a right therefore to claim that the voter shall be able to read his ballot before he puts it in the box. If the safety of society and property and all that is dear to the State of Massachusetts requires that each voter shall be able to read his ballot before he puts it in the box, what rule ought to apply to Georgia for the like safety of society and protection of all that is dear to a people? Suppose we plead the same excuse or adopt the same rule and drive from our polls by a statute or a constitutional provision everybody who cannot read the constitution in the English language and write his name, how many republican colored men would vote then? A much smaller number, I apprehend, than vote now.

But we have not acted upon your rule. You determined under the reconstruction acts that they should vote for the time. When we adopted the State constitution we thought it unfair to them, as they had been faithful to us, as stated by the Senator from Maine, in our trying emergency, to drive them from the polls by an educational qualification, and we did not do it. But the idea is that we ought to educate them; that was the charge thrown at us by the Senator from Maine when he taunted us with our poverty. Why, the honorable Senator said the operatives in Massachusetts had money enough in the savings-banks to buy the State of Florida several times over, and he referred to the fact that she has about thirty million dollars' worth of property. Yes, it is so. We are poor and you are rich. How came it so?

There was a period in the history of Massachusetts and New England when the slave trade was very profitable. Georgia never engaged in it; slavery was prohibited in her original charter, and she manfully resisted for a time. And as I noticed the other day in a book in the Library that I think good authority, in the convention that framed the Constitution of the United States, Georgia and South Carolina made it a condition-precedent to the Union that the importation of slaves within a reasonable time should be prohibited. New England I do not think made that a condition-precedent. Those who made the trade profitable insisted on a longer time to import. When you imported the slaves their labor was not found to be very remunerative on the barren and bleak hills and shores of Massachusetts and New England. There was a more congenial clime; there was a place where the cotton grew and the tobacco grew, and various productions that you could not raise in New England, and your ancestry brought them down and sold them to us and our ancestors bought them from you and gave their money for them, and you took that money and I presume you put it into brick and mortar and into fisheries, and factories, and shipping; and you went to work building upon it. It was substantial wealth to you, and you knew how to take care of the dollar.

But there is another reason why you are rich and we are poor. During the time we held slave property guaranteed to us by the Constitution, and since that time, the farmers and planters, the mechanics and the laboring classes of this country generally have been taxed under the tariff laws of the United States to build up and maintain New England factories and New England interests. With the money which you have received from that source and from the fisheries at the expense or under the protection of the Government, and from the importation of slaves and from other sources, you have grown rich and powerful, while we by the loss of slaves purchased from you have grown poor. Hence you are able to appropriate large sums for educational purposes while we are not able to raise like sums.

You grew rich first by the importation of slaves and by selling them to us, and you invested your money well. We held them for two or three generations and we made their labor profitable; but some time after the trade had ceased to be profitable and we were prosperous those high moral ideas that the honorable Senator from Maine referred to where he contrasted civilization in New England founded on the Bible and the school-book with barbarism in the South, as he termed it—these moral ideas quickened the conscience of Massachusetts and New England to such an extent that they saw the horrors of slavery, and a wail went up over it and they were so shocked that they absolutely violated the compact of the Constitution, and their Senators will not deny it, in refusing to carry out the agreement of Massachusetts when the Constitution was formed, that she would render back to the owner his fugitive slave when he went into your States. And the honorable Senator from Maine tells us of a very disgraceful scene there, as he considers it, where the troops had to be called out to the number of 2,000 or some other large number, to execute this law and return a poor negro back to slavery again.

In the days when your fathers called them blackamoors, and when they were proper traffic, that sympathy was not so lively, conscience was not then so quickened. But though we had bought the property, and paid you for it, and owned it, and though it had been a condition-precedent to the formation of the Union and the adoption of the Constitution that you would agree to surrender fugitives to us when they fled, and though you had agreed to this, yet those high moral ideas of civilization as contrasted with barbarism rose to such a sublime height finally that you could not carry out the compact, and your conscience would not permit it.

Allow me to tell you that we charged that broken compact on your part as one of the reasons which we thought at the time justified us in taking the steps we took to try to defend slavery by our strong arms, when you would not keep that compact with us that you had solemnly engaged to keep. The war did ensue, as the Senator said, and it resulted in the abolition of slavery. Your high moral ideas prevailed. I have again and again said that outside of the immense loss we met there; I am glad it is so; but bear in mind we are taunted with our poverty now because we cannot educate the negro. Take your part of the tax on your shoulders and pay us the two billion dollars that were lost in the negro, after we had bought him from you, and we will then be able to educate him. As a necessity of war you sweep slavery from existence, you take from us our property, you confiscate it, so to speak; for if the abolition of slavery which was legal property under the Constitution of the United States was not confiscation, if the destruction of two billion dollars' worth of property was not confiscation, when you destroyed it without paying for it, what do you call confiscation? True, you left us poor, very poor. We are not able now to educate the poor negroes as they ought to be educated and as we desire to educate them. Pay us for them by taxing yourselves and we will agree to appropriate every dollar of it to their education.

I know we cannot be paid under the Constitution of the United States, and I do not ask it. I am asking for no impossibility; though, as I stated the other day, Mr. Lincoln, in the kindness of his heart, at the Hampton Roads conference, did state that he would then be willing for the appropriation of $400,000,000 toward paying for the slaves if the war could then cease and the Union be restored. I know it is out of the question; but I do say it does not come with a very modest grace, to say the least of it, from a New England Senator on this floor to get up and tell us that a citizen of Massachusetts should not vote until he can read his ballot and that you have made provision there for the education of all the people, and then refuse to apply the rule to us because we are not able to educate them and taunt us with our poverty. We were as rich as you were before you robbed us. I mean robbery in no offensive sense personally; I simply mean that you had sold the negroes to us, and under the necessities of war you took them from us and left us poor. We cannot educate them: we are not able to do it.

The Senator from Maine taunted us with a statement as to the number of dollars per head appropriated annually in Massachusetts to educate your children and the small amount with us. Contrast the amount of your property with ours, and I apprehend you will find we are acting as liberal a part toward the children as you are. When we have the ability that you have we will be able to educate them; but I never expect to see the day in Georgia when we will drive any man from the polls because he cannot read the constitution of his State in English and write his name. We will not do it, but you do it, and you have to do it, according to the admission of the Senator from Maine, to save your State from becoming a democratic State. We will not do it there if Georgia becomes a republican State.

One of the honorable Senators from Massachusetts the other day referred to the fact that everybody was being educated up there. I do not find it quite so according to the record made by Massachusetts. This little book of the census of 1875 has a great many very interesting things in it. Here are some tables in reference to your schools, and the comment under the table as is made in each case is this:

> Under school attendance is given the number of children attending school at least three months during the year ending May 1, 1875, and from the recapitulation, on page 88, it is learned that the whole number of all ages is 282,784; 1,269 being under five years of age, 254,568 between five and fifteen, and 26,947 above fifteen. From the returns made to the board of education contemporaneously with the census returns there appear to be 300,834 children between five and fifteen years of age in the State, and this number is fully sustained by the census. These statements indicate that there were 46,266 children in the State between five and fifteen years of age who had not "attended school three months during the year ending May 1, 1875."

I stated the other day before I had seen this book that there was a good deal probably of unfair play about these general allegations as to educating everybody; that the poor class of your people had not the ability to educate themselves, and could not spare their children from labor at home to send to school. It was insisted then that all were being educated, or so nearly all that it amounted to nothing. Your own book states that during the year ending May 1, 1875, there were 46,266 children between the ages of five and fifteen who did not attend school three months that year. There is where the ignorance comes in. It is the children of these excluded democrats not sent to school and not able to go to school who get no education, and when they grow up they are not quite able to read the constitution of Massachusetts in the English language or to write their names, and as they will vote the wrong ticket any way according to the Senator from Maine, you drive them from the polls, and then you turn round and cry "barbarism," if all of the same class were not permitted to go to the polls in the South.

But the Senator from Maine I think was drawn into another error when he was commenting so excitedly over the number who did not get to the polls in some of the Southern States, or rather over the number of votes that the democratic candidates get in excess of what they ought to have had, drawing the color-line. Permit me to tell you that while the claims for the colored people as republicans and all that sort of calculation are made up on that supposition there is a large number of them who are not republicans, and there is annually going to be a much larger number still. Judging from the treatment they receive at the hands of the republican party, as I stated it the other day in the remarks I made on this floor, that number will continue to increase, and the wails of agony will have to continue to go up that "here is a large district with large numbers of colored people in it and still republicans do not carry the elections."

No, you have done nothing for them but given them the ballot, and you keep up a fire upon us all the time upon the question, "What appropriations have you made for them?" Where they have stood faithfully by you, and voted with you, and given you the offices of this Government, a minority of the people now being the republican party, having the hundred thousand Federal offices, how many have you given to them? What Cabinet appointment has one of the number had? What high position have you given to them? What justice have you done? But yet we are to hear chapter after chapter here about the injustice done to the colored voters because you do not carry the elections where there is a majority of colored people over white. Those complaints will increase, let me tell you, and you will find year after year that larger and still larger numbers of them will not only make speeches for the democratic party, as some of them did in my State in the last gubernatorial campaign, openly and squarely, but they will come up by thousands and vote the democratic ticket. They may be misled for a time, but their instincts are rather sharp, and they soon find who are their friends and who are using them simply for selfish purposes.

In the remarks that I have made here I have intended to be respectful to everybody. I have intended to do New England no injustice. I have stated again and again my admiration for certain great qualities she has; but I cannot stand here from day to day and be lectured by the New England Senators about our shortcomings South when I can turn and from her own records prove that she does greater injustice to the Irishman in her State, or the foreigner who cannot read the English language, than we do to the colored people in the South. Your records prove it. It is a source of no pleasure to me to rehearse it here, but I cannot sit still and be assailed or have my section or my State assailed from day to day and not remind you of the old homely adage that those who live in glass houses ought not to throw stones. Sometimes those who do it get hurt, and they ought not to complain.

I had no idea of engaging in this discussion when I came here this morning. I had no expectation that I should hear the extraordinary speech that we have heard from a gentleman occupying the position he does, where there is so much significance attached to his utterances; and I have felt it my duty, even at the expense of being as he terms it a bold man, to get up here and repeat from the record the charges that we have already made in reference to New England. As the Senator from Maine did not think proper to put any other State of New England into the discussion except Massachusetts, I do not care for the present to examine the record of any other; I am simply replying now to his argument; but I do desire to say that I think the phrase might apply very well in this case, "Physician, heal thyself," before so many assaults are made current here from day to day upon us about driving people from the polls. Whenever you will let those disfranchised democrats in Massachusetts go to the polls as we let the republicans of the same class of intelligence go in Georgia, I will cordially do justice to you, as I do now, for I quote from your records. I do you no injustice, but I will cordially commend you then for the justice and propriety of your course, and then in my State if any entitled to vote are kept away I will bear your censure and say it is just.

Mr. INGALLS. Before the Senator from Georgia takes his seat and leaves this question, I should like, if he will oblige me, to interrogate him upon one point. I have heard from him notably, and from other Senators from the South during this debate, the statement repeatedly made that the Southern States had been impoverished and pauperized by the confiscating act of the United States Government in abolishing slavery. If I understand the condition of affairs upon that subject, at the time when slavery was abolished there were 346,000 slaveholders who owned or claimed to own four million human beings. When slavery was abolished by the proclamation of the President and when that act was sanctioned by the adoption of the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution, those slaves were not removed from the South; they were not maimed, or killed, or deported. The ownership of those human beings was transferred from the 346,000 men who had enjoyed their labor for generations to the men, women, and children who were entitled to the custody of their own individual selves. They are there, with their descendants, to-day. Instead of being slaves they have become productive citizens, taxable so far as their property is concerned, and adding to the resources of the South.

The Senator himself has repeatedly said that the prosperity of that region of the country had been enhanced by the abolition of slavery. Now, I should like to have the Senator from Georgia state to the Senate whether he means to have it understood that he believes the negro as a slave was worth something and that as a citizen and a freeman he is worthless, because unless that is the ground he takes the assertion he makes that the South was impoverished and pauperized by the abolition of slavery is a fallacy and a sophistry. They are there to-day as they always have been. Their ownership was transferred from those who illegally held them to the men, the women, and the children themselves, and they have become productive citizens and members of society.

Mr. BROWN. I note the remarks of the Senator from Kansas and will very cheerfully reply. He says that we owned these 4,000,000 human beings or slaves at the commencement of the war; the ownership has now been transferred to themselves and we are no poorer.

Mr. INGALLS. The community is no poorer; the State is no poorer, I said.

Mr. BROWN. Suppose the Senator owned in Kansas a valuable house and lot in the city and large real estate, and somebody took it from him and transferred it to somebody else, is he no poorer?

Mr. INGALLS. Is the community poorer?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, the community is poorer when you destroy property. We had paid New England the money for these slaves.

Mr. INGALLS. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. BROWN. Never mind, I am answering you now.

Mr. INGALLS. You are not answering me.

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir, I am legitimately on the line of your inquiry. We had bought these people from New England and paid our money for them.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator pretend to say that they bought 4,000,000 slaves from New England?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir; we bought the ancestry of those we had, as you bought the cows from which you may have grown a large herd.

Mr. INGALLS. We never sold our own posterity.

Mr. BROWN. You raised them up with your means, and they were your property. We bought the slaves originally from New England and paid our money for them. New England took our money and put it into her brick and mortar and ships and factories, &c. Our money was in slaves. It was estimated as money, because we had the right to sell the slaves for money at the time. The wealth of every man who owned them was estimated by the value of the slaves. Really the money value was in New England, however. The slaves having been set free we lost the money that we had in them; and the very classes who once owned the wealth there and paid the tax cannot now do it because they have lost their property. A man who owned fifty thousand dollars' worth of slaves paid a tax on $50,000. Now the slaves are set free and he does not pay it, and if the colored man is unable to pay anything but a poll-tax, which is usually the case, nobody else pays it. The citizen who had his labor then and supported him paid a tax upon his value and put it into the treasury of the State. Now the citizen who owned him pays no tax on the fifty thousand dollars' worth of property, and the former slave does not pay it, because it is all he can do to work for his living, and he is not able to pay. Therefore the money does not go into the treasury to educate them. That is on the line of the argument that I made. We cannot do it; we have not the means to do it.

To tell me that a country is not impoverished because you destroyed to the owners of property two billion dollars' worth of what was constitutional and legal property, taxable value, and to tell me that a community can pay tax just as well after the destruction of that property as it could before, it seems to me is to tell me a very strange story.

Mr. INGALLS. Then I suppose the Senator logically must say that if these human beings could be remanded to slavery the South would be rich again.

Mr. BROWN. No, sir; that is not the question. I am glad they cannot. I would never vote to remand them again, if there were no restrictions in the way; but I do say that the South has been impoverished by the loss of two billion of value in property that was guaranteed to us by the Constitution of the United States and every State in this Union was a party to the compact. You said it was property; you agreed to treat it as property; we relied on your faith; and Massachusetts did not treat it as property when our property went there. When our property went into Massachusetts, in the face of her contract, in the very teeth of her agreement to deliver it back, she refused to do it. You had as well say that when a fugitive slave left Georgia and went to Massachusetts, and they refused to keep faith and return him the owner did not lose a thousand dollars, because he was only a human being.

But throwing all our loss of right to the property we held in slaves out of the question and still we sustained heavy loss by the demoralizations attending the abolition of slavery which prevented the population who had recently been slaves from performing the labor necessary to assist in building up and enriching one section.

Mr. HAMPTON and Mr. INGALLS addressed the Chair.

Mr. INGALLS, (to Mr. HAMPTON.) Go on, sir; I would be glad to hear from you.

Mr. HAMPTON. I do not propose to speak on the point that the Senator from Kansas has been just alluding to, and if he wishes to ask any more questions I will yield the floor to him until he gets through.

Mr. INGALLS. I had another observation to make on that subject, but if the Senator desires the floor I will yield to him.

Mr. HAMPTON. I do not desire the floor except for a very few minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY in the chair.) The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HAMPTON. Mr. President, I do not propose to detain the Senate at this very late hour by a reply to some of the statements in the very extraordinary harangue of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] but I do desire that when his speech appears in the RECORD one or two points on which he has fallen into error may be corrected and the correction go along with his speech.

In reference to the case of Webb, to whom the Senator from Maine alluded as having been convicted in South Carolina, I will state simply the facts, for I had the honor of presenting his petition for pardon to the late President, and I am glad to say that President thought there was so much merit in the case that among the very last acts of his official life was the issuing of a pardon to this man. Webb was a northern man, a man from Connecticut, a Federal soldier who had served in the Federal Army, and had married subsequently in Georgetown. On the day of election, as it was proved afterward, he unfortunately got drunk, and he rolled up openly some tickets without any effort at concealment, and attempted to put them in the ballot-box. They were seen and immediately ejected, and did not go into the box. He was not voting the republican ticket; he was voting the greenback ticket; he was one of the five hundred men in South Carolina who voted the greenback ticket. Upon the representation of very good citizens and of the district attorney I presented the application for pardon, and it was granted. That is all there is in that case.

One other point that I take issue with the Senator from Maine upon is this: he seems to think that where there are colored people they are necessarily republicans. Facts speak stronger than words, and I simply want to make two statements. In the last election in South Carolina the candidates were nominated in some counties by primary votes, and in others by county conventions. In the county of Barnwell they nominated their ticket by convention. That convention was formed on the basis of one delegate for every twenty-five enrolled democratic voters, and when the convention assembled there were forty-five colored men in the convention, representing therefore more than 1,100 enrolled democratic votes in that one county, and so strong was their representation there that they dictated the democratic ticket in that county and elected it. So much for that.

One other instance fell under my own observation during the last canvass. There was a large meeting in Chester County and the ladies of the place offered a flag to the club which would bring in the largest number enrolled. A very large number were present, fifty clubs, I suppose. After a very careful examination by a committee appointed for that purpose the flag was given to a club which came from the strongest colored portion of the county, and that club won the democratic flag because they had enrolled more colored men in it than any other club in the county. When I presented the flag, as I had the honor of doing, I called the attention of the white citizens who were present to the fact that the flag had been won by the cooperation of the colored men, and I hoped it would always be a symbol of peace and good-will between the two races, for it would show both that the prosperity of the country depended upon that.

As I said just now, facts speak stronger than words; and I wish to make a proposition to the Senator from Maine or the Senator from Massachusetts, or to any republican Senator upon this floor. If in the next election canvass in South Carolina or in any election canvass in South Carolina any of these gentlemen will come down and enter into that canvass, I promise them as large and respectful audiences as they will find anywhere, and I will pledge myself to have them met upon any stand where they will speak in South Carolina by a colored democrat, and if I do not place there a colored man who will meet them and refute the slanders and calumnies that have been denounced upon our State, and meet them satisfactorily, and if they do not give good reason for the faith that is in them, I will join the republican party.

Mr. BUTLER. I simply desire to say that at the proper time if upon reading the remarks of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] I shall think it necessary to notice what he has said about South Carolina, I shall do so; but I want to remind that Senator that the ruse which he has adopted here to-day is a very familiar one. The cry of "stop thief" to divert public attention from the real issue in the Senate Chamber does not deceive anybody. It is the old familiar dodge of politicians and lawyers to raise the cry of "stop thief," something away off, down in South Carolina or Mississippi that is very bad, when he with an industrious and studious purpose avoids the real issue before the Senate and rushes back into the past and into old newspaper charges.

The point in the Senate is not so much "a free ballot and a fair count" in the South, in Virginia and elsewhere. When that question does come up, I shall have something to say. The real question here is, Has there been a disgraceful bargain in the Senate by which the offices of the Senate are proposed to be turned over to somebody else?

Mr. BURNSIDE. It is as to whether a majority shall rule or not.

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir.

Mr. BURNSIDE. That is the question. That is it to a dot.

Mr. BUTLER. That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I say there has been no bargain; and any man who says there has been says what is false. That is the doctrine. I say any man who says that says what is false.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Rhode Island of course may characterize it as false as much as he pleases.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I do, distinctly and positively.

Mr. BUTLER. I say, inasmuch as the Senator has seen fit to say that—no, I will not say it in this Chamber——

Mr. BURNSIDE. Say anything. I declare that any man who says there has been a bargain says what is false. That is the argument exactly. Now the Senator from South Carolina can say what he likes.

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir.

Mr. BURNSIDE. He can say just what he likes. I say it is false, false, false, in every word and every letter. I have heard this thing long enough, Mr. President, and I do not as an honorable man propose to sit here and listen to it any longer. I declare that any man who says there has been a bargain on this side of the Chamber with anybody, a corrupt bargain, tells a falsehood.

Mr. BUTLER. Of course the Senator from Rhode Island has a perfect right to say what he pleases.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I will say what I know to be the fact.

Mr. BUTLER. I shall not be betrayed into any excitement.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Not a bit; I am not the least bit excited. I am just giving emphasis to what I propose to say.

Mr. BUTLER. I see that the Senator is uncommonly equable.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I am in perfect good humor and perfectly calm. Mr. President, I beg pardon for talking in my seat.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY in the chair.) The Chair will remind Senators that they must address the Chair. The Chair cannot recognize Senators unless they address the Chair.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I shall do so in the future.

Mr. BUTLER. I congratulate the Senator from Rhode Island for being cool. I am delighted to see him so cool.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I did not talk quite so loud as the Senator from South Carolina—I simply wanted to drown his voice—but I reiterate my statement that any man who says there has been a bargain on this side of the Chamber says what is false.

Mr. BUTLER. That is another case of coolness which I shall not discuss with the Senator here. I have not the slightest idea of doing it. I shall not be betrayed upon this floor into any language which is unparliamentary to begin with, I hope, but I want to say to the Senator from Rhode Island, and I want to say to all the other Senators upon that side of the Chamber who adopt the tactics which the Senator has adopted, if he supposes that by the use of such language as that he can deter me from the full, complete, unqualified discussion of a public act, the Senator is simply mistaken.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator allow me to say that I do not think there is a member on this floor who would say for one moment that I desire to deter any man from anything like a fair discussion? I merely mean to meet this charge that has been so often made on that side of the Chamber, and that has stirred me to the very bottom of my soul every time it has been made, and which I know to be false. I merely mean to say that any man who makes that statement states what is false; that is all. I do not want to check discussion; I am delighted to hear all Senators on that side of the Chamber, and every man knows it. There is not a man on that side of the Chamber who does not know that I am delighted to have him get up and indulge in fair debate; but not on a little suspicion that is running around through the air, for one Senator to get up and talk about a corrupt bargain. Does the Senator suppose that there is any man on this side of the Chamber who would engage in a corrupt bargain? Does any one on that side of the Chamber suppose there is a man on this side of the Chamber who would engage in a corrupt bargain? If we would not engage in a corrupt bargain, how can there be such a bargain? As I said the other day, I do not think there is a man on that side of the Chamber who would be guilty of going into a corrupt bargain. Not one, not a single man of you, would be guilty of corruption. I do not like to hear such things.

My friend knows the high regard I have for him. There is no man in the Senate Chamber for whom I have a higher personal regard on either side than I have for the Senator; but I do say this thing ought to stop. I do not say it must stop because I cannot stop it, but I say it ought to stop; that in all decency, in all propriety, in all honesty, in all fair dealing, the thing ought to stop. If you can bring the evidence, bring it and I will vote to expel any member of the Senate who has been guilty of any such thing. If the Senator from South Carolina or any other Senator on that side will move for the raising of a committee to investigate and put every Senator on this floor upon oath, I will vote for the resolution, and so will every member on this side vote to call every single Senator before a committee and place him under oath. Mr. President, I do not say this thing must be stopped, I say it ought to be stopped in all decency and fairness.

Mr. BUTLER. I am very much afraid the Senator from Rhode Island will lose his temper if he keeps on.

Mr. BURNSIDE. No, I am perfectly cool; I do not think I talked quite so loudly as the Senator from South Carolina; I certainly did not talk as loudly as I have heard him talk on this floor.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely; but I hope if my voice jars upon the ears of my brother Senators they will bear with me.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Not at all; I am always delighted to hear it.

Mr. BUTLER. I am glad to hear that the Senator from Rhode Island is not shocked by what I have said.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Not at all; I never was.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator now will pardon me and permit me to go on, recurring to what I was saying in reply to the Senator from Maine, or rather some observations that I was making about what he said, I wish very much that the gallant, the kind-hearted, the valiant Senator from Rhode Island had risen with one-half the indignation that he manifested because I was simply making a few brief observations, when the Senator from Maine was indulging in anathemas and charges far more disgraceful, if true, than anything that I could say with reference to a bargain by the republican Senators. When the Senator from Maine minute after minute, almost hour after hour, was pouring the vials of his wrath and denunciation upon southern Senators as having been guilty of everything disgraceful in the catalogue of crime, the Senator from Rhode Island did not deign to open his lips.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I do not think I heard the Senator from Maine make one single charge against a Senator on that side of the Chamber.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator sat there and heard that tirade; but when I rise and attempt to vindicate myself, the Senator comes to the front and declares that whoever says there was a bargain in this Chamber, has uttered a falsehood.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Well, I do say so yet.

Mr. BUTLER. I have made no such charge; but, Mr. President, if I do not demonstrate it by irrefragable testimony I will resign my seat in this Senate. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. BURNSIDE. If the Senator does, I will give up my committee right off and I will say you have a majority on that side of the Chamber.

Mr. BUTLER. If I do not demonstrate it by proof——

Mr. BURNSIDE. That is what we want—proof.

Mr. BUTLER. Proof irrefragable, I will resign my seat in this Senate and not ask the Senator from Rhode Island to give up his committee.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Let us have it.

Mr. BUTLER. That is the question and that is the only question before the Senate. The Senator from Rhode Island says the question is whether the majority shall rule. I will meet him upon that point and show him that the enunciation of such a doctrine is absolutely monstrous—the doctrine unqualified, that the majority has the right, the inherent right and power to rule. It is a doctrine, I submit, absolutely subversive of the principles upon which this Government was founded; it is a monstrous doctrine. Ours is a Government controlled by law, by a written Constitution, which was made for the protection of minorities, and when the Senator gets ready to discuss that issue, I will discuss it with him.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Well, Mr. President, I shall be ready for it, or I can leave it to others.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Maine arraigned the entire South almost; he arraigned every Senator from the South, charging that we are here the representatives of States that have repudiated their public obligations, as an excuse for something that is being done in this Senate. I challenge the Senator—and I use that word in no offensive sense—I ask him to name a single Senator from the South who has ever advocated repudiation, either of State or national obligations. Speaking for myself, Mr. President, I desire to inform that Senator that in my own State I have "in season and out of season," early and late, rebuked upon the stump, in correspondence, private conversation, and in every way everything that looked even towards repudiation of the State or national debt; and I believe the same may be said of every other democratic Senator on this floor. I have never favored it for one instant; and if I had, it would be no excuse, I submit respectfully, for encouraging repudiation in Virginia. And let me say to the Senator from Maine, he who claims to be the special advocate of the recognition of public obligations and their payment, that when he tampers with repudiation in Virginia, he is dealing with dynamite all over this country; and pardon me for saying that admitting all he says to be true, it ill becomes him and his great party to throw its powerful weight on the side of repudiation in the State of Virginia.

But, Mr. President, I simply rose to say that I did not think and I do not now think that the tactics and the course pursued by the distinguished Senator from Maine are going to succeed; they will not divert public attention from the real issue before this Senate; they will not dissolve "the solid South;" and, if he will pardon me for saying so, I tell him that just such speeches as his will weld the South more solidly than ever and drive the good people of that country together. The South will not be dissolved by Federal patronage; it will not be dissolved by abuse, vituperation, and misrepresentation; it will not be bullied into a dissolution. I for one am frank to say—I have said it before—that I would to God there was a division in the South; I shall rejoice in the day when there is a wholesome, healthy division; and I think I am not arrogating anything to myself when I say that I know better than the honorable Senator from Maine does, or any Senator that far away, what will divide it. If he supposes that he is going to dissolve what he chooses to call "the solid South" by abuse and misrepresentation, he is mistaken; if he supposes that the methods which he and his friends have adopted as to Virginia will dissolve "the solid South," he and they have adopted, of all others, the very plan to bring together in one solid mass for self-defense and self-protection the very elements when there were all over the South evidences of disintegration. In my own State it is so; in Virginia I have no doubt it is so; in Georgia it is so; in North Carolina I have no doubt it is so.

Mr. President and Senators of the republican party, you made a faulty diagnosis of the condition of the South when you established your reconstruction measures down there, bringing so much of wrong and ruin and distress and heart-burning and loss. The Senator from Maine talks about the statutes passed by southern Legislatures at a certain time being worse than in any barbaric country. I say to him I will invite him into the field of history, and if he can find a government in any country in any age that would compare in infamy and wrong and cruelty with what were known as the republican governments in the South, I will abandon the field and say that he is right. I heard nothing then about "a free ballot and a fair count" at the South when the South was solidly republican, with every office from governor to constable in the hands of the republican party. I heard nothing then from the honorable Senator from Maine, with his powerful and eloquent voice, about "a free ballot and a fair count." I have myself stood in view of the ballot-box under republican rule, and every principle of civil liberty and government was trampled under foot with as much contempt as if it had been a piece of blank paper.

Those days are gone. A new era has dawned upon the South, and I want to live to see the day, and if they will let us alone we shall all live to see the day in a short time, that every symptom, every remnant of those dark days which immediately followed the war will have passed away. I want to see the day when the law will protect in his humble cottage the humblest man, when it will stand with a drawn sword over his cottage-door, threatening to disturb any man who will interfere with the liberties and rights of that humble man as relentlessly as at the mansions and the palaces of the rich and the proud.

I want to see that day. I want to see it in the South, and I want to see it in Massachusetts and in Rhode Island and in Maine—Rhode Island, a State where I heard a distinguished man say that if the restriction upon suffrage depriving the foreign-born citizen who did not own one hundred and thirty-four dollars' worth of real estate of the ballot were removed, there would be a vigilance committee in Providence in thirty days. I saw when I was there this remarkable fact: A man who had fought through the war, a foreign-born citizen, wounded, brevetted lieutenant-colonel, an honorable, gallant, brave soldier, who emancipated a slave upon the sea-coast of North Carolina, carried that slave to Rhode Island, and yet because that man was born in the United States, he who had recently been a slave walked up over the shoulder of that soldier and deposited his ballot when the man who had fought for his emancipation was not allowed to vote.

I am finding no fault with the honorable Senators from the State of Rhode Island; I cannot find fault with the State itself. I should be untrue to every sentiment of manhood if I did. Rhode Island has a right to manage her affairs as she sees fit, subject only to the paramount law of the United States. That is the doctrine. I ask only that for South Carolina; nothing more, nothing less. I ask the Senators on that side of the Chamber to give us credit for some desire, professing and claiming to be intelligent, humane men, to see our society well ordered and well preserved in the South.

But, as I said awhile ago, your diagnosis of the difficulty was very faulty upon a previous occasion, and I think it equally faulty now. I think—pardon me for saying so—that the very methods you are adopting here of attempting to dragoon and misrepresent and abuse men from the South will not enable you to succeed in frightening them into your peculiar terms. It will not be done, and I say so in no spirit of defiance. I am either the peer of any Senator on this floor or I have no right to be here. My State is the peer of any other State in this American Union or she has no right to be represented here. All that I ask for her is that which I am more than willing, have always been willing by my vote, my act, my conduct, since I have been here, to accord to every other sovereign State in this Union.

But, Mr. President, I have been betrayed into saying a great deal more than I intended when I rose. I repeat that at the proper time if the remarks of the Senator from Maine in my judgment shall require further notice at my hands as to what he may have said about my State and the condition of affairs down there, I shall take occasion to ask the Senate to hear me in response; but for the present I desire to repeat that that is not the issue. The real issue is whether or not a bargain has been made on this floor by which it is proposed on the one part to take something which does not belong to the republican caucus or the democratic caucus or both combined in exchange for the influence or the vote or the power of any man or set of men, to wit, the officers of this Senate. They do not belong to us. They belong to the sovereign people of this country, and we control them in trust for the people and not to barter away for political power.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, the gage which the honorable Senator from South Carolina has thrown down in reference to future discussion I shall not take up because there are members of the party on my side of the Chamber who are much better able to discuss those questions than I am, and I shall allow them to do so. I merely rose to remind the Senator from South Carolina that I did not think he or any one else on that side of the Chamber was at all justified in saying that there was a corrupt bargain on our part. That is a thing which to me is very grating, and notwithstanding my feeble power in public speaking, and all my dislike to getting up in the Senate, I could not help repelling that, and I repel it now, and I shall repel it as long as we sit here.

I say to the Senator from South Carolina that if he will prove what he says he can prove, I will at once cast my vote for the expulsion of any member of the Senate who shall be found guilty of a corrupt fraud. He calls me to account for not checking the Senator from Maine in his speech. It was not my place to check him; I did not understand the Senator from Maine to make any charge against any Senator on that side of the Chamber. His charges, so far as I heard them, were against the method of conducting elections in the South and were of a general nature. I did not understand that he made any distinct charge against any Senator on that side of the Chamber, and I do not know that during this whole debate there has been one single charge made which would involve the integrity of any member on that side of the Chamber while frequent charges have been made there against us. And when I spoke of them Senators smiled as if they amounted to nothing, as if it was a small thing to get up and say there is corruption on this side of the Chamber. I say it is a very grave thing, and if it can be proved it is a disgraceful thing on our part or on the part of the person who has committed the fraud. No man is entitled to a seat in this Chamber who would be guilty of such a fraud. It is a very grave thing. It is not a thing for Senators to smile at. It is not a thing for them to brush away in a moment and say that I was talking in a general way. You have not been talking in a general way; you have been talking in a very direct way, Senators on that side of the Chamber; you have said that you are opposing what we are doing here now because we had made a corrupt bargain. That is what you have said.

Mr. President, I have just one more word to say and that is in reference to my own State of Rhode Island. In Rhode Island we make laws and we are not ashamed of them in the least degree, but we obey the laws always. Men who are entitled by law to vote in the State of Rhode Island vote, and no man tries to retard men in that right. The State of Rhode Island has received, as I said the other day in a few remarks I made, a vindication on this floor which we all stand by, and I cannot gild refined gold. The senior Senator from the State of Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] has made a vindication of it upon which I am quite ready to stand.
